DEDICATION

THIS BOOK IS DEDICATED TO MY BELOVED LORD RAM

I dedicate this Book to Lord Sri Ram who is my dearest of dear, most beloved, the essence of my life and being, and for whom, and for whose pleasure, and on whose behest, and on whose divine mission, this book is dedicated.

Nothing that I write is of my own creation. It is the Lord who is getting it done. So I deserve no credit. However, being an ordinary man like the rest of us, I may have committed errors, and for those I beg forgiveness. I hope this book will help to continue the great tradition of singing the glories of the different aspects of same indivisible one Divinity in order to meet diverse needs of the Soul, the Spirit, one such being to find peace and happiness amidst the surrounding turmoil of the world by being able to spend some time in the thoughts of the Divine Being, the same 'Parmatma', the same Lord known by different names in different tongues.

No creature is perfect; it's foolhardy to claim so. The best of paintings cannot replace the original; the best of words cannot express the original emotions and sentiments. Even the Lord was not satisfied by one flower or one butterfly—he went on endlessly evolving and designing newer forms. So, I have done my best, I have poured out my being in these books. Honestly, I am totally incompetent—it was the Lord who had done the actual writing and had moved my fingers as if they were merely an instrument in his divine hands. But nonetheless, it's a tribute to the Lord's glory that he does not take the credit himself, but bestows it to them whom he loves as his very own. And to be 'his very own' is indeed an unmatched honour. However, I still beg forgiveness for all omissions, commissions and transgressions on my part that I may have inadvertently made. It's the Lord's glories that I sing, rejoice in, write on and think of to the best of my ability. I hope my readers will also absorb the divine fragrance effusing from the flowers representing the Lord's books, enjoy the ambrosia pouring out of them and marvel at the Lord's stupendous glories.

I submit this effort at the holy feet of my beloved Lord Ram whom even Lord Shiva had revered and worshipped. And surely of course to Lord Hanuman too who was a manifestation of Shiva himself. Finding no words to express my profound gratitude to Ram, I just wish to remain quiet, and let my silence do the speaking and praying on my behalf.

I hope the reader will find my book useful and interesting. Since English is an international language, this book will help the English speaking world to access this masterpiece of classical Indian scriptural literature so rich in its devotional quotient.

“He leadeth me! O blessed tho't!
O words with heav'nly comfort fraught!
What-e'er I do, wher-e'er I be,
Still 'tis God's hand that leadeth me!” [Joseph Henry Gilmore, 1862.]

ŚRĪ RĀMA CARITA MĀNASA Of Gōswāmī Tulasīdās

Original Text, English Transliteration &

VOLUME 1

Preface

The Essence & Spirit of ‘Sri Ram Charit Manas’

The classical epic known as the “Sri Ram Charit Manas” (pronounced “Śrī Rāma Carita Mānasa”) was written by Goswami Tulsidas (birth: Hindu Samvat 1589/1532 A.D; death: Samvat 1680/A.D. 1623), who was a great saint-poet of India and a prolific narrator of the divine Story of Lord Ram, for besides the Ram Charit Manas he had also written other wonderful books on the theme of the Ramayana.

The ‘Sri Ram Charit Manas’ is a masterpiece of devotional literature ever written in India; it’s the greatest devotional piece of literature written in the vernacular. Basically it is an ancient Story that describes the life, time and deeds of Lord Ram, who was an incarnation of the Supreme Lord God in a human form.

This Book, ‘Sri Ram Charit Manas’, has no parallel in the world of devotional and spiritual literature with regard to the beauty, charm and magnificence of its poetry, the melody inherent in its verses and style of composition, as well as for the immensity and depth of its devotional message, the countless gems of wisdom and practical advice for leading a good life of righteousness and auspiciousness that it contains, and for the fountain of spiritual and metaphysical knowledge that sprouts from its pages.

One fascinating and singularly magical aspect of Ram Charit Manas is that it has been interpreted and explained by countless teachers in their own way throughout its existence, but still there seems to be no end of the way it can be interpreted and explained in a newer way, for no one interpretation, explanation or exposition seems to be complete, leaving the Epic Book open to further exploration.

Another wonderful and wondrous aspect of Ram Charit Manas is that it is equally charming for a person whether that person is narrating the story himself, or is hearing it being narrated by someone else. This is evident when we see the case of Lord Shiva; he was the creator of this divine story, and he had narrated it first to his consort Uma, and then to the saintly crow Kaagbhusund<sup>1</sup>. But later on we learn that Lord

Shiva becomes a listener himself, and enjoyed it thoroughly: he visits the hermitage of the saintly crow Kaagbhusund to hear it<sup>2</sup>, as well as to the hermitage of sage Agastya to do so on another occasion<sup>3</sup>. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, <sup>1</sup>Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 30; <sup>2</sup>Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 55—to Doha no. 57; <sup>3</sup>Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

Though it is written in the vernacular language—precisely a language called ‘Avadhi’, which was, and is still, spoken in a geographical region of India where the holy town of Ayodhya is situated—the Book nevertheless has a universal appeal and such a matchless charm that it is routinely sung or recited in temples as a standard spiritual text. Its mass appeal lies in the simplicity of its language, the devotion for Lord God that it ignites in the heart of the reader and the listener, and the versatility of the style of composition of its verses which makes it possible to sing them in different Raagas (classical musical tunes of India) in accordance with the wishes of the singer.

This Book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is a poetic rendering in the Avadhi dialect of the well-known and famous classical Story of the ‘Ramayana’ which tells the story of Lord Ram, a manifestation of the Supreme Being in a human form. It is an exceptionally captivating and fascinating book that has been adapted by many cultures and translated into many languages. Though there are many versions of the Ramayana, but Tulsidas builds his own Story of the ‘Ram Charit Manas’ by primarily referring to sage Valmiki’s version of the Ramayana, and sage Veda Vyas’ version known as the Adhyatma Ramayan.

The name ‘Ram Charit Manas’ literally means ‘the deeds done by Lord Ram (“Ram” + “Charit” = deeds done by someone that define his life) as they are conceived and enshrined in the heart and mind (“Manas” = heart and mind) of a devotee’. Who was this ‘devotee’ in whose mind and heart this grand and divine story was first conceived, and who then reverentially enshrined it there as one would consecrate a deity in a temple, or like a lotus flower that blooms in a lake, free from all surrounding pollutions?

Well, the answer is that this divine, holy and revered Story of ‘Ram Charit Manas’ was first revealed in the heart and mind (the “Mana”) of Lord Shiva while he was meditating upon his revered deity, Lord Ram, the Lord whom Shiva worshipped, adored and glorified. Indeed, Lord Shiva is the Great God, the ‘Maha-Deva’, reputed for his excellence of spiritual wisdom, enlightenment and self-realisation, who first conceived this glorious Story of his revered and beloved Lord Ram inside his Mana while he was once contemplating on the Lord and doing Japa (constant repetition) by using the holy name of ‘Ram’ as a Mantra (spiritual formula) for this purpose. This filled Lord Shiva with profound ecstasy; he remained in a transcendental state of consciousness, known as ‘Samadhi’, as he was engrossed in drinking the ambrosia of bliss and beatitude that spouted in his inner-being when the Story of Lord Ram revealed itself to him, and for a long time Shiva remained oblivious to everything else around him. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 46; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 58.]

By-and-by he thought that such a great and rare source of spiritual joy and bliss should not be locked up secretly in a personal cellar, but it ought to be shared selflessly with the world for the general good of all living beings. So therefore, he unlocked the doors of his heart and revealed this divine story of Ram Charit Manas to his consort, goddess Uma or Parvati, then to the saintly crow Kaagbhusund, from whom it was heard by sage Yagyawalkya, who in turn revealed it to sage Bharadwaj, and from there this magnificent ambrosia that grants spiritual bliss and joy to the reader and the listener alike percolated down to the rest of the world through many generations of sages, saints, bards and minstrels in the form we know it today. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.]

The word ‘Manas’ in the nomenclature of this book is often times also referred to as a ‘lake’. It is because like a lotus flower that sprouts in a lake but remains clean even if the lake has polluted water, as no dirt is said to stick to the petals of the lotus, so is the case of Ram Charit Manas—that it remains eternally holy, divine, pure and sublime irrespective of the quality of the heart and mind of the person who reads, recites or hears it.

Ram Charit Manas is not merely a story of a great prince of the dynasty of kings that ruled over the mighty and prosperous kingdom of Ayodhya, but is a story that defines eclectic human values of love, compassion, kindness, gentleness, magnanimity, benevolence, sacrifice, renunciation, steadfastness in the face of adversity, commitment to duty, devotion, service, servitude, truth, tolerance, self-restraint, resilience, brotherhood, honesty, modesty, propriety, probity, nobility in thought and conduct, righteousness and wisdom—in brief, a long list of virtues and qualities that would make a person into a good and exemplary, if not a perfect, human being.

The story of Lord Ram has taught us all these values by the virtue of many examples that we come across in the course of our reading of the Ram Charit Manas, and not merely as abstract concepts and precepts that are difficult to implement. The Lord’s life teaches us many stellar virtues, such as, for example, to remain calm and composed in the face of the gravest provocation, to learn self-control in the face of the greatest of temptations, and to treat this life in the world where it is surrounded by strife and turmoil with an attitude of equanimity, fortitude and maturity.

A thorough study of this magnificent book Sri Ram Charit Manas and implementing its teachings in our daily lives will not only help us to be as perfect a human as we can possibly become, but also give us immense reward by way of spiritual and mental peace, bliss and happiness, virtues which are, after all, the objective of all human endeavours.

This book gives immense solace and succour to the soul; it acts as a soothing balm for the tormented spirit. It lights the way for spiritual seekers on their path towards emancipation, liberation and deliverance as easily as it helps a person to understand the intricacies and complexities of human thoughts, behaviour and relationships in the mundane mortal world in which he lives. It not only helps us to realize the practical realities of life but also guides us by showing solutions to vexed problems much like a ‘guide book of life’.

Reading it, studying it, and discussing it would make a person feel fulfilled and happy. It not only makes him practical, but spiritual as well.

In short, we can say that Sri Ram Charit Manas is a holistic guide for an all-round development of a person—for it not only shows him how to tackle different issues in the secular world, but also enlightens him at the same time as how to attain spiritual beatitude and felicity while going about his chores in the world. It therefore acts a guidebook from the perspective of practical life in this world, as well as from the spiritual angle.

Sri Ram Charit Manas is a divine story that is ageless and timeless. It is sung with equal devotion and fervor by the learned savant as by the laity; it appeals to the old as much as it does to the young. It is one book that has been preached, discussed and analyzed, line by line, by legends of teachers, preachers and scholars, but still no one could claim that he could even scratch its surface, let alone explain it or understand it exhaustively. It is, at the same time, a holy book of the same stature as a sacred scripture, as well as a classic epic story retold.

It is read by an individual silently and in solitude as a means of study and obtaining spiritual bliss, and is recited by a huge congregation with the same reverence as one witnesses during a Holy Mass, and the magic is that in both the cases it enthralls, captivates and enchants the mind and the spirit of the narrator as well as the audience.

Those who simply sit quietly to hear this divine story being sung or narrated by others derive equal bliss and succour as those who have an actual book of Ram Charit Manas in their hands even as the recitation is done by the scholarly preacher or the leader of the congregation, or the singer who sings the verses in a melodious tones.

Remember: Music has no barriers of language or geography; so is the case with Ram Charit Manas, because if its verses are sung by a good singer, then it casts such a magical spell on the audience that everyone is held mesmerized by its charm.

These aforesaid unique characteristics of Sri Ram Charit Manas gives it a universal appeal that transcends generations, cultures and periods of time, making it one-of-its-kind of a masterpiece of literature ever written in India.

The story of Lord Ram is a story of the Supreme Being in a form that is comprehensible to the mind and intellect of even the ordinary and the humblest of creatures. It had its origin in a very subtle form like the cosmic sound known as 'Naad', which is the vibration of Consciousness in the vast and fathomless expanse of the cosmos. Then, just as this creation progressively became grosser and grosser in a step-wise manner, and the abstract cosmic sound called the Naad gradually crystallized itself in the form of words and languages that were understandable and related directly to every individual member of this creation, the divine story of 'Sri Ram Charit Manas' containing the glory and the message of the Supreme Lord too became more and more understandable as it transformed itself from the abstract nature of the cosmic vibration of Consciousness that was first revealed in the heart of Lord Shiva, into more meaningful form as a divine story to which even the ordinary creatures of this creation could easily relate to.

The Genesis of the Story of Sri Ram Charit Manas:

As to the genesis of this story, we learn that it was first revealed in the heart of Lord Shiva who represents the Supreme Being in his cosmic form. This is why Lord Shiva is honoured by the scriptures with the title of “Maha-Deva”, the Great God. But it was too abstract for comprehension by the rest of this creation. So therefore, the Lord decided to codify his message in the form of a ‘story’, the “Sri Ram Charit Manas”, and first divulged it to his divine consort Parvati who represented Mother Nature from whom the rest of this visible creation came forth. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

Now, after this first revelation at the beginning of creation, the divine story spread throughout this creation as it developed in a step-by-step manner just like the holy river Ganges descended from the heaven to earth. Let us examine how.

Shiva told it to the saintly crow named Kaagbhusund. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30.] Kaagbhusund was a ‘bird’ (a crow) by his physical body. This is very significant: A bird flies in the air; it can as easily live on the surface of the earth as it can reach the highest reaches of the sky. From the perspective of metaphysics therefore, it represents a level of spiritual existence that lies between the subtlest and the grossest, symbolized by the heaven and the earth respectively. Thus, Kaagbhusund is a metaphor for all those exalted, self-realised and enlightened souls who had attained an exemplarily high level of spiritual evolvment, but had yet not qualified for complete godhood. Therefore, Lord Shiva telling the story of Sri Ram Charit Manas to Kaagbhusund symbolically refers to the second step in the revelation of the divine message of the Supreme Being to those highly exalted and spiritually evolved souls who would understand its true meaning and import, who had the intellect and wisdom to be able to delve deeper into its core and extract its essential message in the right spirit.

The next step came with sage Yagyawalkya learning it from Kaagbhusund. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

Yagyawalkya was the most exalted, highly erudite, the most learned and the most respected of all the ancient sages and seers of the time. He was most qualified amongst all his peers to grasp this knowledge. [Refer: Brihad-Aranyaka Upanishad, Canto 3, Brahman 8, verse no. 12, and Brahman 9, verse no. 27.]

Yagyawalkya was competent to understand its heavenly knowledge. He then used his own language to transfer this knowledge to others in a language and in a way they could themselves understand. This would enable his disciples to spread the glorious story and its divine message to the rest of the world so that every creature could benefit from it. Thus, Yagyawalkya told it to sage Bharadwaj who lived on the banks of three holy rivers where a huge congregation of sages and seers assembled every year. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 47.]

In this annual event, there were discourses on spiritual, metaphysical and religious themes, and surely enough Sri Ram Charit Manas was preached and discussed. This helped to spread this story far and wide, because all the great sages, seers and saints who assembled there and heard it, went back to their own places and retold it to their own line of disciples and assemblies that gathered at their respective places. And so the divine story of Lord Rāma spread far and wide in different languages and in different ways because each sage had his own way of disseminating this knowledge. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

We also find that besides telling this story to sage Yagyawalkya, as noted above, the crow saint Kaagbhusund had told this story to other birds too, and the most prominent amongst them was Garuda, the mount of Lord Vishnu. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Uttar-Kanda, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 62.]

Lord Shiva had already told this story to Parvati and Kaagbhusund. But he thought that he must do more to spread this holy message, and must check that it is being correctly told to others. So, once he had gone to sage Agastya and heard the story of Ram Charit Manas being narrated by the sage to reassure himself that story is being told correctly, unadulterated, un-tampered and without interpolations. Lord Shiva was satisfied with what he heard, and as token of his happiness he had abided in the sage's hermitage for some time and engaged with him in spiritual discourse. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

Now, the question that is left unanswered in Ram Charit Manas is this: From whom did sage Agastya hear this story? Most probably it was during one of the religious congregations that were held regularly at the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45.]

It was during one such occasion that sage Bharadwaj had requested sage Yagyawalkya to stay back and narrate the story of Ram, known as the Ram Charit Manas, to him in a private audience after the rest of the sages had gone back. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47.]

Then we also learn that this story was heard by other sages such as Valmiki and Narad. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3.] Now, Valmiki represented the sages who lived on earth, and Narad represented sages who could reach even the heaven (because Narad was a sage who lived in heaven and could roam any where in this creation).

Whereas the other learned sages and seers taught and preached this Holy Book “orally” to their juniors and disciples who had attended their teaching sessions or discourses, sage Valmiki took the wise step to “write it down” in the form of the epic “Ramayana” that helped this story to be preserved in a standardized form that won't be susceptible to distortions or interpolations in the future, as well as to help it reach the farthest corners of the world, thereby enabling even those who could not attend oral teachings or recitations of the epic to have access to this story, at a place and time of their convenience.

But here again there was a problem. Valmiki wrote in Sanskrit which was the language of the scholar and of the higher echelons of society. Ordinary men and women were prevented from accessing it because of the language barrier.

The Lord God saw this obstacle in the propagation of his message. As it has been happening in history, the Lord sends someone as his ‘messenger’ when he deems it fit to do so. This messenger comes down to earth with a divine mandate, finishes his job in spite of un-surmountable obstacles which would break the spirit and will of the mightiest of men, and once the Lord’s task is done, this messenger goes away.

One such person was Goswami Tulsidas. The Supreme Lord felt that if his message is to reach the common man and have a wider reach then it has to be in a language this man understood. Sanskrit didn’t fit the bill as it was limited to the high and the mighty, not the laity. So, the Lord God got this divine nectar-like story written in the language of the common man, the language he spoke and understood. It was “Hindi”, and more specifically a form of Hindi that even the humblest man could speak, the local dialect called “Avadhi”.

Tulsidas himself learnt this story of Sri Ram Charit Manas from his teacher. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, Doha no. 30 ka, and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 31.]

Every sage or saint narrated it according to his understanding and abilities, and therefore each of these narrations had its own uniqueness. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

Just like the holy river Ganges descending from the lofty peaks of the Himalayas first as a single stream and then branching off to many tributaries as it cascades down to the plains, the story of Sri Ram Charit Manas descended from Lord Shiva’s heart and spread over the whole world through a chain of legendary sages and saints. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3; (ii) Doha no. 30 ka along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8, and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow this Doha.]

The immense spiritual importance, its significance for a seeker, the divine nature and the profound glory of “Sri Ram Charit Manas” have been narrated in the book itself by Tulsidas (refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 38), a reading of which is self-explanatory and highly illuminating.

The fact remains that Sri Ram Charit Manas is like an ocean of ambrosia; it is endless, it is timeless and it is beyond the reach of the mind and the intellect. There should be no doubt about it because Lord Ram, the personified form of the Supreme Being is himself beyond description and comprehension. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, Doha no. 33 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.]

It must however be noted that Goswami Tulsidas, the author of the epic “Sri Ram Charit Manas” was a very wise and clever man. This erudite saint knew the doubting mentality of the world and the skeptic nature of the people who would read his Ramayana in the future: that they would be highly cynical of him and charge him of being biased in favour of his chosen deity Lord Ram by raising Ram to a high pedestal of divinity that he perhaps does not deserve by twisting or tweaking the story to suit his purpose.

So Tulsidas played his cards carefully, and with prudence, by clearly asserting that he is merely re-telling the story of Lord Ram that has been already told by ancient sages and seers from time immemorial, and that he is not doing it to prove his scholarship or poetic skills but only to find peace for his soul as well as to purify his mind and speech. This established his objectivity in the narration. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 14; (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 30—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 31; and (iv) Doha no. 35 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 11-13.]

Therefore, instead of telling the story of Ramayana directly in the first-person-narrative style, he has clearly said that he is narrating what sage Yagyawalkya had said to sage Bharadwaj, what Lord Shiva had said to Parvati, and other exalted sages such as Veda Vyas. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal-Kanda, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 14.]

But of course Tulsidas has interspersed his own narration with nuggets of advice and wisdom based on his own experiences and understanding of the ancient scriptures, which add immense shine and depth to the narration, making it similar to the Upanishads and the Purans because “Ram Charit Manas” has the characteristics of both. While on the one hand it resembles the “Purans” as it narrates a divine ‘story of the Lord God in one of his incarnations as Lord Ram’, on the other hand it resembles the “Upanishads” because it contains a huge treasure of spiritual and metaphysical knowledge for which the Upanishads are so famed.

So this in brief is an introduction to the spiritual classic known as “Sri Ram Charit Manas”: a grand and magnificent Story of the Supreme Being in his human form as Lord Ram, the Story of the Lord as he lived amongst us like one of us; a Story that has the potential to grant spiritual bliss, beatitude and joy to even the most lowly and the humble, to those who don’t have the mental ability to fathom the depths of metaphysical knowledge enshrined in the Upanishads, nor have access either to the Purans or expert Gurus (teachers). Since the ultimate goal of all spiritual endeavours is to attain bliss, happiness, beatitude and felicity, Ram Charit Manas fits the bill perfectly as it provides all these rewards without any effort.

Amongst all the books that my dear Lord Ram had inspired and motivated me to write—nay, he actually used me as a pen to put into writing what the Lord had wished to be written for the good of all—this holy and revered Book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is my Magnum Opus, along with the 108 Vedic Upanishads that I have written in English. It goes without saying that this Book is a fruit of the Lord’s grace and love for me, and it also goes without saying therefore that I can never ever claim any credit for its writing. I have tried to be as diligent and careful as I could to avoid errors, both of omission and of commission, but still, being after all being an ordinary human being, it cannot be ruled out that errors must have crept in inadvertently. Hence, I beg my esteemed and honourable readers to overlook such minor issues that may be present in a voluminous Book of this magnitude, and instead focus their attention on reading and enjoying the text with its heavenly aura, enjoying the emotional peace and happiness that this reading provides, and partaking of the succulent fruit of spiritual bliss and joy that this tree bears, a fruit whose juice is as sweet as nectar, and which grants abiding peace, beatitude and tranquillity to the soul of the seeker.

Finally, I submit this effort of mine at the holy feet of my beloved Lord Ram as well as the holy feet of Lord Hanuman whom I revere as a Guru, and once again request my esteemed readers to please forgive me for any inadvertent and un-intended mistakes or errors that I may have made in my writing because I am after all a human being who is apt to commit mistakes. So, please enjoy the Story and drink the spiritual nectar that drips from it, sidestepping small pebbles by way of unintentional commissions and omissions that I may have made during the course of my writing that you may encounter on the path of reading this book.

Amen!

Exhaustive Exposition in English with Explanatory Notes

Preamble to Śrī Rāma Carita Mānasa

“jaba jaba hō'i dharama kai hānī. bāṛhahiṁ asura adhama abhimānī. 6.
karahiṁ anīti jā'i nahim baranī. sīdahim bipra dhēnu sura dharanī. 7.
taba taba prabhu dhari bibidha sarīrā. harahiṁ kṛpānidhi sajjana pīrā. 8.”

{Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 121.}

“Whenever Dharma (i.e. the glorious, positive virtues of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics, and nobility of conduct and thought, and the high moral values they stand for) suffers in this creation due to the dominance of unscrupulous evil elements symbolized by the haughty and arrogant Demons who do everything that is diametrically opposite to what Dharma stands for, and begin to tyrannize the world intolerably, as a result of which everyone suffers, from the humblest of creatures such as the cows as well as the followers of Dharma such as the Brahmins, to the most powerful ones such as the Gods as well as Mother Earth who can't stand against the ruthless onslaught and the might of the cruel Demons—on all such occasions the most merciful, compassionate and gracious Supreme Lord of this creation assumes different forms to manifest himself in this mortal world to remove the cause of sufferings of those who are on the right path, and to provide them with succour, solace and deliverance from the horrors created by their tormentors, the Demons, by eliminating the latter, thereby restoring peace and order in the world.

To wit, whenever goodness and positive forces in the world that are collectively represented by Dharma were in the decline due to the dominance of negative and evil forces symbolized by the Demons, whenever Dharma was being trounced and trampled underfoot the domineering Demons—on all such occasions the Supreme Lord of the world was obliged to intervene to restore balance and bring about peace and harmony in his creation by eliminating those elements that were disturbing peace and playing havoc with law and order in the world.”

“Lord Ram had been so gracious that he had accepted the gross body of a human being for the sake of his devotees, for their pleasure, happiness and satisfaction, and while himself suffering from various troubles as a consequence, he had made them feel fain by bringing happiness and joy to those who were pious and holy.”

“Verily indeed, the occasions when the Supreme Lord was obliged to come down personally in the form of Lord Ram to take charge of restoring peace and order in this mortal world by eliminating the trouble makers known as the Demons, were many; in each one full cycle of creation and destruction of this world there happened to be some event which compelled the Lord to manifest himself as Lord Ram. And since the cycle of creation and destruction goes on moving endlessly, the causes and reasons and the processes whereby Lord Ram had manifested himself in this mortal gross world varied from one age to another, and each is more wondrous and strange than the others preceding or following it.”

tē'i ēhi pāvana subhaga sara ghāṭa manōhara cāri. 36.

sapta prabandha subhaga sōpānā. gyāna nayana nirakhata mana mānā. 1.
raghupati mahimā aguna abādhā. baranaba sō'i bara bāri agādhā. 2.”

“In this holy and divine Story of Lord Ram, (known as Ram Charit Manas), the four primary discourses, rich in spiritual and metaphysical wisdom, that have been narrated to form its framework, are like the four banks of a beautiful lake filled with ambrosia of bliss and beatitude.” [These four discourses are the following: Lord Shiva and Parvati; sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj; the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and Garud; saint poet Tulsidas and other saints and sages that narrated this story subsequently.] (Doha no. 36)

This divine story of Lord Ram has been arranged into seven chapters (called the Kandas), and they represent the seven steps that lead to the nectar of spiritual bliss present in the center of the symbolic lake represented by this holy story. When one sees these steps and the lake that they lead to with eyes of wisdom, one's Mana (heart and mind) is filled with delight unbound, --- (Chaupa line no. 1)

--- For he realizes that the water of this holy lake is accessed by reading the full story having seven chapters that narrate the infinite glories and greatness of Lord Ram, because they expound upon the divinity and holiness of the Lord in a finite and comprehensible way so as to make the Supreme Lord, whose primary form is invisible, cosmic, infinite and without any attributes, become easily accessible to a devotee in a way he can relate to in the gross, mortal world in which he lives. (Chaupa line no. 2)”

AMEN!

The above quotations from the holy book ‘Ram Charit Manas’, by way of an epigraphy, aptly sum up the theme of this divine Story of Lord Ram.

The name of the Book RAM CHARIT MANAS is best translated as follows—“It is the holy lake containing spiritual ambrosia in the form of the divine story describing the life, times, deeds and acts of Lord Ram who was an incarnation of the Supreme Being on earth, a divine story that has the mystical ability to give immense bliss and peace to the soul of the reader and the hearer alike”.

How will the world benefit from the Lord’s divine manifestation if its record is not maintained in an authentic manner, and then it is not made known to the world at large by those who had this knowledge? Therein comes the importance of various scriptures and oral traditions. The written word is far better and reliable than the oral word, because the former is definite, certain, abiding and eternal, one that can be passed from one generation of teacher-student to the next and further on in its pure original form, without distortions and tampering, as opposed to the oral word which suffers from many intangible forms of weaknesses as it relies heavily on the vagaries of the gross body of both the teacher as well as the disciple, and the uncertainty and the reliability of the powers of memory, hearing, speaking and comprehension of both the speaker and the listener, as these elements used in transmission of knowledge vary from person to person.

So therefore, the importance of the written version of Lord Ram’s divine story in the form of Ram Charit Manas can never be undermined or overstated, especially when it is the version that Lord Shiva had himself conceived in his Mana, and then narrated it to his consort Parvati.

Why was the Supreme Being obliged to come down to earth as Lord Ram? The answer is this: Whenever goodness and positive forces in the world that are collectively represented by Dharma were in the decline due to the dominance of negative and evil forces symbolized by the Demons, whenever Dharma was being trounced and trampled underfoot the domineering Demons—on all such occasions the Supreme Lord of the world was obliged to intervene to restore balance and bring about peace and harmony in his creation by eliminating those elements that were disturbing peace and playing havoc with law and order in the world.

And the occasions when the Supreme Lord was obliged to come down personally in the form of Lord Ram to take charge of restoring peace and order in this mortal world by eliminating the trouble makers known as the Demons, were many; in each one full cycle of creation and destruction of this world there happened to be some event which compelled the Lord to manifest himself as Lord Ram. And since the cycle of creation and destruction goes on moving endlessly, the causes and reasons and the processes whereby Lord Ram had manifested himself in this mortal gross world varied from one age to another, and each is more wondrous and strange than the others preceding or following it.

Another prominent reason why the Supreme Lord had to come down to this mortal world in the form of a human being was to oblige his devotees and fulfill their wishes, for these pious souls wished to have access to their beloved Lord and worship him in a way that was easy for them to do, a form of the Lord they could identify and correlate with in the physical world they lived in and were accustomed to, because life was short and precious moments could not be frittered away in the uncertainties and difficulties associated with following the arduous path of accessing the same Lord by metaphysical knowledge that though would lead to the Lord but was too complex and abstract for them to actually benefit from.

This Holy Book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ written by Goswami Tulsidas, a sixteenth century saint-poet of India, is matchless in its beauty of writing and lucid in its presentation of the subject matter. It describes the life and times of Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being, who came down to earth for a variety of reasons. Though there are so many versions of this classical story but the present book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ by Tulsidas has found no match anywhere.

It is highly respected, adored and revered not only in India but also in all other parts of the world where Hindus live and where this divine story of the Lord has reached by its other renderings. Its specialty lies in the simplicity of language, its depth of wisdom, its comprehensive coverage of eclectic philosophies of metaphysics, spiritualism, devotion, theology and such other tenets and doctrines as are enshrined in the many Hindu scriptures of India. The miracle of Tulsidas is that he weaves so many esoteric and enigmatic concepts effortlessly in his writings, and in a way this holy story of Lord Ram presents to the reader an easily readable and very simple packaged version of the great philosophies of the Upanishads and the Purans that are otherwise too difficult for the common man to comprehend fully.

The entire book is rich with spiritual and metaphysical wisdom, and if read carefully one gets to know the essence of Hinduism and the great teachings of its scriptures that have made it so profound and robust in this world that ever since the dawn of civilization and inspite of continual attempts to uproot it, it still remains the treasure trove of spiritual truth, wisdom and enlightenment.

The story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, as we have noted above, was meant to be a holy book dedicated to the Supreme Being, a book which was to serve the creature in his pursuit of spiritual peace and happiness, to help him find succour and solace in times of worldly troubles when he needs some emotional and sentimental support to help keep his spirits high and overcome a sense of hopelessness and distress which seemed to drown him, the emphasis of this book was on spiritual and metaphysical aspects, intended to give the reader a beacon of hope and solace amid the surrounding darkness, to tell him that he ought not to feel lonely and forgotten as his beloved Lord Ram is always there to help him and stand by him.

Again, since profound theological, spiritual and metaphysical philosophies of the Upanishads and other scriptures are beyond the reach and understanding of the common man, Ram Charit Manas uses the simple tool of story telling that would be easy to understand, but in order to serve its real intention of helping the creature in the spiritual field, it seamlessly weaves into the structure of the story itself all the necessary tenets of spiritualism and metaphysics that a common person would need to know.

Inspite of the fact that Ram Charit Manas is written by Tulsidas in Avadhi, which is an offshoot of the main vernacular language of India, i.e. Hindi, it still commands exceptional respect and adoration from people of all walks of life speaking myriad of tongues. No other single book that tells a divine story of the Supreme Being's various manifestations or incarnations or revelations has ever commanded this reverence and got such laurels.

This Holy Book narrates the epic divine story of Lord Ram that is popularly known as the Ramayan. Its main stress is on complete devotion for, faith in and submission to the Lord. Generations after generations of devotional preachers and orators have flourished on this single book.

It is a household name in India, and is recited and sung in numerous versions, evoking deep devotion and immense love for the Lord in the heart of all those who listen to it, read it and sing it. The uniqueness of Ram Charit Manas is that it is written in a style that the whole story can be sung in different ways in different Raagas (tunes, notes and metres of music). Even if one does not understand the meaning of its words, it still captivates the mind and the heart by its natural holiness and the divinity that effuses out of the sound of its words much like the warmth and the freshness of the sunlight that one feels after the dark coldness of the winter night. Another wonder is countless preachers have been preaching and interpreting each of its lines for generations but still no one has come to the final conclusion as to what the verses and hymns actually mean, and newer meanings are found and newer interpretations are being done constantly.

In the field of devotional Hindu literature it holds the same place as the Vedas, the Upanishads and the Purans, and equally revered and honoured. In fact, those who follow the path of Bhakti, i.e. the path of devotion and submission for the Lord, like to call it the 'fifth Veda'. The beauty of its lyrics and music is indeed spell-binding as well as a provider of spiritual ecstasy, bliss and peace that is so much sought after by all spiritual seekers.

The divine story of the Supreme Being who incarnated on this earth as a human being in the form of Lord Ram is no ordinary story of some great king or emperor who ruled this world. This magnificent story has a divine element in it; it is sublime by its inherent nature, and it is holy inasmuch as it possesses a mystical power that would provide the listener and the reader alike with the spiritual reward of 'Mukti', or liberation and deliverance from this entangling world of delusions and its endless cycle of birth and death along with its interminable horrors. Listening, telling and reading this divine story, with due concentration and faith, is equivalent to meditation and contemplation because the mind and the heart get totally involved and remain engrossed in the details of the fascinating story and its wonderful mysteries as they unfold slowly in all their resplendent colours and splendourous glories.

In this era known as 'Kaliyug', marked by grossness of everything, where spiritualism has been relegated to backstage, and truthful Gyan (gnosis; spiritual knowledge of the Truth as envisioned and explained in the Upanishads) has been all but eclipsed, being overshadowed by false knowledge that is cleverly wrapped up and marketed as Gnosis, this book Ram Charit Manas acts like a lighthouse for a seeker who seeks a means that would help him to steer the ship of his life in a direction that would grant his soul the spiritual reward of peace, bliss, beatitude and joy, much like the bacon of the aforesaid lighthouse that guides a ship through rough seas and helps its crew to avoid a shipwreck. To wit, the story of Ram Charit Manas is a single-window remedy of all spiritual ills and ailments that afflict a creature, and being a 'story' rather than dry and abstract metaphysical philosophy, it caters to the needs of even the lowliest and the humblest of creatures in this mortal world. It is like a vast and fathomless ocean, for the more one dives into it the more gems he is sure to discover in it. ### Meaning and Structure:

The name 'Ram Charit Manas' itself has many meanings. It means for instance 'a holy lake ('Manas') in which is filled the ambrosia of spirituality and devotion in the form of the divine story of Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being, that describes the Lord's enigmatic deeds and mysterious actions ('Charit') on earth'.

It also means the heart and mind (Mana) of Lord Shiva where this divine Story that describes the life and time of Lord Ram, and the deeds done by him during his lifetime on earth (Ram Charit), was first revealed, almost spontaneously like an underground spring of nectar that emerges from the bowls of the earth to provide succour and solace to all the creatures on earth.

This story originally unfolded like a lotus opening its petals in the heart of Lord Shiva when he was meditating on the Supreme Lord known as Brahm, the Supreme Being who is also known as the Parmatma, the supreme Atma or Soul of creation. Then Lord Shiva contemplated deeply, analyzed it, distilled its spiritual nectar in the crucible of his mind and intellect to extract the essence or the ambrosia that would be for the good and welfare of this world, and would provide the creatures of this world an easy way to attain liberation and deliverance, called 'Mukti'.

In this cosmic vision, Lord Shiva's heart and mind are collectively called the 'Manas', because the word 'Mana' in Hindi means the heart, the mind and the sub-conscious. This Manas was filled with the nectar of devotion and love for Lord Ram, the most compassionate, benevolent, gracious and munificent Supreme Being. From this lake emerged the divine lotus in the form of the story of Lord Ram which Lord Shiva first revealed to his divine consort Parvati or Uma.

Step by step, this story descended to the earth for the benefit of human kind. Besides Parvati, Lord Shiva had revealed it to the saintly crow named Kaagbhusund. The latter had narrated it to Garud, the legendary mount of Lord Vishnu, as well as to sage Yagyawalkya, who in turn told it to sage Bharadwaj. Tulsidas says that he is narrating the same story that sage Bharadwaj had heard. However, Tulsidas heard it from his own Guru (teacher) in Sukarkhet. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30 ka and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-5; Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 63-to Doha no. 125 Ka.]

We also find that there is one more great sage named as being a narrator of Ram Charit Manas, and he is sage Agastya. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

If we closely examine this sequence of narration, we make a very fascinating discovery. It has ‘seven stages or steps’ of narration—viz. (1) Shiva to Parvati; (2) Shiva to Kaagbhudund; (3) Kaagbhusund to Garud; (4) Kaagbhusund to Yagyawalkya; (5) Yagyawalkya to Bharadwaj; (6) A chain of sages and seers down to the Guru of Tulsidas; and (7) Guru to Tulsidas.

The last two stages, i.e. steps 6 and 7, can be interpreted in a different way also—viz. step 6 = Guru to Tulsidas; and step 7 = Tulsidas to the rest of the human race.

However, sage Agastya is the mysterious ‘missing link’ because we don’t know for certain from whom he had heard it, except that Lord Shiva had once gone to his hermitage to hear the story being narrated by the sage. Probably, and we can only make a guess in this connection in the absence of any solid proof, Lord Shiva had gone to hear the story from sage Agastya to make sure that the divinity of the holy story of Lord Ram that Shiva had first conceived in his Mana (heart and mind), where the Lord keeps it reverentially like one would consecrate a deity in a shrine because it constantly reminds Shiva of his beloved Lord Ram, is being retold and preached in the correct manner, without any tweaking and tampering and interpolations. After hearing the story of Ram Charit Mana from sage Agastya, Lord Shiva was satisfied. [Refer: Sri Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kanda, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

This is the reason why there are ‘seven’ Cantos or Kands or Chapters in the Ram Charit Manas. The idea is that the divine nectar of the story of Lord Ram reached us human beings in a stepwise manner. Once fully told in a common man’s language which Tulsidas did, it became accessible to one and all, to the entire humanity irrespective of a man’s intellectual abilities and mental caliber. The original versions of the divine story of Lord Ram, popularly known as the ‘Ramayana’, were in the classical language of Sanskrit, making them out of reach of the common man. But Tulsidas opened the gates to this divine lake by narrating the whole story in a lucid, extremely attractive and musical style so that it can be read and be on the lips of even the lay person.

A lake is accessed by means of steps; one cannot benefit from its clean and pure water by just looking from the top. The ambrosia of devotion and spiritualism—the nectar of love and affection for the loving God known as Lord Ram that leads the creature to attainment of eternal peace, bliss, felicity and beatitude—that is present in this holy lake represented by the divine story of Lord Ram is reached by coming close to it step by step, and finally taking a dip in it. This is symbolically depicted in the form of the ‘seven Chapters or Kands’ of the holy book ‘Ram Charit Manas’.

It is believed that Tulsidas had used the word ‘Sopaan’, meaning ‘a step’, to name the seven chapters of the book. The word ‘Kand’, on the other hand, means a section or division. It was preferred because the story was divided into seven chapters based on the general geographical area where a particular set of main events of the story unfolded.

For instance, the first Chapter is called 'Baal Kand' because it describes the background of the story, the reason why the Supreme Being had to take birth as a human being on earth, the actual birth, the childhood days, and marriage of the Lord like an ordinary human being.

The second Chapter is called 'Ayodhya Kand' as it describes those events in the entire story that have their focal point in the city of Ayodhya, the capital city of the dynasty in which Lord Ram was born.

The third Chapter is called 'Aranya Kand' as it describes the Lord's going to the forest and his stay in it for a prolonged period of time during which he was relatively peaceful before the unfolding of the horrifying events starting from the abduction of Sita, the Lord's wife, that finally culminated in the war of Lanka and the killing of the demons and their king Ravana. The word 'Aranya' means 'forest'. It was a dense forest, and it was here that Sita was abducted by Ravana. This area of the forest was unique in the sense that while on the one hand great sages and hermits lived here to do austerities and penances, and on the other hand it was infested by cruel demons, vampires and ogres.

The fourth Chapter is called 'Kiskindha Kand' as it describes those events that took place in the general geographical area in the south of the country that was known as Kiskindha. This was the kingdom of the monkey race. Here Lord Ram befriended the monkey race who helped him in the next phase of the story.

The fifth Chapter breaks from this general trend of naming the chapters according to the general place or the geography of the area where those developments that are narrated in a particular Kand took place. This Chapter is called 'Sundar Kand'. The word 'Sundar' in Hindi usually means something that is beautiful, good to hear and look at, or charming. Ironically, when we read the contents of this Chapter, we find there is nothing 'beautiful' in it, because here the violence of war starts, and the golden and magnificent city of Lanka was burnt and reduced to a smouldering hulk by Hanuman. Therefore, what is so 'beautiful' and 'charming' in this episode?

Well, there are many interpretations. We shall discuss them in detail when we come to read this Chapter later on. But briefly, the most prominent ones are these:

First, Sita was discovered in this Chapter, and this marked the turning point in the landscape of hopelessness, depression, misery and dejection that stared in the face of Lord Ram, for prior to this Chapter the Lord had failed to get any hint of his lost wife, and obviously he was overcome with profound sadness. This news that Sita has been found, and that a single messenger of the Lord, i.e. Hanuman, had wreaked havoc on the demon army during his confrontation with it inside Lanka, indicating that when the whole army of monkeys and bears, which Lord Ram planned to assemble, brings its might to bear on the demon army of Lanka, then surely the latter will stand no chance against the former, which implied victory for the Lord. These two developments were welcome news and encouraging for all, like the ray of sunlight breaking through dark clouds of gloom and doomsday.

The second reason for naming this Kand as 'Sundar' is remarkable as much as it is little known: The demon kingdom of Lanka was situated on a great mountain named 'Trikoat', a mountain with three summits. [Tri = three.] Sita was held captive in a garden on the third summit of this sprawling mountain-complex. This garden was the 'pleasure garden' of the kings of the demon race, and was 'beautifully' laid out and 'pleasing' for the senses. Hence, this summit was called 'Sundar': pleasing, beautiful and charming. The action described in this fifth Chapter took place here; so naturally this Chapter was named 'Sundar' in line with the naming of the rest of the Chapters of the book, which is according to the general geographical area where the major part of the developments narrated in a particular Kand took place.

The sixth Chapter is called 'Lanka Kand' obviously because it describes the war of Lanka and the conquest of the demons by the Lord. The entire episode described in this Chapter occurred in Lanka, so the naming is appropriate.

And finally, the last Chapter, the seventh one, is called 'Uttar Kand'; it is the concluding Chapter of this book. The naming of this Chapter has the following reasons:

One, Lord Ram would proceed to his capital of Ayodhya from Lanka, and Ayodhya was located in the 'northern direction', i.e. the 'Uttar' direction from Lanka. Two, this Chapter is rich in metaphysical and spiritual content, because here we read about Lord Ram giving discourses and answering questions asked by some of those who were close to him. We also find that the entire second half of this Chapter is dedicated to a discourse between the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and Garud, the heavenly mount of Lord Vishnu, who had come to the former for spiritual guidance. This particular discussion is exceptionally enlightening and contains profound spiritual and metaphysical knowledge explained in a simple language, with great stress being laid on the importance of the virtues of Bhakti (devotion for Lord God) and its infallible ability to grant spiritual bliss and beatitude to a seeker.

Hence, this last Chapter is almost like the Upanishads, and it marks the culmination of a seeker's quest for spiritual knowledge. It marks that phase in life when a person would turn away from the material world and head towards the Lord. It is his symbolic journey to the higher plane of existence, the 'northward' journey to an exalted life as opposed to the southward journey to a lower level of existence, i.e. a movement in the 'Uttar direction'.

Three, since this book is not a usual story of some great king named Ram, but a holy book dedicated to the Supreme Being, it assumes a place of honour and is entitled for reverence and glory that scriptures deserve. And it is a tradition that the last part or canto of any ancient scripture is called 'Uttar', just like its beginning is called 'Purva'.

Four, the seventh Chapter is called 'Uttar Kand' also because it 'answers' ('Uttar') all the spiritual queries related to different aspects of Lord Ram's story that a seeker may have. Indeed, the very purpose of including the discourse between Kaagbhusund and Garud in this Kand is to answer an aspirant's questions regarding any doubts that he may have vis-à-vis the Story of Lord Ram.

So we see that these are some of the reasons why the seventh Chapter is named 'Uttar Kand'.

There is yet another way of interpreting the 'seven chapters' of the Ram Charit Manas. They represent the seven divine 'Puris' or abodes which are regarded as great pilgrim centers in Hinduism. These seven cities and their symbolic representation in the seven Kandas of the book is as follows—

(1) Baal Kand represents Ayodhya Puri (because it is in this city that the Supreme Being came down to be born as Lord Ram).

(2) Ayodhya Kand represents Mathura Puri (where Lord Krishna's maternal uncle Kansha had ruled; the parallel is used because in both the cases of Lord Ram and Lord Krishna these cities caused immense problems for them created by their respective rulers).

(3) Aranya Kand represents Maya Puri (because the word 'Maya' means 'mystical and magical powers', and it symbolizes the forest where lived great mystics and sages who had mystical powers, as well as demons etc. who had magical abilities to assume any form they wanted).

(4) Kiskindha Kand represents Kashi Puri (which is the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva, and the parallel with this Kand is because Lord Ram met Hanuman, who is regarded as a manifestation of Rudra, one of the forms of Lord Shiva, here in this Kand).

(5) Sundar Kand represents Kanchi Puri (in the south of India, and the symbolism is due to fact that Lord Ram had headed straight to the southern tip of India in order to cross the ocean and reach Lanka as narrated in this Kand).

(6) Lanka Kand represents Havantika Puri (which got its name from an ancient warrior race known as 'Haihayas'; the parallel is due to the fact that the demon race that lived in Lanka was also a very brave and strong warrior class).

(7) Uttar Kand represents Dwarka Puri (where Lord Krishna ruled in the last phase of his life; the parallel is due to the fact that both Lord Ram and Lord Krishna were incarnations of Lord Vishnu, and both had ruled from Ayodhya and Dwarka during the last phase of their lives on earth).

Ram Charit Manas as a 'Lake, a Pond, or a Step-well':

Now, let us examine the visualization of Ram Charit Manas as a great lake or a pond or a step-well.

(A) Any well-designed and laid-out lake or pond would have four sides. This "divine lake of Lord Ram's story" also has four sides. These are the following—

(1) North Side—this is represented by the divine discourse of the saint crow Kaagbhushund that was given to Garud in the holy book's Uttar Kand. It should be noted that the Hindi word 'Uttar' also means 'north' in English.

(2) East Side—this is represented by the divine story as told by the Guru to Tulsidas, or by Tulsidas telling us. The eastern direction is from where the sun rises. It is used as a metaphor for rising of knowledge and wisdom that will dispel the gloom and darkness of ignorance just like the sun removes the darkness of the night when it rises. Lord Ram's birth in this world is also compared to the rising of the sun in the east. Hence the use of this symbolism to depict the East Side of the lake.

(3) South Side—this is represented by the divine discourse of sage Yagyawalkya for the benefit of sage Bharadwaj. This was the first time that the divine story was narrated for use by the common human being—because sage Bharadwaj used to live in Prayag, also known as Triveni as it is the confluence of three holy rivers, where large number of saints assembled during annual religious functions and heard discourses and discussion on the scriptures. The 'south' direction is symbolic of the earth because the word 'south' also means 'downward direction' when seen from the sky or the heaven.

(4) West Side—this is represented by the discourse between Lord Shiva and Parvati. Lord Shiva is the concluder of creation, and he gives liberation and deliverance to the soul of the dying man by uttering the holy name of Lord Ram in his ears just before he breathes his last. The sun sets in the west symbolizing death or the end of life. The patron god of death is Lord Shiva, and he also provides spiritual liberation and deliverance to the creature by imparting wisdom and true knowledge to him. Both these functions are incorporated in this depiction of the west side of the lake as it indicates that—(i) after having heard the full story of Lord Ram, the ground is sufficiently prepared for the listener to find liberation and deliverance for his soul, and (ii) he turns away from the world and renounces its illusionary attractions, turning instead towards his inner self—which means that as far as the external world is concerned it is dark for him, and the world itself begins to treat him as being good as dead.

(B) There is yet another way of looking at this symbolic lake called 'Ram Charit Manas'. It is like a step-well or a lake or a pond that is full of ambrosia for the soul. It is surrounded by an exceptionally charming garden, with green flowering trees, verdant soft carpet of grass, cool shades and alcoves, chirping birds hopping around gleefully, and a general environment conducive to peace, tranquility, joy and delight. No matter how troubled a person is, if he enters this garden and goes down the lake to drink its sweet water, there is no trace of doubt that he will find rest for himself. As every well-designed step-well or lake or pond has four banks, called the 'Ghats', and each bank would have steps that lead to the water present at the bottom of the steps in the center of the step-well or lake or pond, the seven Kandas or Chapters or Cantos in Ram Charit Manas are like the 'seven steps' that one needs to descend to access the ambrosia stored in the 'center' of this divine and holy story, where the word 'center' refers to the core of the Story, the essence of the Story, the true meaning of the Story, the real spiritual message contained in the Story. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 129; (b) Baal Kand, Doha no. 36—to Doha no. 37]

Now, according to tradition, all ancient step-wells, ponds or lakes—whose water has some mystical abilities and posses some kind of charm that can cure ailments of the afflicted who come to bathe in this water—have a presiding deity and patron saints, so is the case with the symbolic holy lake named Ram Charit Manas which too has its presiding deity and patron saints. Now, who are they?

Well, Lord Shiva is the ‘presiding deity’ in this case, because without his blessings the ambrosia in the form of spiritual bliss that comes with reading, listening to, and narrating the story of Lord Ram as revealed in Ram Charit Manas is not realized fully, and hence the spiritual reward attendant to it, viz. liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation of the creature’s soul, is also elusive. Even Lord Ram has explicitly reiterated this fact—that without worshipping Lord Shiva, a creature cannot please him. [Refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 104; and (ii) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 2 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it.]

That said, now let us see who are the ‘patron saints’ of this glorious lake. There are primarily five of them—the saintly crow Kaagbhusund as well as sage Agasty who presides over the northern side of the lake and its steps; sage Yagyawalkya who presides over the eastern side; sage Bharadwaj the western side; and all other ancient sages, saints, minstrels of the Lord who has sing his divine glories preside over the south side, and one such example relevant for our present purpose is Goswami Tulsidas. Now, how do we come to this conclusion, and from where have we inferred this? The answer is this:

(a) The divine story of Lord Ram as it is narrated in the book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ was first revealed in the Mana (heart and mind) of Lord Shiva, making the latter the ‘Father of this story; the original Creator of this story’. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 35; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128.]

In the heaven, Lord Shiva first revealed it to his consort, goddess Uma or Parvati. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.]

This being the case, Lord Shiva is the patron deity of the lake symbolizing the spiritual nectar in the form of the holy story of Lord Ram that is known as Ram Charit Manas.

(b) The first ‘creature’, a living being, to whom Lord Shiva revealed this story was the crow saint Kaagbhusund*<sup>1</sup>, and the latter had his hermitage high up in the northern mountains where he had once narrated this story to Garud in the ‘Uttar Kand’ of Ram Charit Manas*<sup>2</sup>. The word ‘Uttar’ means ‘north’; it also implies the phase of life when a seeker is ready to accept renunciation and discard his gross body to enable his soul to attain liberation and deliverance from this mundane world. This being the case, sage Kaagbhusund is said to be patron saint of the ‘northern side’ of this glorious lake represented by Ram Charit Manas. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, *<sup>1</sup>Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30; *<sup>2</sup>Baal Kand, Doha no. 120-a; Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 52; Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 62; Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 64.]

An interesting thing is to be noted here: The northern bank of this holy lake has the abode of both Lord Shiva, the presiding deity, as well as Kaagbhusund, the patron saint. How come? Well, there are three primary reasons for it: (a) both have their physical hermitages in the northern mountains, one on Mt. Kailash (Lord Shiva)*<sup>1</sup>, and the other (Kaagbhusund) on Mt. Neel Giri, the blue mountain*<sup>2</sup>; (b) both advise the creature, a spiritual seeker, to develop love and affection for Lord

Ram, to inculcate the virtue of devotion and faith in the Lord, and to surrender oneself to the Lord unconditionally, asking for nothing in return*<sup>3</sup>; and (c) both have heard the story of Ram Charit Manas from each other, first by Kaagbhusund from Lord Shiva, and then by Lord Shiva from Kaagbhusund*<sup>4</sup>! [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) *<sup>1</sup>Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 58; (ii) *<sup>2</sup>Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 62; (iii) *<sup>3</sup>Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 115—to Doha no. 129; (iv) *<sup>4</sup>Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30; and Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Doha no. 57.]

Another great sage from whom Lord Shiva had heard the story of Ram Charit Manas was sage Agastya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

So we can deduce that both the sages, i.e. Kaagbhusund as well as Agstya, were highly blessed souls inasmuch as that Lord Shiva deemed them to be qualified enough to narrate the story of Lord Ram with all its fineness and spiritual nuances that would appeal to him.

Therefore, the presiding saints of the 'north bank' of this symbolic holy lake known as Ram Charit Manas would be sages Kaagbhusund and Agastya both, because both of them had Lord Shiva as their audience at one point of time or another.

(c) Next comes sage Yagyawalkya. He was the greatest spiritual wise-man of his time. Sage Yagyawalkya heard the story of Ram Charit Manas from Kaagbhusund*. Since Kaagbhusund had the body of a 'crow', it is but natural that he must have narrated the story of Lord Ram to sage Yagyawalkya as a crow would speak. This great sage Yagyawalkya obviously had the ability to understand the language of birds, for he clearly grasped what Kaagbhusund had to say. So the first 'human being' who heard the divine story of Ram Charit Manas was sage Yagyawalkya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

It was from Yagyawalkya, therefore, that the glorious story of Lord Ram, as narrated in the form of Ram Charit Manas, came to be known to the world in the human tongue, in a language that the human race would easily comprehend. It was, to speak metaphorically, the dawn of a new day of hope and salvation; it was like the rising of a new splendorous sun symbolizing all the sublime spiritual virtues enshrined in the divine story of Ram Charit Manas that would have the potential to remove the darkness of spiritual delusions in the world; and like a sun, the Ram Charit Manas shewed its light over the world and helped those who were till now groping in the dark to find their path leading to bliss and happiness of the soul.

Since the sun rises in the eastern direction to remove the darkness of the night, Yagyawalkya was therefore commended for his stellar contribution to remove spiritual darkness of the human race by showing the light of spiritual wisdom via the story of Ram Charit Manas, and was thus honoured with the title of being the patron saint of the eastern bank of the symbolic lake known as Ram Charit Manas.

(d) From Yagyawalkya, the story was first heard by sage Bharadwaj in a private audience at the latter's hermitage in a holy place known as Prayag. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Doha no. 47.]

Once again, an interesting point is to be noted here. In Ram Charit Manas, the names of both these two great sages, i.e. Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj, have been mentioned in a single line side by side; first being Yagyawalkya, and then Bharadwaj. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

What is the intent? Well, the saintly poet Tulsidas implies that both these great sages have equal status, both are to be equally honoured, both are like the two ends of a horizontal line. To wit, if Yagyawalkya is to be honoured as the patron saint of the eastern bank of the holy lake symbolising Ram Charit Manas, then sage Bharadwaj occupies the opposite side of the same lake, with equal honour and dignity. So therefore, it can be safely said that the ‘west bank’ of this holy lake has sage Bharadwaj as its patron saint.

(e) The ‘north bank’ is metaphorically the most exalted and holy as it is presided over by Lord Shiva, the Great God, as well as by two exalted sages Kaagbhushund and Agastya.

The ‘east bank’ and the ‘west bank’ have sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj as their patron saints respectively.

Now we have the ‘south bank’ left. The saints and minstrels of Lord Ram who sang the Lord’s glories and divine stories in their own ways are the patron saints of this bank. In the context of Ram Charit Manas, however, it is the saintly poet Goswami Tulsidas and his Guru (teacher) who we can regard as the patron saints of the south bank of the holy lake. The reason is obvious: Had it not been for Tulsidas or his Guru, we would not have had this beautiful story of Ram Charit Manas with us in the first place; so they deserve being honoured for this noble contribution towards spiritual happiness and bliss that one gets by reading, listening to and narrating this holy story.

The Story of Śrī Rāma Carita Mānasa in Brief

A Brief Outline of the Divine Story of Ram Charit Manas

The story of Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being whose cosmic form is universally known as Lord Vishnu, was conceived in the heart of Lord Shiva. When his divine consort goddess Parvati requested him to narrate it to her, Shiva revealed this story to her with the aim that it would benefit the rest of the world.

But like the Lord, his story as narrated in this classic ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is also so full of mysteries. Many reasons are cited as to why Lord Vishnu had to descend to the mortal world in the form of Lord Ram, and then behaved like an ordinary human being, undergoing the travails of life on this earth like ordinary humans, instead of revealing his supernatural powers by some overt act that would indicate who Lord Ram actually was, except in such a subtle way that only a few realized and wise souls could decipher the meaning of the Lord’s seemingly ordinary deeds and unravel the secret behind them. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 33 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it.]

The story of Ram Charit Manas is also known as the famous epic ‘The Ramayana’—because it narrates the story of Lord Ram and the deeds that the Lord did during his lifetime on earth.

The story of Ram Charit Manas is so-called because it has its genesis in the Mana (mind and heart) of a great devotee of Lord Ram, who was none other but Lord Shiva, while the latter was meditating and contemplating (i.e. doing Yoga and Dhyan) on his revered deity, Lord Ram. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 9 and 11 that precede Doha no. 35; (iii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128.]

For this purpose, Lord Shiva employed the holy name of Lord Ram, i.e. the word ‘Ram’ (pronounced as Raam), as a Mantra (a spiritual formula) to concentrate his mind as well as to purify his heart*, much like a scientist who would use some specific formula for his experiment that is aimed at proving some singularly remarkable theory the truth of which he is convinced of, and the result of this experiment is that he gifts the world with a spectacular discovery. [*Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precede Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 58.]

After conceiving it in his Mana, Lord Shiva had first revealed it to his consort, goddess Uma or Parvati. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35; Doha no. 47.]

Lord Shiva felt that such a gem of spiritualism as contained in the story of Lord Ram that was revealed in his Mana, and which had bestowed immense ecstasy to him, should be employed for the welfare of all living beings. So he disclosed the story of Ram Charit Manas to the saintly crow Kaagbhusund. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

From Kaagbhusund, the story came to the exalted sage Yagyawalkya, and from the latter to sage Bharadwaj. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

Further, from sage Bharadwaj the divine story spread to other great sages and saints who heard it being narrated by him during religious congregations in his hermitage. In this way, in due course of time, Tulsidas came to hear it from his Guru, and then he himself wrote the version which we now read as Ram Charit Manas. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30 along with Chaupai line no. 6-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it.]

Besides this, we also learn that Lord Shiva had heard this story from sage Agastya when he visited the latter's hermitage. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 48.]

So therefore, we have four sources of this story—one is Lord Shiva who is the Father and the Creator of this divine story; the second is Kaagbhusund, the saintly crow; the third is sage Yagyawalkya; and the fourth is sage Agastya.

An Outline of the Story of Ram Charit Manas:

The epic 'Ram Charit Manas' is divided into Seven Chapters or Cantos, called 'Kandas'. They are: (1) Baal Kand, (2) Ayodhya Kand, (3) Aranya Kand, (4) Kiskindha Kand, (5) Sundar Kand, (6) Lanka Kand, and (7) Uttar Kand.

Each Kanda of the story pertains to a particular phase in the life of Lord Ram, and narrates all the events associated with that phase. The naming of the Kandas also indicates which phase or time of life of Lord Ram it is dealing with. For instance, the first Chapter is called 'Baal Kand', and since the word 'Baal' refers to a young boy, this Kanda describes all the events that occurred in the life of Lord Ram till he attained adulthood, right from the time the Lord was born as a prince in the kingdom of Ayodhya, till the point of time he got married and returned home with his wife Sita.

The word ‘Kand’ also refers to a Chapter or a Canto of a book which is a narrative of a long story. Hence, the Kanda describes a set of events or episodes that occurred during a particular period of time in this story.

We shall learn more on this aspect as we move along with our reading.

(1) Baal Kand:

The first Chapter is called ‘Baal Kand’ as it centers on the period of time in the life of Lord Ram that pertained to his birth, infancy, and teens; in essence, this Chapter deals with the first phase in the life of Lord Ram.

Since the ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is a book that describes the divine story of Lord Ram, and in order to make this story comprehensive and complete, its author Goswami Tulsidas chose to include certain details in the very beginning of this Kanda, before he actually starts the narration of the story of Lord Ram, so that the reader becomes aware of many facts and details at the very commencement of his reading as would help him to understand better, and in the right context, many developments and events that would, by-and-by, unfold during the course of his reading.

This information would enlighten the reader about the background of the story and the events that were responsible for Lord Vishnu feeling obliged to come down to the mortal world in a human form as Lord Ram. It would also clarify some crucial points in the very beginning of the reading of the rest of the book, as it would help not only to remove future doubts but also act as a foundation upon which a structure can be built to give the magnificent story its wonderful outer contours, as well as to fill all the finer inner details, making the entire edifice, when completed, worthy of approbation. If this is not done in the very beginning, then there would be a good chance that the reader, whether a casual reader or someone who reads this story attentively to delve deeper into its many mysteries and seeks answers for them, would be confused and distracted.

Therefore, to give effect to this scheme, Baal Kand can be said to have been divided into the following four sections:

(a) The first section of Baal Kand describes the importance and significance of the Ram Charit Manas, as well as of the holy name of Lord Ram, to stress the most important aspect of this book, which is that it is not some book that chronicles the life and time of a great king of some great kingdom, but a holy book entirely devoted to an incarnation of the Supreme Being himself, who was so kind and gracious as to come down and live amongst ordinary creatures of this mortal world as Lord Ram, in a way that would make others feel that the Supreme Lord was one like them and very much accessible, and not one who is beyond reach for them. Ram Charit Manas served a great spiritual purpose as it bridged the great abyss that existed betwixt the ordinary living being in this mortal world and the Supreme Being, for this divine story of Lord Ram brought the creature very close to the Lord by showing the former the way to the latter.

(b) The second section deals with the genesis of the story and the many reasons why Lord Vishnu, the cosmic form of the Supreme Being, descended to earth to assume a human form and take birth as Lord Ram. These details are necessary as they would help explain many of the things that happened in the course of Lord Ram's life which otherwise would seem odd, mysterious, and remain unexplained.

(c) The next section is where we read some events in detail: such as the story of the marriage of Lord Shiva with Uma or Parvati; the story of sage Narad's delusions that made him wish to marry in spite of the fact that he was a celestial sage who had renounced all worldly attractions; the story of king Pratapbhanu and how he was the one who became the dreaded demon king Ravana in his next life because of his greed for power and eternity; and how Lord Vishnu promised mother earth and the gods that he would come down to earth in the form of Lord Ram to eliminate the evil demons who were creating horrors in this world.

(d) Then, in the fourth section, we start with the actual narration of the story of Lord Ram himself: for we read about the birth of four brothers, Lord Ram, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan, in royal household of king Dasrath of Ayodhya; the Lord's childhood days, his going to protect the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, from where he and his younger brother Laxman went to attend the bow-breaking ceremony held in the kingdom of Janakpur; there Lord Ram won great fame and a name for himself by breaking the stern bow that none of the greatest kings and princes of that time could break. This success was rewarded by his marrying Sita, the daughter of king Janak; in due course, all the brothers of Lord Ram were also married at the same venue. The Baal Kand ends with the marriage party of the four brothers returning to home to their capital city of Ayodhya from the brides' kingdom in Janakpur.

That said, let us pause for a while and read some interesting points pertaining to the Baal Kand. The earth was tormented interminably by the tyrannical and cruel demons. The demons were like the Devil and the Satan; they derived pleasure when other suffered. The sages, saints and hermits of the period took the earth, which had transformed itself as a cow, along and went to the abode of the creator Brahma in heaven to ask the latter to do something to save them all. The creator told them that it is beyond his means, and it is only the Supreme Being known as Vishnu who can provide a solution.

But now the question arose where to exactly find Vishnu as he is formless, invisible, and without any name and specific abode, as he is the all-pervading Supreme Lord of creation. It was decided that they should all approach Lord Shiva because he is the wisest God and will be the proper advisor.

When the group approached Lord Shiva and asked him the way the Supreme Lord can be found, Shiva replied that there is nowhere that the Lord is not present. What one needs are devotion, conviction, faith and love. So the sages, hermits, earth and Brahma together prayed to the Lord to help them and protect them. The Supreme Lord Vishnu revealed himself and assured them that he would come down personally on the earth as a human in the form of Lord Ram, and liberate earth from the burden of the cruel demons. The magnificent bonus of this incarnation would be that the many sages and hermits and ascetics and saints who had been doing long penances and had been longing to have a first-hand communion with the Supreme Being would also get an opportunity to fulfill their cherished lifetime desires.

The creator Brahma meanwhile asked all the Gods to reveal themselves as monkeys and bears to help the Lord during his sojourn on earth as Lord Ram. After all, Lord Ram was taking the trouble of undergoing all the trials and tribulations incumbent to taking birth in this mortal world as a human being, so the gods should also chip in to do their bit to help the Lord.

Now some very pertinent question arise—(a) why did the Supreme Being, who is able to do anything by his mere wish, have to become a human when he could have simply killed the demons, the devils and the Satan by merely wishing so, and (b) why did he need the help of the monkeys and bears?

There are many answers to these questions, but here I shall give some of the prominent ones. First, the demon king known as Ravana had done severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to please the creator and become immortal. When the creator told him that all those who have taken birth must die some or the other day, giving his own example that his life span is also fixed though it is exceptionally long in the term of mortal creatures of the world, and so it is impossible to become immortal, Ravana asked him to grant immunity from death except at the hands of humans and monkeys. This is because he thought that if the Gods and Goddesses who were so powerful would not be able to kill him, what will the frightened and humble man and a monkey do to him. So this was the loop-hole that had to be exploited if Ravana was to be killed.

Second is that the Lord wished to show by his own example that even humans and the humble monkeys can achieve stupendous objectives and do fantastic deeds if they have the will and the determination.

Third, the Lord also wished to show by his example what sort of righteous and morally correct life one should lead amidst all the adversities and provocations in this world, and how to deal with myriad situations that a man faces in his life.

Fourth, he wished to give a message that one should not treat others with contempt because they are low down in the evolutionary ladder, because the Lord himself loved the monkeys and the bears who had helped him in all possible ways when no human being came forward to do so.

Fifth reason was that he wished to convey a message that if a soul, no matter how exalted and noble, has become a human being or has entered the body of a human being, then he is bound to have some shortcomings and drawbacks and limitations, but the trick is not to let them come in one's way of being scrupulous, righteous, noble, correct, truthful, holy and pious. This is the reason why the Supreme Being acted like an ordinary man and went through all the throes of sufferings, pleasures, pains and elations like any one of them—but still standing tall like a colossus in the human race and remembered for generations after generations while the rest of the race vanished into thin air. Therefore, if one makes a mistake, it is better not to brood and weep over it but to take positive and constructive steps to rectify the mistake and undo the past by changing one's future course of action.

And finally, the sixth reason was that the Lord wished to tell the human race, especially those who were proud of their knowledge, wisdom and expertise in certain fields, that such grand virtues and qualities were not their exclusive domain or prerogative because there were amongst the monkeys and bears such individuals who were matchless in wisdom, knowledge and expertise in technical matters. For instance we have Hanuman whose level of knowledge of the scriptures and language, wisdom, spiritual enlightenment and self-realisation was unmatched in this creation. Then there were the two monkeys who had built the bridge across the ocean, named Nal and Neel, and the old bear king Jamvant who was always consulted in matters that required an old man's experienced feedback.

Not only that, even the most reviled and abhorred king of demons, Ravana, whose physical body was an embodiment of all that is considered evil and sinful, had a noble soul hidden within this same body, a soul so spiritually evolved that Lord Ram allowed it to enter his own body and merge with his own supreme Self at the time of Ravana's death, a feat that even the greatest of ascetics and hermits could not achieve, thus proving that what is seen is often very misleading, and the truth lies somewhere else.

The story of the Lord's earthly or worldly sojourn is ripe with and full of instances from which one can learn so many practical things of life, but that is not the subject matter to be discussed presently.

So it was that the Supreme Being known as Lord Vishnu in his cosmic form revealed himself as a human being in the form of Lord Ram. The divine consort of Vishnu became Lord Ram's wife Sita. The close associates of Vishnu became Lord Ram's three brothers named Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan.

In some early time there was a king named Manu and his wife Satrupa. They had done severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to worship the Supreme Lord. When the Lord was pleased by their sincerity and commitment, he revealed himself before them. Asked for some boon as a reward, the pious couple desired to have the Lord as their son. So this was the excuse Lord Vishnu found to become their son in his incarnation of Lord Ram in order to kill the demons and free the earth and its inhabitants from the cruelty and tyranny that these devils had been perpetrating.

Manu, in due course of time, became king Dasrath, and Satrupa became his chief queen Kaushalya. The king had two other queens named Kaikeyi and Sumitra. The king had no son though he was very righteous and noble and a diligent follower of the laws of Dharma (righteousness, probity, propriety and nobility in thought and conduct) and Satya (truthfulness). So one day he approached his Guru (royal priest and moral preceptor) named sage Vasistha to find a solution to his predicament. The sage advised him to hold a fire sacrifice and make sage Atri as the chief priest for it, because this sage was an expert in performing such sacrifices.

The fire sacrifice was successful, and the Fire God appeared from the fire pit with a bowl of sweet pudding. He asked the king to distribute it to his queens, and they will get sons as desired by him. The king was exceedingly pleased, and did as instructed.

So on an auspicious day, the Supreme Being known as Lord Vishnu manifested as the son of Kaushalya, and eventually he came to be known as Lord Ram. Lord Vishnu's other fractions became the three brothers of Ram, and they were named Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan by sage Vasistha. On the occasion of their birth there was not only a great celebration in the city of Ayodhya, the capital of Dasrath, which lasted for a month, but even in the heavens and the rest of the places of the earth as well wherever sages and hermits came to hear this wonderful news.

The children grew amid much love and joy. They were taught in all the arts and crafts befitting princes by their learned teacher, Guru Vasistha. They made their parents, the members of the royal household staff, the citizens of Ayodhya and the Gods in the heaven very happy by their childhood deeds and pranks. The days passed on so happily and enjoyably that no one knew when it was day and when it was night, or which day of the week or month it was.

By-and-by, the four divine brothers reached their teens. Around this time, another great sage named Vishwamitra was being persistently tormented by the demons who would defile his fire sacrifice. The sage decided to bring Lord Ram to get rid of this thorn in the form of demons, because he thought that after all this was the precise reason why the Supreme Being had taken the trouble to become a human.

Sage Vishwamitra came to Ayodhya and requested king Dasrath to send Ram and Laxman with him. The king was initially reluctant because he was worried for the safety of his sons, but his Guru sage Vasistha explained him the reality and assured him that no harm would come to the boys. So Lord Ram and Laxman accompanied sage Vishwamitra and went to his hermitage.

On the way the Lord performed two miraculous deeds—one was to kill the demoness named Tadka who attacked them, and the other was to provide liberation to Ahilya, the chaste wife of sage Gautam, who had been turned into a stone due to some curse. The Lord touched the stone and this touch of his holy feet freed Ahilya of her curse.

It must be noted in this context that all the demons who were killed by the Lord were provided liberation and deliverance from their sinful bodies. This is because the truthful identity of any individual is not his physical body but his soul known as the Atma. This soul gets trapped in a body due to some reason, and when this body is shed the soul is liberated from its fetters. Usually the body of the demon, by the force of habit and inherent nature, forced these individual souls to go on committing more and more sins in an endless cycle, thereby preventing their liberation and deliverance. But when the Lord killed these demons, their souls invariably found liberation and went to heaven.

When the demons, led by Marich, attacked the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra the next morning of the Lord's arrival there, he was hit by a headless arrow by the Lord and flung far away into the middle of the ocean. The rest of the demons who participated in the attack were slayed by Lord Ram and his brother Laxman.

Then news came that king Janak is holding a marriage ceremony for his daughter named Sita, and in it the condition laid down by the king was that anyone who would lift and string a formidable bow of Lord Shiva, that the king had in his possession for safekeeping for a long time, would become eligible to marry his daughter. Sage Vishwamitra took the two brothers Ram and Laxman and went to attend this ceremony. There, when all the assembled kings and princes failed to move the bow even an inch, Lord Ram not only lifted and stringed the bow but also broke it. This culminated in his marriage with Sita. The other three brothers were also married at the same venue, Laxman to Sita's sister, and the other two brothers, Bharat and Shatrughan, to Sita's two cousins who were daughters of king Janak's younger brother.

The Baal Kand ends with the arrival of the marriage party back to Ayodhya.

(2) Ayodhya Kand:

The second Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas is called 'Ayodhya Kand'. It relates all those events in the story that happened in the next phase in the life of Lord Ram's earthly life after his marriage, and since these events occurred in Ayodhya, the capital of the great kingdom of the same name, the Kanda is named after this city as 'Ayodhya Kand'.

The Ayodhya Kand can be divided into three broad segments as follows:

(a) The first segment describes those sad and unfortunate developments that happened in Ayodhya after Lord Ram and his three brothers returned home following their marriage, till the point of time when he had to leave the city and go to the forest for fourteen years along with his wife Sita and his younger brother Laxman.

This is a crucial juncture in the story of the Ramayana, it is the turning point in it, for had these unfortunate developments not taken place and Lord Ram hadn't gone to the forest, then we would not have had famed story of the 'Ramayana' at all, for then Lord Ram would have been one other prince who would in due course of time ascend the throne of Ayodhya to become a great king just like others in his illustrious family which had a long list of noble kings noted for their exemplary character and virtues, a family renowned the world over as the 'Ikswaku dynasty', or the family of the illustrious king Raghu and his descendants.

Now, that said, from a merely worldly perspective the reason why Lord Ram had to go to the forest along with his wife Sita and brother Laxman seems to be palace intrigue and family feud and greed for the crown of Ayodhya, wherein his step-mother Kaikeyi, who wanted her own son Bharat to get the crown of Ayodhya, and to prevent the eldest of the four brothers, i.e. Lord Ram, who had the right to the throne by the virtue of the ancient and well-established tradition of the eldest son of a king inheriting the crown, from creating any hurdles, she designed a crooked scheme, under the influence of greed and selfishness, by which Lord Ram would be exiled from Ayodhya for fourteen long years while Bharat ascended the throne and tightened his grip over the kingdom during this period, so that when the time of Lord Ram's return came, Bharat would be in a position to stoutly stop him from claiming the crown, even if it meant a war and fratricidal bloodshed.

But that is what is seen externally as the overt reason for Lord Ram's going to the forest. The real and true reason lies elsewhere. Lord Vishnu had promised mother earth and the gods that he would come down in a human form as Lord Ram to eliminate the cruel demon race which had, under its ferocious king named Ravana, unleashed a reign of terror and mayhem in the world. And therefore it was necessary for Lord Ram to leave Ayodhya and go to Ravana's kingdom in the far-off island country of Lanka to fulfill that promise. This was simply not possible if the Lord didn't leave Ayodhya.

Further, it was necessary to keep Lord Ram's true identity secret and hidden from Ravana, for had he known that Ram was none but Lord Vishnu who had come to get rid of him and his demon race, then it was sure Ravana would have either hidden himself somewhere where a human being cannot reach, or he would have surrendered himself before Lord Ram and sought mercy, in which case the Lord would have been obliged to grant him forgiveness and grace, because the Lord had a reputation for being exemplarily merciful, kind, compassionate, benevolent and magnanimous so much so that if the greatest of sinners came to him begging for mercy and forgiveness, the Lord couldn't, and wouldn't, refuse. In case that happened, the very purpose of Lord Vishnu coming down to earth as Lord Ram would have been defeated. And, given Ravana's inherent crooked nature and cunning character, it was equally sure that he would have lain low for a while till the things cooled down a bit, after which he would have unleashed his fury with a vengeance upon both the helpless creatures of earth as well as the gods of heaven. What would have happened then?

Hence, it was the need of the hour for Lord Ram to maintain secrecy about his mission; the Lord had to keep his identity and the purpose of going to the forest on his way to Lanka to eliminate the scourge of the evil demons under wraps, and towards this end it was necessary that Lord Ram proceeded to the forest quietly as if an ordinary prince had got entangled in a nasty family quarrel, as a result of which he was banished by his father at the behest of his favourite queen, the step-mother of Lord Ram.

There was one other prime but subtle reason for Lord Ram walking through the forest in order to reach Lanka to eliminate the cruel and evil demon race, for if the main reason of going to the forest was elimination of Ravana and his demon hordes, it could have been done also by declaring an open war on the demons and employing the might of the army of Ayodhya to crush the demon army. So then, what was the 'other subtle reason' for Lord Ram slowly walking to Lanka? It is this: Lord Ram wished to grant his divine grace and blessings on countless ordinary creatures of all denominations on this earth, to bless the numerous sages, hermits, ascetics and holy men and women who had been doing Tapa (penances and austerities) with the hope that one day they would get a chance to meet the Supreme Being and be blessed by the Lord, as well as to lay the foundation for a holy and divine story that would help countless other creatures who could not personally meet the Lord and be rewarded by the fruit of his grace, to derive the same spiritual reward by listening to it, by narrating it, and by singing it in the future, for all times to come. The 'story' of the Ramayana thus created would benefit endless numbers of creatures in the world and help them attain spiritual peace and solace, that would have not been possible had Lord Ram vanquished the demon race in the conventional way of one kingdom declaring an open war on another kingdom.

(b) The second segment narrates in vivid detail Lord Ram's journey to the forest, how he and Sita as well as Laxman left the city, how everyone who met the Lord along the way were greatly affected emotionally, how sympathy, love and affection for him overwhelmed one and all, how he met and befriended people by his courteous manners and good nature, about his famed meeting with the boatman and his interactions with great sages Bharadwaj and Valmiki, till the point of time when Lord Ram made Chitrakoot, a verdant part of the forest with by mountains and rivers, as his abode for some time, before moving on into the deeper recesses of the forest.

This section assumes special significance in the light of what has just been said above regarding the reason of Lord Ram going to the forest on foot. To wit, Lord Ram's travels through the land passing through villages and hamlets and remote places where he met humble people on the way and granted them all his grace and blessings, has been a source of great spiritual joy and a fountainhead of devotional emotions that spring forth when one reads about them, for this narration has the potential to provide peace and bliss to countless generations down the ages.

(c) The third segment describes what happened in Ayodhya after Lord Ram left it and went to the forest. It narrates the story of how king Dasrath died due to grief at separation from Lord Ram, of refusal of Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, to accept the crown as his evil and selfish mother Kaikeyi had wished him to do, and for which she had scripted the design whereby Lord Ram had to go to the forest, of Bharat showing an exemplary character and setting a stellar example of noble virtues and behaviour by going to the forest with all his family members, a large retinue of ministers, courtiers, attendants, senior principle citizens, as well as his guru, to try and bring Lord Ram back to Ayodhya, of the emotional meeting and a detailed and extended conference that was held at Chitrakoot betwixt the two brothers, of Lord Ram's polite refusal to return home because of certain obligations that he had to fulfill, but at the same time assuring Bharat that he loves him immensely and there is no question of having any hard-feeling in his heart, of Lord Ram finally convincing Bharat to return home to Ayodhya with the Lord's wooden sandals as a token of the latter's presence there. This Kand ends with Bharat's reverentially putting Lord Ram's sandals on the throne of Ayodhya as a token of the Lord's personal presence, and himself retiring to a secluded place on the outskirts of the city to live like a hermit, the way Lord Ram lived in the forest, for the entire period of the Lord's forest sojourn and absence from Ayodhya.

That said, let us now briefly have an overview of the events of Ayodhya Kand.

King Dasrath was getting old, and he was eager to anoint his eldest son Lord Ram as the prince-regent and the heir-apparent of the kingdom. He approached his Guru sage Vasistha with his wish, and got a green signal from him. Preparations started in Ayodhya for the grand anointment ceremony. But the Lord had come down to earth not to enjoy the life of a prosperous kingdom but to eliminate the demons and free the earth of its burden, as also to give the numerous sages and hermits living in far flung parts of the realm the privilege of his divine view, known as 'Darshan'. So something must be done. The Gods became upset that if the Lord gets the crown then he would not be able to go the forest and fight the demons like an ordinary human, and the very purpose of his incarnation would be nullified. So they devised a stratagem by which the goddess of wisdom known as Saraswati corrupted the mind of Manthara, a maidservant and a close confidante of Kaikeyi, one of the queens of Dasrath and the mother of Bharat.

Manthara became jealous that Ram would become a king, and she instigated Kaikeyi saying that if this happens then she would have to live like an ordinary royal instead of like a queen, and Bharat would have to live like an ordinary courtier, obeying the orders of the king Ram. So what must be done, asked Kaikeyi. Manthara advised her that she had two pending vows or promises with king Dasrath, and she should invoke them now and redeem herself. She must ask the king to appoint Bharat on the throne as a fulfillment of the first promise, and send Ram to the forest for 14 years as the fulfillment of the second promise.

So it happened that the righteous king was trapped. He did not wish to renege on his own promises as this was absolutely sinful and regarded as unethical and sacrilegious for a truthful man who had spent his lifetime upholding the principles of Dharma. So Lord Ram was exiled to the forest for the next 14 years. Though Kaikeyi had asked only Lord Ram be sent to the forest, but when his wife Sita and his brother Laxman came to know about these developments they also decided to accompany him.

Lord Ram left the city on foot along with Sita and Laxman. King Dasrath was heart-broken and he wept bitterly as never before. The city was thrown into turmoil, and the condition of the citizens of Ayodhya was no better—they could not bear that their beloved Lord should leave them and so all able bodied left the city to follow the Lord from behind, leaving the city desolate. The king sent his chief minister named Sumantra with a chariot with the intent to take him some way ahead into the forest and somehow make the Lord come back. Sumantra managed to persuade the Lord to board the chariot, but the citizens followed relentlessly. The first day's stop was on the banks of river Tamsa.

The Lord did not wish that the citizens should be subjected to more suffering, and so he asked Sumantra to drive away in the darkness of the night in such a way that the tracks got confused and obliterated so the citizens would not be able to follow them the next morning when they woke up. So the Lord went ahead on his forest exile, and the dismayed citizens had no choice but to return home.

From there they went on the chariot to Sringeripur and met Nishad, the chief of the boatman community. The next morning, Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman shed whatever remnants of royal paraphernalia they still had, matted their hairs, and summoned the boatman to cross the river Ganges. Sumantra had to turn back to Ayodhya from here.

From there the Lord went to Prayag, the holy confluence of the three holy rivers, i.e. Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati, and visited the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj.

From the sage's hermitage the Lord moved ahead on his onward journey to the forest. All the inhabitants of the little villages and hamlets that fell on the way were awe-struck at their sight and felt very privileged that they were having a divine Darshan (view) of the Lord even while staying in their native places. In this way, thousands of ordinary men, women and children had the benefit of viewing the Supreme Lord himself without having to undertake any arduous exercises and visiting any pilgrim places in search of the Lord.

By-and-by, Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman came to the hermitage of sage Valmiki. The sage told the Lord the places he must choose to live in from the spiritual perspective, and then the physical place known as Chitrakoot situated amongst verdant forests, rivers and streams, and green mountains rich with waterfalls, where the Lord should go and live for sometime before moving ahead. So this was the place where the three—Lord Ram, his consort Sita, and his younger brother Laxman—put up a thatched hut and spent some time of the earlier period of their forest exile.

Meanwhile, when Sumantra returned to Ayodhya and informed the king that Ram, Sita and Laxman did not come back but went on ahead to the forest, the old king died of contrition, grief and shock. The Guru, sage Vasistha, sent a messenger to Bharat and Shatrughan who were at the time of the unfolding of this horrifying saga in Ayodhya at the place of their maternal uncle. When Bharat got the news that he is being urgently summoned, he and his brother immediately came back to their home city. Bharat was met with gloom and foreboding omens around him. Everywhere he glanced, he saw a somber and grave mood. When he reached the palace he learnt what horrible deeds his mother had done—his father Dasrath was dead, and his beloved brothers Ram and Laxman had gone to the forest along with Sita, his sister-in-law.

Obviously, Bharat was dumb-founded and crest fallen. He severely scolded his mother like she was a witch; he caught hold of Manthara by her hairs and dragged and kicked her, and was generally inconsolable. Sage Vasistha did his best to calm his down, and in due course Bharat performed the last rites of his dead father.

But the throne was empty and this was not good for the kingdom. So the Guru, the ministers and the courtiers tried to persuade Bharat to accept the crown till the time Lord Ram came back. But Bharat flatly refused. He said that instead he would prefer to go to the forest and bring Ram back. Bharat—who till now was regarded as the villain and perceived as the chief conspirator for plotting for Ram's forest exile as he wished to usurp the crown—suddenly became dear for the masses.

So the royal entourage, accompanied by citizens, army, courtiers, queen Kaushalya, and ministers of the kingdom, started on its journey to the place where Lord Ram lived in the jungle. Bharat and Shatrughan walked on foot, spurning requests to board the chariot. Why, Bharat argued, should he sit comfortably on a chariot when his Lord had walked on foot? Walking barefoot resulted in boils developing on the soles of both Bharat and Shatrughan.

Sumantra showed them the path as far as Sringeripur where he had last seen Lord Ram, and then from there the royal party was led by Nishad who took him to the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj. Thereafter, the entourage moved on rapidly, asking the villagers and residents of the hamlets on the way about the directions that Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita had taken. Messengers were sent to reconnoiter, and Bharat was so nervous that he was uncertain if he would ever meet the Lord again. Eventually they reached Chitrakoot.

The two brothers Ram and Bharat met most affectionately, and so did all of them with each other. The party pitched up camp in the pleasant environs of Chitrakoot. Lord Ram and Laxman did their last rites for their dead father, and some time was spent in rest and chalking out the next strategy. The Guru sage Vasistha summoned a meeting, and Bharat went all out to plead with the Lord to forgive him and return back to Ayodhya. Lord Ram convinced Bharat that he loved him more than he can even imagine and that there is no trace of ill-will or misunderstanding in him. But he must obey the instructions of his late father to stay in the forest for 14 years, and since the father is dead now it becomes all the more mandatory to carry out his orders, for otherwise it would be tantamount to disobeying one's dead father which is an unpardonable sin. Bharat had even gone on record to offer to substitute places and stay in the forest in place of Lord Ram, but the Lord dissuaded him from it. Guru Vasistha then took Bharat aside and explained to him the divine mandate which the Lord had himself pronounced as Lord Vishnu and for which reason the Lord had come all the way down to earth. That divine work of the Gods for the wider well-being of creation and peace of its creature—which was the elimination of the demons—was far more important than suffering the absence of the Lord for such a small period of 14 years which meant nothing in the cosmic scale of time. Vasistha told Bharat that he should see the things from a broader perspective, and give up his stubbornness. Bharat saw the reason, and so he relented. The Lord gave Bharat his wooden sandals as a token of his presence in Ayodhya and its throne.

Accepting it most reverentially, Bharat took his leave and returned to the city with a heavy heart. He put the Lord's sandals on the throne, and himself decided to lead a life of a hermit. So he built a thatched hut on the outskirts of the capital, as a place called Nandigram, and began to live an austere life of a hermit. He carried his duties of the kingdom as a caretaker, and worshipped the sandals as a personified image of Lord Ram himself.

This brings us to the close of 'Ayodhya Kand'.

(3) Aranya Kand:

This is the third Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. It is so-called because the word 'Aranya' means a dense forest, and this Chapter would narrate that phase or part of the story of Lord Ram when he left Chitrakoot and moved ahead into the deeper recesses of the forest.

The Aranya Kand can be divided into the following three segments:

(a) On his way into the denser part of the forest, Lord Ram meets great sages such as Atri, Sarbhanga and Agastya, and many other sages doing penance in the forest. Here the Lord also saw a huge mountain of bones, which on enquiry was told that these bones belonged to sages and hermits who were killed by the demons. So Lord Ram took a vow that he would eliminate this scourge and free the earth from the cruelty of the evil demons. Also, the Lord has his first encounter with the ferocious demons in this part of the forest, when he met and slayed the demon Viradha, and many others later on.

(b) The second segment narrates the events that occurred in Panchavati, a small clearing near the river Godavari, where Lord Ram stayed for some time in a hut. It was heard that Sita was abducted by the demon king Ravana. It was also here that many demons were slain by Lord Ram, such as Marich, who had come disguised as a golden deer to enable Ravana to kidnap Sita, and the two great demon commanders Khar and Dushan along with their huge army when they had come to attack the Lord at the behest of Supernakha, a sister of Ravana.

(c) The third segment of this Kanda relates the events after Sita's abduction by Ravana. Lord Ram and Laxman begin a search for her, and on the way the Lord granted deliverance to Jatayu, the old vulture who had laid down his life attempting to save Sita from Ravana's clutches, to Sabari, an old tribal woman who was a great devotee of Lord Ram, to the demon Kabandha who was actually a Gandharva (a semi-god) turned into a demon due to a curse by a sage. Finally, this Kanda concludes by narrating a meeting and discourse that was held between Lord Ram and sage Narad.

Let us now take a quick briefing of the events narrated in Aranya Kand.

After living in Chitrakoot for quite some time, Lord Ram decided to move ahead into the denser part of the forest. He had two objectives—first was that great sages, hermits and ascetics lived there and they had all done severe Tapa (penance and austerity). The Lord had to bless them all, and to do this he had to visit their hermitages in the deep recesses of the forest. The second reason was that he would find the demons there, and not in the inhabited areas where the forest was less dense and not as hostile.

So the Lord went into the next area of the forest and met a number of sages and killed a number of demons. Thus, he met sage Atri, and Sita paid her obeisance to the sage's wife known by the name of Anasuya. The Lord proceeded further and killed the demon Viradha. Then he met sage Shambhanga, and took the vow of killing the demons when he saw a heap of bones and upon enquiry was told that it was of the sages killed by the demons. Moving ahead, the Lord met sage Sutekshan, and then sage Agastya.

Further ahead came the real horrifying part of the forest, called Dandakaaranya. It was most inhospitable and dense. The Lord met Jatayu, the vulture, and befriended him. The Lord decided to spend sometime in a clearing of the forest, and put up a small thatched cottage in a place called 'Panch-vati'.

A demoness named Supernakha became enamoured by the Lord, and disguised as a beauty she approached the Lord with the proposal of marriage. The Lord got her nose and ears chopped off by Laxman. Enraged, the demoness complained to her brother, the demon Khar. He gathered an army of demons led by himself, Dushan and Tishira, and attacked the Lord. After a fierce battle, all the demons were killed.

Wonderstruck with incredulity, Supernakha went to complain to the king of demons, i.e. Ravana who ruled the demons from his capital of Lanka which was a golden city situated in the middle of the ocean. Ravana was surprised, as Khar and Dushan were no ordinary demons and they had the strength matched only by himself. So surely their killer cannot be an ordinary human. But their killing was an affront for him, and he just could not take it lying down. But at the same time he did not have the courage to face this human enemy from the front because with the killing of Khar and Dushan he had become suspicious.

So he decided to adopt a stratagem and lure them to his fortress at Lanka. He went to Marich (who had earlier been flung by the Lord when he had gone to defile sage Vishwamitra's fire sacrifice) and forced him to become a golden deer so that Ravana could steal Sita in order to settle scores with Ram for deforming his sister Supernakha.

As this decoy golden deer frolicked near the hermitage of Lord Ram in Panch-vati, Ravana hid and waited for his chance to pounce upon Sita. The Lord knew everything in advance. So he sent Laxman to the forest to fetch wood and asked Sita to enter the 'fire' to maintain her purity because now approached the crucial moment for which the Lord had come to the forest. When Sita saw the golden deer, she asked the Lord to go and fetch it for her. The all-knowing Lord willingly got up and went deep in the forest behind the deer. Finally when he was far enough so that Ravana could get a chance to carry out his mischief, the Lord killed the deer. At the last moment of his life, Marich called out aloud the name of Laxman first and then softly the name of the Lord, 'Ram', and found his emancipation and salvation.

As was destined, when Sita heard the name of the Laxman being called out, she thought that the Lord was in danger and needed help. And despite of Laxman assuring her that no harm can ever come to the Lord, she forced him to go in the direction from where the name was heard. Finding the hermitage unguarded, Ravana appeared as a mendicant and begged for food. Sita stepped out to oblige him, when he suddenly showed his true form and seized her. Putting her forcibly on the chariot, he went towards Lanka by the air, with a distraught, wailing and lamenting Sita held in captivity. On the way, the vulture Jatayu tried to stop him and a fierce battle raged between the two. But ultimately Ravana cut off Jatayu's wings, and the poor bird fell on the ground, repeating the Lord's holy name 'Ram' and holding his last breath for some more time so that he can see the Lord and convey the message of Sita's abduction by Ravana before he dies.

Meanwhile, when Ram saw Laxman coming, he was alarmed, and knew that something was seriously amiss. When the two brothers returned to the hermitage, Sita was gone. At first Lord Ram pretended that he has lost all hopes and courage, and wished to end his life. Like an ordinary man he wailed and wept for her. This was part of the human drama that the Lord had to play to perfection so that the demons are not forewarned that the Supreme Being has come to eliminate them. Otherwise they would surrender themselves and the Lord would be forced to forgive them to uphold his reputation of being merciful and kind. But should this happen, the entire trouble of coming to the earth would be of no use, and though the Lord would be compelled to forgive the demons if they come seeking pardon they would revert to their old ways after sometime. The Lord's promise to the earth and the Gods that he would rid the world of the torment from the demons would not be fulfilled. So it was prudent and wise to play safe and let them believe that he was an ordinary human prince sent to the forest due to fight over the share of some kingdom!

Gradually after the initial shock, the Lord regained his composure, and the two brothers now set out in search of Sita. They came to the place where Jatau lay wounded. The Lord washed his wounds with his own hands and lock of hairs, and Jatau told him all that he had witnessed. Then Jatau died while being caressed by the Lord himself. The Lord then performed his last rites himself.

Moving ahead, Lord Ram met and killed a demon named Kabandh. Then he came to the lonely hermitage of the old woman named Shabari. She gave him motherly love and some fruits to eat, and then left her mortal body by the self-lit fire of Yoga to find emancipation and salvation. The Lord performed her last rites as he would have done for his own mother.

Sabari had advised the Lord to proceed in the direction of a mountain known as Rishyamook where lived the exiled monkey king Surgiv with his companions such as Hanuman and Jamvant.

So Lord Ram and Laxman proceeded in the direction of this mountain. On the way, the Lord had a meeting with the celestial sage Narad, and a discourse was held betwixt them. This brings us to the end of 'Aranya Kand'.

(4) Kishkindha Kand:

The fifth Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas is called Kishkindha Kand. The reason for this nomenclature is that the geographical area where the next set of events took place lay within the territorial jurisdiction of the kingdom of Kishkindha. It was the ancient kingdom of the monkey and bear races. Much like the kingdom of Ayodhya with its capital bearing the same name, the kingdom of Kishkindha too had a capital bearing the name of the kingdom, i.e. it was also called Kishkindha.

From a practical point of view, we can visualize it as a very old kingdom of ancient forest-dwelling people whose physical appearances and habits and practices and culture were so pre-historic and outdated, and away from normal yardsticks or criterions that civilizations more evolved than them employed to judge other people, that they were branded as 'monkeys and bears'. In reality therefore, the inhabitants of Kishkindha were not actually 'animals' the way we understand the terms monkeys and bears, but were members of an ancient civilization who could not adapt themselves to changes that occurred elsewhere in the world as the latter evolved over time. The probable reason for this failure to change and adopt and improve was that this kingdom was in a remote part of the land, to the south, in the midst of a dense forest, and separated by mountain ranges from the northern parts of the landmass where large cities and developed kingdoms were present, one such being the kingdom of Ayodhya. On the south too there was the mighty ocean, which acted as a natural barrier that prevented any new ideas of development coming in to influence the inhabitants of Kishkindha. The effect was that the citizens of Kishkindha lived in a virtual time capsule or a time warp where changes didn't happen as would normally be the case under ordinary circumstances.

Though the inhabitants of Kishkindha were primitive by the standards of other more evolved societies, but nevertheless they weren't animals, as is abundantly clear from one single proof of it: they could speak and understand the human tongue. This is obvious from the very fact that they could freely converse with Lord Ram, a human prince, and vice versa. Not only that, some of these inhabitants of Kishkindha were well educated and well-versed in Sanskrit, the langue-franca and the universal language of the world of that day, too, like we have English today. This is evident when Lord Ram meets Hanuman; the latter conversed with the Lord in immaculate Sanskrit—apropos: Adhyatma Ramayan, Kishkindha Kand, Canto 1, verse nos. 17-18 where Lord Ram himself acknowledges this and tells Laxman about it.

It is quite possible, and natural also, that these people were bi-lingual; they would speak in their native tongue amongst themselves, but when interacting with others from a different place they would use Sanskrit, the universal language, much in the same way we do today.

The Kishkindha Kand can be divided into roughly two segments as follows:

(a) The first segment narrates how Lord Ram meets Hanuman and befriends Sugriv, the exiled prince of Kishkindha, whom the Lord would help to get his rights back and be appointed as the king of this kingdom. Then, for sometimes during the rainy season, Lord Ram took rest at the nearby Mt. Prabarshan.

(b) The second section describes how a large number of monkeys and bears, called from all the directions of the world, was dispatched everywhere in search of Sita, and how one such group consisting of Angad, Hanuman, Jamvant etc. reached the shore of the southern ocean where they were informed by an old vulture named Sampati that Sita was held captive in Lanka. After this, a conference was held to decide who would go there.

Let us now briefly read the major developments of Kishkindha Kand as follows:

At the Rishyamook mountain, Lord Ram met his greatest devotee known as Hanuman. By his physical body he was a monkey like the rest of them, but we must not forget here that all of them were gods who had come down to earth to help and support Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram when the Lord would launch his final assault on the demons. Hanuman was none but Lord Shiva himself.

At the behest of Hanuman, Lord Ram made friends with Sugriv, the exiled brother of Baali (also pronounced as Vaali in Sanskrit texts), the king of the monkey race. When the Lord learnt about the injustice done to Sugriv by Baali, he interceded on Sugriv's behalf and killed the latter. Then Sugriv was made the king of Kishkindha.

After Sugriv's appointment as king, Lord Ram retired to a nearby mountain known as Parbarshan to wait for the rainy season to end, and then huge groups of monkeys and bears were dispatched in all the directions of the earth to find out about Sita. Since the Lord is all-knowing, he knew beforehand that this task would be accomplished by Hanuman alone. So he summoned him and gave his personal finger ring as a token for Sita so that she is convinced of the identity of Hanuman when he met her.

The group in which Hanuman was went in the south direction, and finally they reached the shore of the ocean. Faced with the formidable ocean as an obstacle, the group became distraught and concluded that they have come to a dead-end. It so happened that the elder brother of Jatau, the vulture named Sampati, lived in a cave in a nearby mountain. He came out upon hearing the commotion and told the group that he can see across the stretch of the ocean and see Sita seated under a tree in a garden in Lanka. This city was mid-way in the ocean, and was approximately 100 Yojans (800 miles) from the shore. So obviously anyone who could make this giant leap can go there.

After much deliberation it was decided that the only member of the group who has the ability to go and come back alive was Hanuman. The bear king Jamvant encouraged Hanuman to show his true mettle and do this great task of the Lord for which he has taken birth as a monkey in the first place.

Hanuman immediately assumed a colossus form, and invoking the holy name and the divine blessing of the Supreme Lord Ram, he prepared to leap across the ocean.

This brings us to the end of 'Kishkindha Kand'.

(E) Sundar Kand:

The next phase of the glorious story of Lord Ram is known as Sundar Kand. This is the fifth Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas.

The word 'Sundar' means beautiful. Why this Kand is called 'Sundar' is discussed in great detail at the beginning of this Chapter, but presently we shall see a few salient points as follows:

(i) Lanka was built on a mountain known as 'Trikoort'—one with three summits*<sup>1</sup>. Lanka was a mountainous landscape, and these three summits were rather plateaus instead of being triangular tips. Now, the summit to the north was called Subel, and it was here that Lord Ram's army landed when it crossed the ocean from the north of the island of Lanka*<sup>2</sup>. On the central summit was built the city of Lanka, the capital of the demon race. The third summit was on the other end of the island, somewhere to its south. Here, Ravana, the king of the demon race, had constructed a beautiful garden and forest for recreation purposes; it had lush green parks, fruit trees, flowering plants, water bodies, palaces and pavilions etc. that were meant for pleasure and enjoyment. Sita was incarcerated here. Since this place was immensely 'beautiful', the summit where it was located too came to be known as Mt. Sundar. And since the actions described in this Kanda took place here, the Kanda is also named 'Sundar Kand'.

(ii) The other prominent reason for naming this Kand as 'Sundar' is this: Till this point of time, gloom and hopelessness dominated the emotional horizon of Lord Ram, for Sita had not been found yet, and chances were remote of seeing her again even if she was discovered because it may mean some kind of dangerous adventure which may or may not succeed. This Kanda removed Lord Ram's distress and sense of helplessness—for not only Sita was found, but a single messenger of the Lord, i.e. Hanuman, had proved, by his valourous deeds, that vanquishing her oppressors, the demons led by Ravana, was not much of an issue. Say, if a single messenger of Lord Ram, i.e. Hanuman, could single-handedly trounce the might of the demon army and burn Lanka un-opposed, a city that was well guarded and protected by the so-called invincible demons, how easy would it be when the whole army of the monkey and bear race came to weigh its might on the demon army; where would it stand?

To wit, what was a while ago a hopeless situation was now full of hope. This was a 'beautiful development', so to say, and hence the Kand is named Sundar Kand.

That said, let us quickly have a brief glimpse of the main events in this Kanda as follows:

It was decided that Hanuman would go to Lanka to meet Sita and bring back her news. So he leapt across the ocean. On his way to Lanka, Hanuman met the demoness named Sursa who could catch the shadow of anything flying overhead, and overcame her with his wit. Then he landed on the shore of Lanka, the capital of the demons that was ruled by their ruthless king Ravana, the one with ten heads. At this time, Hanuman was in a very small form, like that of a mosquito.

At the entrance of the city of Lanka, Hanuman met Lankini, the demoness appointed as a gatekeeper, and punched her so hard that it left her bleeding profusely. She then allowed him to go in, prophesying that the end of the cruel demons was now at hand.

Once inside the city, he roamed around in search of Sita and came to the dwelling of Vibhishan, the younger brother of Ravana but a great devotee of Lord Vishnu. Vibhishan and Hanuman met each other, became friends, and the former told the latter the place where Sita was confined. It was a garden known as the Ashoka Vaatika or the garden of Ashoka trees.

Hanuman entered the garden and hid himself behind a thick foliage of the tree under which Sita sat brooding, being overcome with grief. At the opportune time Hanuman dropped the signet ring of Lord Ram that he had brought along. Sita picked it up, and thus the two—Hanuman and Sita became acquainted with each other. Hanuman reassured Sita that her days of grief were soon to end as the Lord would come as soon as he goes back to him with the news of his meeting with her. Sita was extremely happy and relieved.

Then Hanuman took leave from Sita, and on the pretext of eating fruits he ruined the garden of Ravana by destroying its trees and littering the place. Ravana heard of the destruction and was greatly alarmed at the stranger's temerity. He sent his army under the command of his son Akshaya Kumar to catch the intruder and bring him to his court, but in the ensuing scuffle, Hanuman killed Ravana's son.

Then Ravana dispatched his valiant son Meghanad to catch Hanuman and bring him to the court, which he later successfully did. At the court, Hanuman tried his best to plead with Ravana to avoid confrontation with Lord Ram by giving Sita back to him, but Ravana flatly refused. The ill-witted demons tried to mock at the Lord by deforming his messenger, and so they decided to burn his tail. This was a god-sent opportunity Hanuman was waiting for to settle accounts with the demons, so as soon as the cloth that was wrapped around his tail and soaked in oil was set alight, he escaped from their captivity and went on a rampage in the city, dragging and swaying the fiercely burning tail behind him. This resulted in a huge fire, and the golden city of Lanka was reduced to ashes.

Hanuman then jumped into the ocean to douse the flame, took his last leave from Sita, and then jumped across the ocean to come back to this side of the ocean where his other companions were waiting anxiously for his return.

The party went jubilantly to report the success to Lord Ram, who was overwhelmed with joy and happiness. There was cheer and rejoicing everywhere. A huge army of monkeys and bears was assembled forthwith and the Lord started on for the final phase of his forest exile to conquer Lanka and kill the fierce demons led by Ravana, thereby fulfilling the promise Lord Vishnu had made to the tormented earth, to the worried sages and seers, and to the terrified Gods that he would rid them of their fear and tyranny of the demons.

The formidable army reached the shores of the ocean. The Lord first tried not to embarrass the deity of the ocean by crossing it forcefully without permission, so he tried to please the deity by prayers and other means. But when the Lord found that it was useless to plead further, he drew his arrow to dry up the whole ocean. Terrified, the ocean god relented and begged forgiveness. He advised the Lord to build a bridge across the water, and so the 'great bridge' was constructed to enable Lord Ram and his mighty army to cross over to Lanka.

The huge army which seemed to stretch till the horizon finally crossed the ocean, some walking over the bridge, some jumping over the back of the countless marine creatures who had come to the surface to watch the spectacle, some simply leaping to the other side, and some riding on the back of their friends and companions. It was a huge tide of monkeys and bears sweeping on the shores of Lanka. Thus, in this wondrous way, the Lord landed in Lanka.

This is the end of this fifth phase of the story called the 'Sundar Kand'.

(F) Lanka Kand:

Then we move on to the sixth Canto or Chapter of the story; it is known as the Lanka Kand. This Chapter is a story of unmatched and unparallel strength, valour, gallantry and courage, leading to victory and fame. The evil forces represented by the demons were finally vanquished and eliminated by forces representing goodness and righteousness symbolized by Lord Ram and his army that attained its glory by being successful in this endeavour.

Lanka Kand can be divided into four major parts as follows:

(a) The first part is that which narrates the construction of the bridge across the ocean so that Lord Ram's mighty army could land on the soil of Lanka; consecration of Lord Shiva's Lingam (symbol) by Lord Ram to pay homage to the former; the conferences that were held in both the opposing camps, of Lord Ram and Ravana, to chalk out the strategy to deal with the impending war; and the many attempts that Ravana's wife Mandodari made to avert the war.

(b) In the second part we read that Lord Ram sent Angad, the prince of the monkey race, as his emissary to the court of Ravana in a final attempt to see if a solution can be found without bloodshed. We read in detail what transpired betwixt Ravana and Angad, and how all efforts of Angad failed to convince Ravana to make peace with the Lord.

(c) The third part of this Kanda narrates the horrors of the ferocious War of Lanka in which one after another all the evil demons were killed. The war saw the death of Kumbhakaran, the younger brother of Ravana, Meghanad, the virtually invincible son of Ravana, and finally Ravana himself who died after a protracted battle with Lord Ram.

(d) Finally, when the war was over, Vibhishan was made the king of Lanka, Sita was united with Lord Ram, and the Lord boarded the Pushpak plane, along with Sita and Laxman, as well as chief monkeys and bears, and also Vibhishan, to head back home to Ayodhya.

Now let us read some more details about Lanka Kand as follows:

Having landed on the shore of Lanka, Lord Ram made a last ditch attempt to avoid bloodshed by sending Angad, the son of Vali and the nephew of Sugriv, as his messenger of peace to Ravana. A verbal duel followed between Angad and Ravana, and Angad planted his feet on the ground, challenging Ravana to move it. Should he be able to do it successfully, Angad promised him, it will be deemed that Lord Ram has lost the war, and if not, than Ravana be damned. All the courtiers of Ravana's demon court tried their might but could not move Angad's feet as much as an inch. Finally Ravana came himself, and then Angad rebuked him, saying 'you wretched one; why do you kneel before me? Had you done it before Lord Ram, your whole clan would have found redemption.'

After Angad's peace mission failed, the ferocious war finally broke out. One by one all the demons were killed. During the course of the war, Laxman was wounded and Hanuman had to go the Himalayas to fetch the herbs which were used to bring Laxman back to life.

The last demon to die was Ravana himself, and as soon as he fell there was an uproarious cheer in the heavens. Vibhishan was crowned as the new king of Lanka, and Sita met her beloved husband Lord Ram. The dead monkeys and bears who had fallen during the course of the war were all revived by the rain of Amrit (ambrosia of life) that Indra, the chief of the Gods, rained from the sky, and the fallen demons too benefited as they all went to the heaven instead of to hell.

Lord Ram finally made his departure from Lanka for his own city of Ayodhya aboard the air plane known as 'Pushpak'. Besides Sita and Laxman, he was accompanied by his monkey and bear companions, as well as Vibhishan.

This is the end of the ‘Lanka Kanda’ which is also known as the Uddha Kand or the War Kand.

(G) Uttar Kand:

The Uttar Kand is the seventh and the last Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. It marks the last phase of the story of the Ramayana. The word ‘Uttar’ refers to the final phase of life, or the second half of a long narrative. Hence the name of this Kand, as it marks the end of the Lord’s first phase of his worldly sojourn and the beginning of the second phase when he began to rule the world as its king and emperor after having killed all the demons and fulfilling his promise to the earth, the sages and seers, and the Gods.

The word ‘Uttar’ has other connotations too: Since Lord Ram traveled ‘northwards’ from Lanka to reach his own kingdom of Ayodhya, this part of the story is called Uttar Kand—a term meaning the north. ‘Uttar’ also means the last part of a long story. In ancient tradition, the last chapter of a scripture contained a synopsis of the spiritual theme discussed in the main part of the text; so is the case with Ram Charit Manas too where this Chapter is primarily dedicated to highlighting the spiritual benefits of the story of Lord Ram, and what this story essentially teaches us. Towards this end, we find that it includes discourses that Lord Ram himself gave, and that which were held betwixt the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and Garud, the king of birds, wherein profound metaphysical and spiritual principles were discussed and explained in simple language.

Uttar Kand can be said to be divided into the following three segments:

- (a) Lord Ram’s arrival in Ayodhya to a warm and tumultuous welcome; the celebrations in Ayodhya and Lord’s ascension to the throne of the great kingdom to be appointed its King and Emperor; departure of Lord Ram’s guests from Kishkindha, Lanka and Sringeripur who had come with the Lord aboard the Pushpak plane.
- (b) Description of the rule of law, and all round peace and harmony that prevailed in Ayodhya under Lord Ram; and the regular discourses that Lord Ram gave to his subjects on various spiritual and metaphysical topics.
- (c) The meeting and the subsequent discourse that was held betwixt the great saintly crow named Kaagbhusund and Garud, the king of birds, where profound spiritual and metaphysical principles were discussed.

That said, let us have a bird’s eye view of the main events of Uttar Kand as follows:

Hanuman was sent by Lord Ram to inform Bharat that the Lord is returning from his forest exile. The news spread like wild-fire in the city of Ayodhya, and the city erupted in a spontaneous emotion of joy. Bharat, and virtually everyone in the city, rushed jubilantly to the outskirts where the Pushpak plane came down to land on the ground. There was an emotional reunion betwixt the four brothers, as well as betwixt

Lord Ram and all those who had gone to welcome him back home. It looked as if a sea of mutual affection and love had broken its dykes to sweep away everyone who was present there.

After initial welcoming and hugging, cheer and applause, the euphoric crowd of exhilarated citizens accompanied Lord Ram as he entered the city: the city of Ayodhya which had looked worn out, withered and gloomy just a while ago suddenly became vibrant and lively once again. Mass celebrations and festivities were held in all the directions, on earth as well as in heaven, and they lasted for almost six months. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 15.}

During this period, on an auspicious day and time, Lord Ram was crowned as King-Emperor of the mighty kingdom and empire of Ayodhya.

The Lord ruled most righteously and according to the laws of Dharma (ethics, righteousness, probity, propriety, morality) and Satya (truthfulness). His rule was exemplary and there was happiness and prosperity everywhere. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 24.}

Tulsidas has ended his story-telling here. The saint could not bear to write more and describe how Lord Ram, who was so dear to his heart and the essence of his life, would one day leave this mortal world and go back to his divine abode in the heaven as is usually done by other narrators of this epic story, such as sages Valmiki and Veda Vyas in their versions of the Ramayana. So Tulsidas decided to stop the story here. Symbolically, Tulsidas made Lord Ram live on this earth amongst us for all times to come.

To wit, all other versions of the Ramayana, such as those written by sages Valmiki and Veda Vyas, have elaborately described the final phases of the Lord's earthly sojourn, and how he had left his mortal coil (i.e. his physical body) to ascend to the heaven, but our Tulsidas preferred not to think of the Lord ever leaving us alone. So he ended his narrative in Ram Charit Manas with the crowning of Lord Ram on the throne of Ayodhya. So shall it be; we shall cherish the divine idea that Lord Ram is always present amongst us !

Since the main objective of Ram Charit Manas was to act as a beacon of spiritual hope and a source of solace to the tormented soul of the creature yearning for peace and beatitude, as well as to serve as a guide to show the world an easy path to attain nearness with the Supreme Being and fulfill the soul's eternal desire for deliverance, salvation and emancipation, a fine spiritual dialogue betwixt Kaagbhusund and Garud is included in the later half of Uttar Kand. This discourse is soaked in spiritual and metaphysical philosophy that is delivered in very a simple and effective way, and in a language that is easy to understand.

This brings us to the end of Ram Charit Manas.

ŚRĪ RĀMA CARITA MĀNASA Of Gōswāmī Tulasīdās

Original Text, English Transliteration &
Exhaustive Exposition in English with Explanatory Notes

Main Characters in the Story of Śrī Rāma Carita Mānasa

We shall now have a brief introduction of all the major characters mentioned in the devotional classic 'Ram Charit Manas'. For the purpose of convenience, we shall learn about them in accordance with the Kanda or Chapter where they are mentioned for the first time.

(1) Baal Kand:

(i) Lord Shiva: He is the third god of the Trinity who is responsible for conclusion of creation. Lord Shiva is believed to be the greatest devotee of Lord Ram, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, and the wisest amongst the gods. He is the patron deity of ascetics (Yogis) and practices strict renunciation and austerities.

The story of Ram Charit Manas was first conceived in Lord Shiva's 'Mana', i.e. in his heart and mind, while he was meditating and contemplating upon Lord Ram, using the holy name of the latter, i.e. the word RAAM (Rām), as a Mantra (spiritual formula) for the purpose. Lord Shiva always remains in a meditative posture, constantly remembering his beloved Lord Ram and mentally worshipping him. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.]

This is the primary reason why this divine story of Lord Ram is called 'Ram Charit Manas', for it means 'a narrative of the deeds of Lord Ram that were first revealed in the Mana' of Lord Shiva. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 35.]

Shiva is also honoured by the epithet of 'Maha-deva', meaning the 'Great God', because of his exemplary wisdom, erudition and sagacity, as well as high level of self-realisation and enlightenment. Lord Shiva and Lord Ram had mutual respect for each other so much so that Lord Shiva is also known as 'Rameshwar'. This word has a dual meaning: it means Lord Shiva for whom Ram is the Ishwar, the Supreme Lord, as well as Lord Ram for whom Shiva is the Ishwar. Later on in the story of the Ram Charit Manas, Lord Ram has himself affirmed this relationship, saying that if anyone wishes to please him then he must first please Lord Shiva. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 104; (b) Lanka Kand,

Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 3.]

In order to spread the nectar of spiritual bliss and the joy of feeling blessed by hearing the divine story of Lord Ram, Lord Shiva decided that it ought to be revealed and not kept secret in his heart and mind where it was first conceived. So the gracious Lord told the divine story of Ram Charit Manas to his consort goddess Uma or Parvati, and later on to a sage known as Kaagbhusund, a saintly crow. Thence, this glorious story was heard and narrated by a chain of illustrious and wise sages, from whom it then spread, by-and-by, to the rest of the world. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 35—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precede Doha no. 36.]

(ii) Sage Narad: He is a celestial sage and a son of the creator Brahma. Narad is a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, and has free access to every corner of the universe. Once he fell into the trap of Maya (delusions and worldly infatuations) and wished to marry. Lord Vishnu prevented Narad from falling prey to this temptation, but the sage was so offended that he cursed the Lord to become a human being and suffer the agony of separation from his beloved so that he can understand how a lover feels when he is denied access to his beloved. This was the reason why Lord Vishnu had to suffer separation from Sita when she was abducted by Ravana. However, Narad soon realized his mistake, that the Lord prevented him from marrying for his own good, so he relented and asked for forgiveness. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 129.]

(iii) Sage Yagyawalkya: He was the greatest sage of his time, renowned for his expertise in metaphysical and theological knowledge. [Brihadaranyaka Upanishad of the Shukla Yajur Veda tradition, Canto 3, Brahman 1-9; and Canto 4.]

He was the one who had heard the story of Ram Charit Manas first from Kaagbhusund, and then narrated it to sage Bharadwaj. Thus, it can be deduced that the divine story of Lord Ram, known as the Ram Charit Manas, that was previously unknown to the human race as it was narrated in an esoteric language, first by Lord Shiva who obviously spoke in a language known only to gods, and then by sage Kaagbhusund who spoke in the tongue of a crow, was first revealed in the ‘human tongue’ by sage Yagyawalkya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 30.]

(iv) Sage Bharadwaj: He was also a great sage who had his hermitage in the holy place known as Prayag, the confluence of the three holy rivers, Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati. Regular religious gatherings were held at his hermitage, and it was on one such occasion that he heard the story of Ram Charit Manas from sage Yagyawalkya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47.]

Later on, Lord Ram also met this great sage when the Lord was on his way to the forest. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 106.]

(v) Sage Agastya: He was another great sage of that time who is mentioned in Baal Kand. His other name was 'Kumbhaj'. Lord Shiva had himself heard the story of Ram Charit Manas being narrated by sage Agastya when he visited his hermitage. It is this narration that sage Yagyawalkya refers to when he himself narrates the story of Lord Ram to sage Bharadwaj. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 48.]

Lord Ram had met sage Agastya and received his blessings during his journey through the forest. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 18 that precedes Doha no. 13.]

(vi) Sage Vasistha / Vasistha: He was a son of creator Brahma, and the royal priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya. By the virtue of the latter occupation, sage Vasistha was also a Guru (teacher and preceptor) of the family of kings of Ayodhya, and hence of king Dasrath as well as Lord Ram and his three brothers. His wife was Arundhati. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 189; (b) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 9; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50.]

(vii) Sage Vishwamitra: Another great sage of his time and a rival of sage Vasistha, he was the one who took Lord Ram and Laxman from Ayodhya to his hermitage in the forest to eliminate the demons who were constantly defiling his fire sacrifice. Later on, sage Vishwamitra took the two brothers to Janakpur to attend the bow-breaking ceremony organized by king Janak. It was during this ceremony that Lord Ram married Sita, the daughter of Janak, by breaking the formidable bow that was the sole condition set for Sita's marriage. Lord Ram's three brothers too were married simultaneously at the same venue. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 206—to Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 210.]

(viii) Sage Sringi: This sage was called by sage Vasistha, the chief priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya and a family advisor to king Dasrath on religious matters, to preside over the fire sacrifice that he advised the king to perform when the latter pleaded with him that he wishes to have sons as there was no heir to the throne though he had become very old. Sage Sringi was an expert on such matters; he was well-versed in the Mantras (religious formulas) and the processes involved in such fire sacrifices. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 189.]

(ix) Sage Parashuram: He was the son of king Gaadhi and born in the illustrious family of sage Bhrgu. He was a great devotee of Lord Shiva, and famously known as 'sage with the battle-axe'. Parashuram is believed to be the one who had vanquished the pride of the greatest kings of the world by defeating them in numerous battles. He was very short-tempered and got provoked by the slightest of asides. In Baal Kand, he makes his angry appearance during the bow-breaking ceremony because he had become vengeful at the news of the breaking of Lord Shiva's bow, for he worshipped Lord Shiva as his patron deity. An acerbic oral spat took place at the venue of the ceremony betwixt the sage and Laxman, the younger brother of Lord Ram, but anon the sage calmed down and paid his homage to Lord Ram when he realized that the Lord was none but Lord Vishnu himself in that form, after which the sage retired to the forest to do Tapa (penances and austerities) to atone for his loss of grace due to his angry and irreverent behaviour vis-à-vis the Lord. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.]

The sages mentioned herein above are the ones whose names appear in Baal Kand. Besides them, we also come across ‘Ahilya’.

(x) Ahilya: She was the wife of sage Gautam who had cursed her, due to some misunderstanding, to become a stone. When the sage realised his mistake, he blessed Ahilya that she would be freed of this curse when Lord Vishnu visits her in his manifestation as Lord Ram and touches her stone-form with the tip of his foot. In due course of time, it so happened that Lord Ram visited her abandoned hermitage while on his way to Janakpur with sage Vishwamitra and brother Laxman to attend the bow-breaking ceremony being organised there for the wedding of Sita, the daughter of king Janak of that kingdom. When Lord Ram was told about this mysterious stone figure by sage Vishwamitra, the Lord touched her with his toe, and this freed Ahilya of her curse. She offered prayers to Lord Ram and went back to her husband, sage Gautam. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 10-12 and Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 211.]

Now we shall briefly mention the demon king Ravana and his brothers, and who they were in their previous life, because Baal Kand describes the origin of the demon race, and ascribes the reason for Lord Ram’s birth to this race, for Lord Vishnu descended to the mortal world to eliminate the horrors perpetrated by Ravana and his race of cruel demons.

(xi) King Pratapbhanu: He was a great king of an ancient kingdom known as Kaikaye. His father was Satyaketu, and his younger brother was Arimardan. When Satyaketu became old, he handed over the reins of the kingdom to Pratapbhanu, the elder son, and retired to the forest to do Tapa. Pratapbhanu was a brilliant king and most valourous. He and his younger brother conquered all their rivals and established a mighty empire. But the more he succeeded and prospered, the more his greed for power and authority increased proportionately so much so that he wanted to become invincible and unopposed in this world, as well as immortal. This greed led to his downfall. It so happened that one of his vanquished kings hid in the forest, disguised as a hermit, waiting for an opportunity to exact revenge. He had befriended a fiend, who promised to help. Once it so happened that Pratapbhanu got lost while hunting, and while wondering in the forest reached this false hermit’s place, seeking shelter for the night. The hermit recognized the king, but the later failed to see through the veil of deceit and realize who the hermit was. By-and-by, during conversations in the night to while away the time, the hermit convinced the king that he possessed great mystical powers and he could fulfill all desires of the king. Pratapbhanu fell in the trap, requesting the pretentious hermit to grant him the boon of invincibility and immortality. Seizing the golden opportunity, the cunning hermit advised the king that he should hold a great feast and invite all the Brahmins to it, for the hermit told him that he would disguise himself as a cook and enter the kitchen where he would cast his magical charm on the food served as well as on the guests so that all those who participated in the feast will be under the sway of Pratapbhanu. The hermit told the king that if the Brahmins became obedient to him, no one would be able to kill him or subdue him in this world.

Pratapbhanu was taken for a ride by his delusions, and driven by the fiat of fate too, that he believed the deceitful hermit into thinking that the impossible could happen. Eventually, a great feast was organized by the king as advised, and large numbers of Brahmins were invited. Meanwhile, the crooked hermit, with the aid of his fiendish friend, managed to add meat into the food served, which made the Brahmins furious, and they cursed the king that he and all his family members as well as the subjects of his kingdom would become ‘demons who eat flesh’. This is how Ravana and the rest of the demon race came into existence. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 176.]

The three brothers did Tapa to please the creator Brahma, who granted them boons they desired. Ravana wished that he should not die at the hands of anyone, except human beings and monkeys, because he thought that if he becomes so strong that gods couldn’t harm him, then how would an ordinary human and a monkey matter to him. Request for this boon by Ravana reflected the desire that he had in his previous life as king Pratapbhanu, when he had a similar wish to become invincible and immortal. Brahma was aghast at this request, but he had no choice except to grant this boon as he had promised Ravana that whatever the latter desired would be granted. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 177.]

When Brahma approached Kumbhakaran, he was astonished to see the latter’s colossus body, and thought that if he is allowed to eat daily then he would consume all food soon and the entire creation would die of hunger. Hence, Brhama persuaded the goddess of speech, known as Saraswati, to delude Kumbhakaran, who wished to sleep soundly for six months at a stretch and wake for one day, before resuming his long bout of sleep. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 177.]

Meanwhile, Vibhishan asked for devotion for Lord God. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 177.]

After getting their desired boons from Brahma, the three demon brothers returned home and in due course of time Ravana established the famed ‘demon kingdom’ with its capital in the island city of Lanka. Emboldened by his boons, Ravana unleashed a reign of terror and horror in the corners of the world, vanquishing gods, ruthlessly terrorizing all other creatures, and cruelly crushing all opposition in this world. Mother Earth was horrified at this behaviour, and she, along with all the gods and great sages and ascetics, approached Lord Vishnu to provide succour to them, at which the Lord promised to come down to earth as Lord Ram to eliminate the scourge of the demons. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 178—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187.]

Ram Charit Manas also narrates that in his previous life, Ravana was one of the chief guards at the gate of Lord Vishnu, and his name was 'Jai', while Ravan's brother Kumbhakaran was 'Vijai', the other guard. Due to a curse by a Brahmin, both Jai and Vijai became demons for three consecutive births. In their third such birth, Jai became Ravana, and Vijai became Kumbhakaran. [Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 122—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 123.]

A brief introduction of Ravana is given by Angad, Lord Ram's emissary, in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 20.

The life and times of Ravana and his brothers Kumbhakaran and Vibhishan have been described in (i) Adhyatma Ramayan by sage Veda Vyas, Uttarkand, Cantos 1 and 2; (ii) Valmiki's Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Sarga (Canto) no. 9-34; (iii) Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand, Sarga (Canto) 13, verse nos. 1-139; and (iv) Tulsidas' Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha nos 176-183.

The life of Meghanad, the son of Ravana, is described in Valmiki's Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Sarga (Canto) no. 12; Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand, Sarga 13.

A brief introduction of Ravana is given by Angad, Lord Ram's emissary, in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 20.

The Atharva Veda's Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad, Canto 3, verse no. 18 describes the meaning of the word 'Ravana' as follows—

"Since the demon had abducted Ram's consort (Sita) from a 'Van' (pronounced as won or one; meaning a dense forest), he was called 'Ravana'. [The first letter of the word Ram and the word Van are combined to form the name of the demon as 'Ra+van = Ravana'.]

There is another interpretation. 'Ravana' also means—'the one who makes others weep, cry, lament and wail due to the severe pain, misery, torments, terror and sorrows inflicted upon them' (for Ravana's actions had made Sita suffer, weep and wail). [Refer: Valmiki Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 7, verse no. 16.]

Further, he made a lot of noise or false claims, or he used to brag haughtily about his achievements, his strength and powers as well as of his invincibility and lordship over even the heavens. Wherever he went, he behaved most wildly and acted like a savage, making a lot of din and clamour to spread fear and terror.

So, the first part of his name Ravana comes from the word Rav for 'fuss, noise, chatter, clamour, nuisance and din'. Thus, he became famous as 'Ravana' because he made a lot of noise and false claims.

According to one story, once Ravana got on his chariot and flew above Kailash, the mountain abode of Lord Shiva. Nandi, the mount of Shiva, told him to stop, but the arrogant Ravana did not pay any heed. So Nandi blocked his path in the sky. Peeved and feeling insulted, Ravana scooped up the entire mountain and put it on his shoulder to throw it somewhere. Lord Shiva used his might and pressed the mountain with his big toe. This crushed Ravana under the weight and the pressure, and he began to yell. He remained for a thousand years crushed under the weight of the mountain and continued to pray to Lord Shiva to free him. At that time Shiva cursed him—‘you have been wailing for so long under the weight of the mountain and you are in the habit of making others wail by your cruelty, so your name will be Ravana, or ‘the one who wails himself and make others wail too’.’ This story is narrated in Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand, Sarga 13, verse nos. 84-85.

Other demons mentioned in Baal Kand are the following:

(xiii) Marich and Subahu: They were commanders of a large detachment of demon troops appointed by Ravana to prevent sages from performing fire sacrifices. They were deployed in the forest area where great sages such as Vishwamitra etc. lived, somewhere between the city of Ayodhya and Janakpur. When Lord Ram and his brother Laxman stood guard at sage Vishwamitra’s fire sacrifice, these two demons attacked the venue, and during the battle that followed, Lord Ram killed Subahu and flung Marich to a far away island in the middle of the ocean, while Laxman decimated the rest of the army. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 210.]

Later on, it was Marich who was forced by Ravana to assume the form of a deer with a golden hide so that the demon king could divert Lord Ram’s attention and abduct Sita. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 24—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 27.]

(xiv) Tadka (pronounced Tādkā): She was a ferocious female demon who attacked Lord Ram, Laxman and sage Vishwamitra while they were going from Ayodhya to the sage’s hermitage. Lord Ram provided deliverance to her soul by freeing it from the evil gross body of a demoness in which the soul was trapped by killing it. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 209.]

Now, let us read about the great family in which Lord Vishnu took birth as Lord Ram. It was an illustrious family of great kings who ruled over a famous and prosperous kingdom by the name of Ayodhya. Presently we are concerned with king Dasrath in whose household Lord Ram was born. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 188 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.]

(xv) King Dasrath (pronounced in Sanskrit as Daśaratha): He was the king of the kingdom of Ayodhya, which was also known as ‘Avadh’. He headed an empire that covered a major part of north India of those days. Hence, he was also called a ‘Chakravarti King’—i.e. one whose rule extended over a wide swathe of land that had a huge parameter or circumference (“Charka” = a circle).

In his previous life, king Dasrath was known as Kashyap, and his chief queen Kaushalya was Kashyap’s wife Aditi. The couple had done severe Tapa (penance and austerity) with a desire to have the Supreme Being as their son. To fulfill this wish, Lord Vishnu had promised them that he would take a birth in their household, in their next birth, as Lord Ram, which the Lord fulfilled in Kashyap’s present life as king Dasrath. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 187.]

According to another version, also mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, the first human couple named Swayambhu Manu and his wife Satarupa had a son named Uttanpaad. It is believed that the human race owes its origin to this couple. In their old age, the pious couple handed over the affairs of the world to their son and retired to the forest to do Tapa, and when Lord Vishnu revealed himself before them and asked them to seek anything they wished, the couple prayed to the Lord that they wished to have a son in his likeness, at which the Lord replied that since it was impossible to find someone who would resemble him in the remotest, so it would be better if he himself manifested as their son. Lord Ram was thus born to this pious couple in their next birth as king Dasrath and queen Kaushalya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Doha no. 152.]

The lineage of the kings of the Ayodhya dynasty is narrated in Valmiki's Ramayana, Baal Kand, Canto 70. It is as follows: Brahma, the creator > Marichi > sage Kashyap > Viwaswan > Vaiwaswat Manu (the first human king) > Ikshwaku (after whom the family of Lord Ram got its name, as the Ikshwaku dynasty) > Kusi > Vikusi > Baan > Anaranya > Prithu (the great king after whom the earth came to be known as Prithivi) > Trishanku > Dhundhamaar > Bhuvanaascha > Maandhata > Susandhi > Dhruvsandhi > Bharat (after whom the modern India was named 'Bhaarat') > Asit > Sagar (after whom the ocean was called Saagar; because it were his sons who had dug the earth to create the hollow filled with water that came to be known as the ocean) > Asamanj > Anshuman > Dilip > Bhagirath (who is credited for bringing the heavenly river Ganges to earth) > Kakushtha > Raghu (the great king after whom the family of Lord Ram is also oftentimes named as the Raghu dynasty) > Pravridha > Shankan > Sudarshan > Agnivarna > Shighran > Maru > Prashusruk > Ambarish > Nahush > Yayaati > Naabhaag > Aja > king Dashrath > Lord Ram.

The above list has 40 names if we include the creator Brahma.

(xvi) Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi were Dasrath's three chief queens. Kaushalya was the eldest, Sumitra the middle wife, and Kaikeyi the youngest of the three. But the king was enamoured with Kaikeyi the most. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 190.]

(xvii) Lord Sri Ram, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan were his four sons. Ram was the eldest of the four brothers and the son of Kaushalya; Bharat was the son of Kaikeyi, and Laxman and Shatrughan were the twin sons of Sumitra.

The four brothers were assigned their respective names by sage Vasistha. The significance of these names are as follows [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 197 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it] :-

'Ram' meant 'one who was an like an ocean of a eternal and fathomless virtues of bliss, happiness, felicity and beatitude, and in whom the entire universe dwells as if it was merely a single pore of his body'.

‘Bharat’ was ‘one who takes care of the welfare of the world by providing for all its necessities, and who protects the world and looks after its well-being’.

‘Shatrughan’ was ‘one who could vanquish all enemies; one whose mere remembrance can enable a person to overcome his adversary’.

Lord Ram was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being<sup>1</sup>, while his other three brothers, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan, were personifications of Lord Vishnu’s virtues and the duties he carried out as the Supreme Lord of the creation—viz. to take care of the world and provide for all its needs as represented by Bharat, to support it and enable it to be self-reliant as represented by Laxman, and to eliminate all those elements who acted as enemies of the Lord’s creation and its subjects as represented by Shatrughan.

According to sage Veda Vyas’ ‘Adhyatma Ramayan’, Uttar Kand, Canto 10, verse nos. 57-58, Laxman was a manifestation of Lord Seshnath, the celestial serpent who supports the world on his thousand hoods, Bharat was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu’s Chakra (serrated discus, Vishnu’s weapon), Shatrughan of Shankha (conch which Vishnu always held in his hand), and Lord Ram of Lord Vishnu himself. Sita, Lord Ram’s wife, meanwhile was goddess Laxmi, the consort of Vishnu, personified.

(xviii) King Janak: He was the king of Janakpur, the capital of a kingdom of the same name. It was situated at the foothills of the Himalayan mountain range. His daughter Sita was married to Lord Ram. His other daughter Urmila was married to Laxman. The two daughters of his younger brother Kushketu, i.e. Maandavi and Srutkirti, were married to Bharat and Shatrughan respectively. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8-10 and Chanda line nos. 1-12 that precede Doha no. 325.]

(xix) Sita: The eldest daughter of Janak, and the wife of Lord Ram. It was her abduction by the demon king Ravana that led to the famous war of Lanka around which the story of the Ramayana is built.

According to sage Veda Vyas’ ‘Adhyatma Ramayan’, Uttar Kand, Canto 10, verse no. 58, Sita was a manifestation of goddess Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu.

(2) Ayodhya Kand:

(i) Manthara: The favoured maid of Kaikeyi who became jealous when she heard that Lord Ram was to be anointed the prince regent of Ayodhya. She instigated her mistress Kaikeyi to compel king Dasrath to redeem the two promises that the king had made to her some time in the past, but were still pending. Under this mischievous plan, Manthara told Kaikeyi to ask for two boons: one was to send Lord Ram to the forest for fourteen years, and the second boon was to ask king Dasrath to install her own son Bharat on the throne of the kingdom of Ayodhya. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 23.]

This precipitated in the sad saga that led to calamitous events: king Dasrath died, Bharat refused to accept the crown, the kingdom was plunged into an era of gloom and uncertainty, and Lord Ram, his wife Sita and his brother Laxman went to forest for fourteen years, where Sita was abducted by the demon king Ravana, which eventually led to the epic war of Lanka.

(ii) Sumantra: He was the chief minister of the kingdom of Ayodhya and a close confidante of king Dasrath. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. Doha no. 5.]

(iii) Nishad (pronounced as Niṣād): He was the chief of the boatmen community; Lord Ram had met and befriended him on his way to the forest, as well as on his way to Ayodhya from Lanka. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 88; Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-12 and Chanda line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 121.]

(iv) Kevat: The boatman who took Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita across the river Ganges as they headed for the forest. Kevat refused to accept any charges for rowing the Lord across, and for the love and affection that Kevat showed to him, Lord Ram blessed him with the spiritual reward of having undiluted devotion. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 100—to Doha no. 102.]

(v) Kol and Kirata (Kōla and Kirāta): They were the tribals who lived in dense forest. Lord Ram was served by them when he went to Chitrakoot. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 135—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 137.]

(vi) Sage Bharadwaj: Lord Ram met this sage after he crossed river Ganges and reached Prayag, the holy place where the three rivers, Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati converge. Sage Bharadwaj had his hermitage here. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 135—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 109.]

(vii) Sage Valmiki: Lord Ram visited the hermitage of this great sage during his journey into the forest. It was on the advice of sage Valmiki that Lord Ram stayed in Chitrakoot, a very pleasant part of the forest amidst mountains and situated on the banks of river Mandakini, a tributary of river Ganges. It was during Lord Ram's meeting with sage Valmiki that the learned sage had enumerated the various symbolic places where the Lord should reside to bless his devotees. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 132.]

(3) Aranya Kand:

The word 'Aranya' means a forest. After leaving Chitrakoot, Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman moved ahead and entered the denser parts of the wilds, those parts of the forests that were far away from any kind human habitation, and were infested by demons and wild beasts, had undulating hills and mountains as well as water bodies, and where sages, hermits and ascetics lived to carry on with their spiritual pursuits undisturbed, in a secluded environment of solitude and peace, places where they could live in harmony with Nature.

(i) Jayanta: He was the son of Indra, the king of gods. Like his father, he too was crooked by nature, unnecessarily provoking Lord Ram for no reason. Once Jayant assumed the form of a crow to tease Lord Ram as he reclined to relax, as well as to test the prowess of the Lord. Jayanta came hurriedly and pricked Sita's foot, which started bleeding. Annoyed at this unwarranted provocation, Lord Ram decided to punish him. So the Lord shot a blade of grass instead of an arrow to show Jayanta his miraculous powers. This blade of grass followed the stupid crow wherever he went to hide; no one gave him shelter against Lord Ram. Finally, sage Narad advised him to go and surrender before Lord Ram and ask for forgiveness. Lord Ram excused him, but since the symbolic arrow shot by him must hit some target, the Lord made the grass hit the crow's eye, thereby blinding him in one eye but sparing his life. It is believed that since that time, crows are abhorred by all, and that they can't see with one eye. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Doha no. 2.]

Lord Ram met some of the greatest sages of the time during his journey through the denser parts of the forests. The prominent ones who the Lord met in Aranya Kand are the following:

(ii) Sage Atri: He was the first sage Lord Ram met after leaving Chitrakoot. The sage offered his obeisance to Lord Ram, and Sita paid her respects to the sage's wife named Anusuiya, who instructed her on some of the stellar qualities that a virtuous woman must possess. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 7.]

Sage Atri is an ancient sage credited with the composition of the 5th Mandal of the Rig Veda Samhita. His name appears in other places in the Rig Veda Samhita also (10/137/4 for instance). His disciples assumed his name as their surname and came to be known as Aatreyas.

The sage is classified as a 'Maharishi' because he was one of the senior and the most exalted sages of his time. He is listed as a member of the Sapta-rishis, the cluster of seven celestial sages. Therefore, according to mythology, he is also a member of the Sapta Rishi Mandal, or the cluster of seven stars known as the Great Bear.

He is said to be one of the ten Manas-putras or mental born sons of the creator Brahma. Therefore, he was one of the Prajapatis or progenitors of mankind also. He is said to have given protection to the Sun God against the demon Svarbhaanu who caused the solar eclipse by composing a 'fourth' hymn against the curse of the eclipse, the other three being the usual liturgy of prayers offered during the eclipse to save the Sun God from this curse. He is said to be chief priest of the five ancient tribes of Vedic period settlers called the Panch-janas. When he was tortured by the demons, he was rescued by the Ashwini-kumars.

Atri's wife was the famous hermitress named Anusuiya (meaning one who has no jealousy against anyone). She was the daughter of Kardama Prajapati and a stellar instance of chastity and virtuousness as a wife and a hermitress. According to mythological accounts, sage Atri and his chaste wife Anusuya were childless, and having a desire to have a son they prayed and did severe penance. All the three gods of the Hindu Trinity, i.e. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder appeared before the couple and requested them to ask for a boon. Upon the couple's request, all the three Gods became their sons. Brahma became the sage known as Chandra representing the Moon God, Vishnu became the wise and enlightened sage Dattatreya, and Shiva became the angry sage Durvasa.

During his forest sojourn, Lord Ram had visited him in the Dandakaaranya forest where the sage preached him the nuances of Dharma (Ramanya by Valmiki, Aranyakand, 117). He was an authority on Dharma (tenets of righteousness, probity and propriety) and has been quoted in the Manusmriti (3/16) and the epic Mahabharata (in its Anushaashan Parva, 65/1).

A separate text called the 'Atreya Dharma Shastra' is attributed to him. It has nine chapters that deal with Daan (charitable donations and gifts), Japa (prayers) and Tapa (austerity and penances). Other texts attributed to him are the 'Atri Smriti' and the 'Atri Samhita'. The latter has roughly 400 verses and deals with the principles of Dharma.

The Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4 was revealed as an answer that sage Yagyavalkya gave to sage Atri when the latter approached the former to enquire about the secrets of the Atma. Incorporated in this answer is the importance of Kashi (Varanasi) as the Avimukta Kshetra—i.e. the place on earth that provides spiritual Mukti to the dying person.

(iii) Sage Sarbhanga (also pronounced as 'Sharbhanga'): After taking his leave from sage Atri, the next great devotee-sage Lord Ram met was Sarbhanga. He was a disciple of sage Agastya. At the time the Lord met him, the sage was so lost in meditating upon Lord Ram and the ecstasy that it granted him that for some time he remained completely oblivious of the presence of the Lord right in his front. Lord Ram was greatly moved by the sage's affection and devotion for him, and their meeting was exceptionally emotional. When Lord Ram asked the overwhelmed sage what boon he wished to be granted, the sage said he wished nothing but undiluted and eternal devotion for the Lord, which of course was granted to him. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 7—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 12.]

(iv) Sage Agastya: The next great sage Lord Ram met was sage Agastya, also known as Kumbhaj. It was sage Agastya who had advised Lord Ram to go to Panchavati on the banks of river Godavari to spend some time there so that the sages, hermits and ascetics living in the vicinity could be blessed by the Lord's divine presence. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 17 that precedes Doha no. 13.]

Sage Agastya is a renowned sage who had composed several of the hymns of the Rig Veda, e.g. Rig Veda Sanhita, 1/166-191. He is known as a 'Brahm-rishi' or a celestial sage tracing his origin to the creator Brahma.

He was born to sage Pulastya and his wife Havirbhuk. During this birth, his other brother was sage Visrawaa. It is also believed that in the Swayambhu Manvantar (age of Manu named Swambhu), he was born as the son of sage Pulastya, but in that birth he was named Dattoli.

According to another version, he was the son of Mitra and Varuna. In this version, he was born in a jar or pitcher known as 'Kumbha'. Hence, he is also known as Kumbhaja (born out of a Kumbha), Kumbhodbhava (rising out of a Kumbha), Kalasi-suta (son born from a Kalas or a pitcher or jar). During this birth, his twin brother was sage Vasistha, the great sage who was the court priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya where Lord Ram was the king.

His wife was a princess of the kingdom of Vidharva, and her name was Lopaamudraa, also known as Kaaveri. The sage had a son whose name was Drudhaasya, also known as Idhmavaaha.

His chief disciple was Agniveshya.

Sage Agastya did severe Tapa and had vast knowledge. He is said to have destroyed the two demons named Ilvala and Vaataapi. The sage had stunted the growth of Mt. Vindhya which was growing and expanding endlessly so much so as to obstruct the light of the sun.

According to legend, sage Agastya had dried up the ocean by drinking it in three gulps. He had used the joint palms of his hands to scoop up the water to gulp it down.

This story is narrated in: (i) Skanda Puran, Nagar Khand, (ii) Padma Puran, Srishti Khand, (iii) the epic Mahabharat, Vanparva, Cantos 103-105; and (iv) Anand Ramayan, Vilaas Kand, Canto 9, verse nos. 18-24. This feat of sage Agastya is cited by Goswami Tulsidas in his epic narration of the story of Lord Ram, known as the Ram Charit Manas, in its Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 32; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 256.

There are three versions of how Agastya had drunk the ocean. Let us read them in brief now.

(a) Once, when Indra had killed the demon Vrittaasur, other demons named 'Kaaleya' managed to escape and they hid themselves under the water of the ocean. From there they began terrorizing the sages and seers. They stayed under water during daytime and came out at night to torment and devour these sages, and generally cause nuisance and havoc all around. These demons had not spared even such renowned sages of the time as Vasistha, Chyavan and Bharadwaj, because the demons attacked their hermitages and killed the sages and seers who lived there. It was then that the Gods, led by their king Indra, requested sage Agastya to somehow expose the demons. At this, the sage had scooped up the water of the ocean in a cup made by joining the two palms of his hands and had drunk the water of the ocean in one gulp so as to expose the demons. The Gods were then able to destroy them.

Some of the demons, however, managed to escape and hid themselves in the nether world. This is how the demon race survived then. However, when the ocean was completely dried up it created another problem for the world because countless marine creatures begin to suffer and die. Besides this, the ocean was the largest natural reservoir of water on earth. So the Gods requested sage Agastya to refill it. The sage replied that the water has been digested in his stomach, but he can oblige the Gods by reproducing the ocean in the form of urine. That is the reason, according to this legendary story of the Purans, why the ocean is salty and sour—because it is the urine of sage Agastya.

(b) This fact, that the ocean is sour and salty because it is the urine of sage Agastya, is explicitly narrated in the Anand Ramayan (purported to have been written by sage Valmiki), in its Vilaas Kand (Chapter), ninth Sarga (Canto), verse nos. 18-24 where Sita explains to Lopaamudraa, the wife of sage Agastya, why Sri Ram had constructed the bridge in order to cross the ocean to reach Lanka. She explained that the Lord did not ask the sage to dry up the ocean once again by drinking its water because it would be unthinkable to ask the sage to drink his own urine. Even if the sage had actually drunk the water, the Lord would be heaped with the ignominy of being so selfish that he made a Brahmin drink his own urine so that his purpose is served. The Lord did not swim across the ocean because it would be insulting and extremely demeaning for the Lord to swim in urine, and it would also be improper for him to step across a Brahmin's urine because it is to be regarded as holy as the urine of a cow.

According to this legend, the ocean had washed away the items of worship that sage Agastya had arranged for his routine religious rituals. Agastya became peeved and drank up the ocean. When the gods prayed to him to forgive the ocean, the kind sage obliged and refilled it in the form of his urine. That is the reason why the ocean is bitter and salty like urine.

(c) The third version is this: Sage Agastya once took pity on a bird whose eggs were washed away by the ocean. The grieving bird was trying to dry the water of the ocean by picking drops of it in its beak. Then the sage decided to punish the ocean by drinking it up.

In all these versions, one thing is found common, and it is that the sage had invoked the divine powers of Lord Ram to accomplish this unique feat. He had pronounced the Mantra (spiritual formula to invoke the cosmic powers of a chosen deity) of Lord Ram, which is “Raamaaye Raamchandraaye Raambhadraaye”.

There is a legendary story how once sage Agastya had converted king Nahush as a serpent. The story goes that once Indra, the king of Gods, was demoted from his exalted stature due to the curse of killing some Brahmins, and king Nahush had taken his place. Nahush lustfully eyed the consort of Indra, named Indrani. To punish him, Brihaspati, the moral preceptor of Gods, devised a stratagem by which Indrani requested Nahush to come to her riding a palanquin that was never used by anyone earlier. Overcome and blinded by passions, Nahush forgot everything about propriety and probity, and he summoned all the great sages and seers of the time to act as carriers or bearers of his palanquin. Humble sages and seers did not mind because Nahush was now elevated to the stature of Indra, the king of Gods. Nahush was so eager to reach heaven as quickly as possible that he kept prodding and scolding these sages to walk faster. Enraged, astonished and peeved at this nonsense being perpetrated by the haughty king, sage Agastya had then cursed him to become a great and poisonous snake. This story appears in Mahabharat, Anushaashan Parva, 99-100.

Sage Agastya lived in the Dandakaaranya forest when Lord Ram met him. The sage had then given some invincible divine weapons to the Lord which stood him in good stead during the epic war of Lanka, as well as in overcoming the demons whom the Lord encountered and destroyed during his sojourn in the formidable forest.

The sage is said to have brought about reconciliation between Indra, the king of Gods, and Maruts, the Wind Gods.

A whole class of people came to be known after him, and in due course the term ‘Agastya’ became a title and sort of honour given to learned sages and seers who were experts in the philosophy and knowledge that sage Agastya was an expert in and had preached during his lifetime. The sage has been made immortal by finding a place amongst the brightest stars in the sky. He is identified with Canopus, which is the brightest star in the sky of south India. The Canopus has been named after this sage as ‘Agastya’, and seeing this star in the sky when the sun is in the middle of Virgo (Kanyaa) sign of the zodiac and worshipping him at night is regarded as an auspicious deed. This is a symbolic way of honouring the sage by elevating him to an exalted stature of a ‘bright star’ and recognizing his stellar qualities.

He is regarded as the one who had created the Tamil language of South India. He is accredited as being the author of several treatises on medicine, mysticism and magic. One of his books is the ‘Agastya Sanhita’ which elaborately deals with ritualistic forms of worship.

It is said that once sage Agastya and the noble king named Shankha had a divine vision of Lord Vishnu at the banks of river Swami-pushkarni.

Now, we come to prominent demons that Lord Ram encountered in Aranya Kand:-

(v) Demon Viradha (pronounced as Virādha): He was the first demon the Lord encountered after entering the wildest part of the forest. The Lord slayed in immediately, and granted his soul deliverance from the evil body of a demon. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precedes Doha no. 7.]

(vi) Female demon Supernakha (pronounced as Śūrpaṇakhā): She was a sister of Ravana, the king of the demon race. She was so enamoured by the charm of Lord Ram that she proposed to marry him. At this unscrupulous behaviour of hers, the Lord got so annoyed that he got her nose and ears chopped-off at the hands of Laxman to not only punish her but also to send a signal to Ravana that the Lord has arrived to challenge the demon king's authority. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 17 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-20 that precede it.]

(vii) Demons Khar and Dushan: They were the cousins of Supernakha and commanders of the demon army deputed by Ravana to take care of the forest known as 'Dandakaranya', the most inhabitable part of the wild. When Supernakha reported to them that she has been deformed by Lord Ram, the duo attacked the Lord with a huge army of demons. In the ensuing battle, both were slain. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 18—to Doha no. 20.]

This was the second full-scale battle that Lord Ram had with the ferocious demon army, the first was at the time of protecting the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra in Baal Kand where Subahu was eliminated and Marich flung away to a remote island around Panchavati, Chitrakoot in central India.

(viii) Demon Marich (Mārīca): The demon whom Lord Ram had flung away to a remote island during his encounter with the demons while protecting the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra. Marich was forced by Ravana to become a deer with a golden hide so that Sita could be distracted. Seeing this unique deer, Sita asked her husband Lord Ram to go and bring the deer for her. When the Lord went away, Ravana abducted Sita. Marich was eventually shot down by Lord Ram, but as always the compassionate Lord granted him emancipation and salvation. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 23—to Doha no. 27.]

(ix) Demon Kabandha: He was a hideous demon shaped like an octopus, with limbs protruding from a ball-like rounded body. In his previous life he was a Gandharva, a demi-god who is believed to be a musician of heaven. He was cursed by sage Durbasa to become a demon. Lord Ram granted him deliverance too. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 33—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 34.]

(x) Jatau (pronounced as Jaṭāyu): The great and courageous vulture who had intercepted the chariot in which Ravana was taking away Sita to Lanka. Jatau tried his best to free Sita, but his wings were cut by the abductor, Ravana. Jatau fell to the ground, wounded. He was spotted by Lord Ram and Laxman. Before dying, Jatau had told the Lord that the demon king had taken Sita away. Lord Ram did his last rites himself, an honour that is rare, an honour usually reserved for one's father or very near kith and kin, and which makes Jatau immortal in the echelons of exalted souls that had the privilege of being granted deliverance, emancipation and salvation by the Lord himself. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 29—to Doha no. 32.]

(xi) Sabari (pronounced as Śabari): She was an old woman who had served sage Matanga. She was blessed by the sage that she will have a divine communion with Lord Ram, an incarnation of the Supreme Being, which would give her final deliverance. Sri Ram had visited her hermitage while searching for Sita. It was she who directed him to Kishkindha where the Lord befriended the monkeys who helped him to conquer Lanka and rescue Sita. During their meeting, Lord Ram enjoyed fruits that the old lady gave him as refreshment. Lord Ram treated Sabari like his own mother, and he preached her the famous 9-fold path to Bhakti (i.e. the nine forms of devotion for Lord God). Like Jatau, Lord Ram did the last rites of Sabari himself, and granted her eternal beatitude and felicity. Sabari had advised Lord Ram to proceed to lake Pampa on his way to Kishkindha, the kingdom of the monkey and bear race beyond the Dandakaranya forest, where the Lord would meet Sugriv, the monkey chieftain, and he would help the Lord further. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 34—to Doha no. 36.]

(xii) Sage Narad: Before exiting the Dandakaranya forest and entering Kishkindha, Lord Ram was approached by the famed celestial sage Narad when the Lord reached the banks of a lake named Pampa as advised by Sabari, and decided to take some rest before moving ahead to Kishkindha. Narad had some questions which the Lord answered to his satisfaction. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Chanda line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 46.]

(4) Kishkindha Kand:

This is the fourth Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. ‘Kishkindha’ was the land of the monkey and bear race. It lay betwixt the kingdom of Lanka to the south, and the Dandakaranya forest and the inhabited part of the mainland beyond it to the north.

It was here that Lord Ram met Hanuman, Sugriv, Angad, Jamvant etc. who would physically help the Lord not only to trace Sita but also in the form of a huge army that the Lord needed to launch a military campaign to free her and eliminate the cruel demons led by Ravana in Lanka.

After leaving lake Pampa, Lord Ram and Laxman neared Mt. Rishyamook over which Surgiv, the younger brother of Baali, and a disinherited prince of the kingdom of Kishkindha, lived in exile with his trusted companions, including Hanuman.

(i) Hanuman: He became one of the greatest devotees of Lord Ram. When Lord Ram and Laxman were wondering at the foot of Mt. Rishyamook, Sugriv sent Hanuman to find out who they were. Hanuman came to Lord Ram disguised as a young Brahmin, and eventually they both recognized each other, realising that a strong emotional bond existed betwixt them from time immemorial. Hanuman took the two brothers to Sugriv and forged a bond of friendship betwixt Lord Ram and Sugriv, with Hanuman and the Fire God himself being a witness. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Doha no. 4.]

Later on, it was Hanuman who crossed over the mighty ocean to go to Lanka alone, discover Sita and meet her, have a direct first confrontation with Ravana, burning Lanka, and returning to Lord Ram to report everything. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30—to Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 33.]

During the war of Lanka, when Laxman was seriously wounded and lay unconscious on the battle-field, Hanuman had first brought the medicine man named Sushen, from inside the city of Lanka, to diagnose Laxman's ailment and prescribe the right herb, and had then gone to the remote northern mountains to bring the needed medicine, where, unable to find the correct herb, he had uprooted the entire mountain block and carried it aloft on his hand all the way to Lanka, a singularly glorious and stupendous feat of courage, resolution, strength of arms, ability and agility performed by an individual in the annals of history of unique achievements by anyone anywhere in the world. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 54—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 62.]

Hanuman was also believed to be a son of the Wind God, hence called 'Maruti'. Later on in the war, he had brought the herb to revive Laxman when he was wounded in the battle-field. Hanuman also played a pivotal role in the epic war and the final conquest of Lanka and the defeat of the demon army.

(ii) Sugriv: He was the younger brother of Baali, the king of Kishkindha. Sugriv was thrown out of the kingdom due to certain misunderstanding betwixt the two brothers. He lived in exile on top of the Rishyamook mountain where Lord Ram and he became friends. He was reinstated on the throne of Kishkindha, and in return he had helped Lord Ram in finding out about the whereabouts of Sita and rescuing her by lending his huge army of monkeys and bears to the Lord. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Kishkindha Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 4—to Doha no. 11; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 22—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 23; (b) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 34—to Doha no. 35.]

(iii) Baali/Vaali (pronounced as Vālī): The king of Kishkindha and the monkey race. He was also the elder brother of Sugriv whom Lord Ram met and befriended on Mt.

Rishamook. Since Baali had wrongly beaten Sugriv and not only disinherited him from his right as a prince but had also snatched Sugriv's wife, Lord Ram slayed him for his reckless and unrighteous behaviour. As was his nature, Lord Ram also granted Baali with the spiritual reward of deliverance, emancipation and salvation. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 6—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 11.]

(iv) Angad: He was the son of Baali, and in due course of time he became one of the favourites of Lord Ram. At the time of his death, Baali had entrusted Angad's safety into the hands of Lord Ram, requesting the Lord to take care of Angad by holding him by his hand and looking after his welfare in the same way as he would do for his very own and faithful servant. After his father's death, when his uncle was made the king of Kishkindha, Angad was appointed as a prince and the heir-apparent of the kingdom by Lord Ram, which meant that after Sugriv's death, Angad would become the next king. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chanda line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 10; Doha no. 11.]

Angad was loved by Lord Ram no less than the Lord loved Hanuman. The Lord chose Angad to be his emissary to the court of Ravana in a last attempt to avoid the ruinous bloody war of Lanka, and like Hanuman earlier, Angad trounced the vanity and pride of the demon king, thereby breaking the morale of the demon army prior to the commencement of the epic war of Lanka. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 17—to Doha no. 35-a.]

Lord Ram acknowledged Angad's abilities and intelligence when the Lord openly praised him for these qualities. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 17.]

Besides this, Angad fought alongside Hanuman in the war, and the two proved to be the most formidable, valiant and powerful warriors during the progress of the war. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 45; Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 6-8 that precede Doha no. 47.]

(v) Jamvant: He was the chief of the bear community, old in age, and a wise person who was always consulted before any action was taken. It is believed that he was a manifestation of the creator Brahma. It was on his advice that Hanuman was selected to go across the ocean to search Sita in Lanka. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-12 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 30.]

During the war itself, Jamvant had shown his mettle by fighting extremely ferociously and valiantly, tackling Ravana and thrashing him violently when the fierce demon king, furious in war, had managed to beat to the ground even Hanuman who was one of the most powerful warriors in the army of Lord Ram. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-15 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 98.]

(vi) Nala and Neela: They were amongst the senior commanders of the monkey forces. These two brothers were expert builders, and the bridge across the ocean was constructed by them. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 60; and Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 2.]

During the war too, the two brave and valorous brothers fought most gallantly like their peers, Angad, Hanuman, Jamvant, Dwivid etc., and like Angad and Hanuman who formed redoubtable comrades-in-arm vis-à-vis their enemies in the battle-field, Nala and Neela too were close to each other and proved themselves formidable in all actions that took place during the war. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 43; Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 65.]

There are instances in the war of Lanka where the four most valorous warriors of Lord Ram's army, i.e. Hanuman, Angad, Nala and Neela, have gallantly fought a battle with the demon army by standing side-by-side to each other. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 73.]

(vii) Sampaati (pronounced Sampāti): He was an old vulture and an elder brother of Jatau. He lived on the shore of the ocean. When the team of monkeys and bears reached the shore of the ocean and did not know what to do to find Sita, it was he who had told them that she was present in Lanka, an island in the middle of the ocean. Anyone who could go there will find her. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 27—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 29.]

(viii) The Hermitress: The team of monkeys and bears who went in the south direction in search of Sita soon became very thirsty, but there was no water to be found anywhere. Searching frantically here and there, Hanuman eventually descried the mouth of a cave where he espied many kinds of water-birds entering and exiting cheerfully. Deducing that it meant there was water somewhere inside the cave, the group trooped in. Deep inside the cave they saw a hermitress in a meditative posture. Her name was 'Swayamprabha', i.e. one who was radiant with self-generated spiritual energy. When the group introduced itself to her, she told them about herself and her desire to go and meet Lord Ram, and she also told them the way out of the blind cave. She then went to have a divine view of Lord Ram, and thence went on to the northern mountains to do Tapa (austerity and penance) at a place called Badrivan. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 24—to Doha no. 25.]

(5) Sundar Kand:

This is the fifth Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. In this Kanda, Hanuman entered Lanka disguised literally 'as a small mosquito', but in practice it means he entered Lanka in a diminutive form, a size that was very small as compared to the colossus frame of the demon inhabitants of the city-state of Lanka.

As to the question why is this Kanda called ‘Sundar’, a discussion has already been made earlier in the previous chapter nos. 2 and 3, titled ‘Preamble’ and ‘The Story of Ram Charit Manas in Brief’ respectively, and would be more elaborately discussed when we arrive at the Sundar Kand itself in due course of our reading of this fascinating Story.

Since Lanka was the kingdom of the Demon Race, it is obvious that all those who Hanuman met here were demons. But not all were evil creatures; some amongst them were good souls who had become demon by body just because king Pratapbhanu had been cursed that all the subjects of his kingdom would too become demons alongside himself. As a consequence of this ridiculous curse, even the good citizens of the great king’s kingdom were forced to become demons by body even though they retained their earlier goodness in their hearts as inheritance brought forward from their previous lives. Hence, Hanuman encountered two types of demons in Lanka—one who were truly bad and real demons, i.e. evil and vile, and others who were good in their hearts but had to follow the rules of Nature which ordained them to behave like a demon irrespective of what they felt inside their hearts. Examples of the former category of demons were Lankini, Trijata, Mandodari, Suk, Malyawant etc. Examples of the evil demons were obviously the rest of them, and the chief in this category was Meghanad, the son of Ravana. Vibhishan was a controversial figure, as on one hand he is praised for his devotion and loyalty for Lord Ram, and on the other hand he is reviled as a traitor and betrayer of his family, race and country. A detailed note regarding him is appended against his name herein below in this section.

(i) Ravana and his brother Kumbhakaran, however, offered a paradox—for they were ruthless demons outwardly, epitomizing all the vices, evils, cruelties and all forms of negativities that are synonymous with the word ‘demon’, but inwardly their souls were holy and pure, yearning for deliverance, salvation and emancipation. Perhaps this is the primary reason why both of them attained oneness with Lord Ram by having their souls enter the holy body of the Lord, to merge with the Lord’s Supreme Soul, to attain final beatitude and rest for themselves as they had always wished for. The compassionate Lord Ram granted their wish to them because the Lord is all-knowing, and he does not judge a creature merely from his external behaviour, but gives equal weight to the creature’s internal feelings and thoughts, for more often than not exterior is very misleading and false. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 71 (in case of Kumbhakaran); and (ii) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 103 (in case of Ravana).]

(ii) Mainak (pronounced as Maināka): The patron deity of the ocean asked this mountain to lift itself midway in the ocean so that Hanuman can take some rest before proceeding ahead to Lanka. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 1 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.]

(iii) Sursa (pronounced as Sursā): She was the mother of sea-serpents and lived in the ocean. When Hanuman was on his way to Lanka, flying over the surface of the water,

Sursa was asked by the gods to test Hanuman's abilities. She blocked his way, but Hanuman easily outwitted her. She was pleased at his intelligence and wit, and blessed him with success in his endeavour. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 2 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-12 that precede it.]

(iv) The Female Demon of the ocean: This demoness lived underwater in the depth of the ocean and had the magical ability to catch the shadow of anyone flying overhead. She tried her trick over Hanuman, and was slain by him. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 3.]

(v) Lankini: After landing in Lanka, the first demon Hanuman met was a female guard of the gates of the fort of Lanka. Her name was Lankini. She had the enviable ability to see anyone entering the gates secretly. When she challenged Hanuman, the latter punched her so hard that a single blow made her swoon and bleed from her mouth. Lankini then recalled what Brahma had once told her, and realized that this intruder is a messenger from Lord Ram. So she allowed Hanuman to enter the city without further creating a hue and cry. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 4—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 5.]

(vi) Vibhishan (Vibhīṣaṇa): The younger brother of the king of demons, Ravana. He was a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, and by extension of Lord Ram. When Hanuman was searching for Sita in the city of Lanka, it was he who told him about the garden where Sita was help captive. Later on, he was insulted and kicked by his elder brother Ravana when he tried to persuade his brother to become reasonable and give Sita back to her husband. It was due to this humiliation that he joined sides with Lord Ram. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 6—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 8; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 40—to Doha no. 41.]

The character of Vibhishan is a controversial one, for though it is undeniable that he was a pious soul devoted to Lord Ram, yet it cannot also be overlooked that he was a traitor and a betrayer of his family, race and country. If Ravana can be accused of committing a great crime of kidnapping a gentleman's chaste wife, in this case Sita, the wife of Lord Ram, Vibhishan had committed a graver and more serious crime of treason and betrayal by divulging all the secrets of Lanka and its army that enabled Lord Ram and his forces to finally defeat the demons. Had it not been for the turn-coat Vibhishan's help, the course of events during the war of Lanka would have been completely different than what they actually were, and in all probability the rout of Ravana and his demon army would not have been as complete as it actually was.

When Hanuman had failed to trace Sita in Lanka, it was Vibhishan who had told him where to find her<sup>1</sup>; it was Vibhishan who had told Lord Ram the reality of the sound of thunder and dazzle of light that emanated from the direction of the fort of Lanka when the Lord's army landed on the shore of the demon kingdom, at which the Lord shot an arrow that fell Ravana's crown and cut-off his wife Mandodari's ear-rings, an attack that was unprovoked and uncalled for, but was meant merely to insult and humiliate the demon king<sup>2</sup>; as the war progressed, Vibhishan divulged all the secrets of the preparations being done by the demons to fight Lord Ram's army and gain victory in the war<sup>3</sup>, such as about the arrival of Kumbhakaran and fire sacrifices being done by Meghanad and Ravana to win<sup>4</sup>; and finally the secret of Ravana's long life by pointing out to Lord Ram that it lay in his navel, resulting in the Lord shooting an arrow at this part of the demon king's body and bringing about his death<sup>5</sup>.

(vii) Ravana: The great king of the demon race and seemingly an invincible ruler of Lanka, the capital city of the demons. He had kidnapped Sita, and was finally killed in the epic war. We have already read in detail about him under the heading 'Baal Kand'.

(viii) Meghanad: He was one of the bravest demon in the race, next only to his father Ravana in bravery, courage, strength of arm, valour, gallantry, dare-devilry, resolution, resilience, and all other such traits that are considered as adornments of a great warrior. It was Meghanad who succeeded in capturing Hanuman when the latter destroyed the royal garden of Ravana. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 19—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 20.]

Later on in Lanka Kand, Meghanad had to fierce duels with Laxman, where he fell Laxman by seriously wounding him during the first round, but was subsequently killed by Laxman in the second bout. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Doha no. 49—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 54; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Doha no. 76.]

(viii) Trijataa (Trijaṭā): The demoness deputed by Ravana to keep a close watch on Sita. She became sympathetic towards her ward Sita, and had always encouraged the latter to keep her hope alive, for then one day she would succeed in being reunited with her beloved Lord Ram. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 11—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 12; (ii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 99—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 100.]

She was a daughter of Vibhishan, the younger brother of Ravana and a great devotee of Lord Ram. Her mother was Sarama, the wife of Vibhishan.

(ix) Mandadori: She was the wise wife of Ravana who had tried on several occasions to persuade her husband to return Sita to Lord Ram in order to avoid a ruinous war, but the demon king was so stubborn that he paid no heed to her. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 36—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 37; (b) Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 6—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 8; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 16; (iii) Doha no. 35-b—to Doha no. 37.]

(x) Demon Suk / Suka: He was a trusted spy of Ravana and was sent by him to spy on Vibhishan, Ravana's younger brother whom the demon king had kicked out of Lanka and who decided to go and seek refuge with Lord Ram. Suk was so highly impressed by Lord Ram's compassionate and lovable nature that he had a turn of heart. When he returned to report back to Ravana, he chided the latter sternly and requested him to end hostility with Lord Ram. Ravana kicked him too, and like Vibhishan Suk also went to Lord Ram to seek the Lord's blessings. In his previous life, Suk was a great sage, but unfortunately he was cursed by sage Agastya, which resulted in his becoming a demon. By Lord Ram's grace Suk was freed from that curse, and resuming his earlier form he went to his previous hermitage to continue with his spiritual exercises as before. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51—to Chaupai line no. 12 that precedes Doha no. 57.]

(xi) Malyawant: He was an old and wise demon minister of Ravana. He was one of the few pious souls in Lanka who had tried to persuade Ravana on several occasions to give Sita back to Lord Ram and end hostility with the Lord. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 40; and (b) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 49.]

(6) Lanka Kand:

Lanka Kand is the sixth Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. It describes all the developments that took place after Lord Ram's army crossed the ocean and landed on the soil of Lanka, the kingdom of the demons. The famed War of Lanka has been described here in vivid detail. The Kanda ends with victory for Lord Ram, his reunion with Sita, Vibhishan ascending the throne of the kingdom, and finally Lord Ram leaving for his capital city of Ayodhya onboard the plane called Pushpak, along with Sita and Laxman, and selected chiefs of both the monkey and bear army, such as Sugriv, Angad, Jamvant, Nala, Neela etc., as well as the demons led by Vibhishan.

(i) Kalnemi: His name appears later on in Lanka Kand, when Ravana approached him to go and block Hanuman's path when the latter was on his way to bring the herb required to revive Laxman. Kalnemi was slayed by Hanuman. At the time of death, Kalnemi uttered the holy name of Lord Ram, as a result of which he found deliverance and emancipation for himself. [Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 58.]

(ii) Some of the other great demon warriors mentioned in Lanka Kand, besides the close family members of Ravana, such as Ravana, Kumbhakaran, Vibhishan, Malyawan and Meghanad who have already been described earlier in the respective Kandas where they are first mentioned, and hence being skipped here, are the following: Durmukha, Sur-ripu, Manuj-ahaari, Bhat, Atikaaye, Akampan, the hefty one (Bhaari), Mahodar, etc. [Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-12 that precede Doha no. 62.]

(7) Uttar Kand:

This is the seventh and the last Canto or Chapter of Ram Charit Manas. It is so-called for the following primary reasons:

(a) From Lanka, Lord Ram headed to his capital of Ayodhya aboard the Pushpak plane, and since Ayodhya was to the 'north' of Lanka, the chapter that describes all those events that followed the Lord's victory in Lanka and when he proceeded northwards, is called Uttar Kand, for the word 'Uttar' means 'north'.

(b) Since this book Ram Charit Manas is a holy book, instead of being a mere narration of some great prince's heroic deeds and exploits, for it describes the story of Lord Ram who was the Supreme Being himself in a human form, and also because this book contains numerous instances where laws of Dharma (principles of good conduct and righteousness) as well as those of spiritualism and metaphysics are expounded and shown by practical examples, it is in the likeness of a scripture, and classical scriptures had their last Canto named as Uttar Kand, or Uttarasrdha, meaning the second half or the concluding part of a treatise where profound principles are once again reiterated and summarized before ending the book.

This observation is particularly true with Ram Charit Manas as the second half of its Uttar Kand narrates the discourse of the saintly crow named Kaagbhusund, which is one of the finest examples of a discourse on spiritual values, especially those related to having devotion and love for Lord God as the easiest and the best practical way to attain beatitude and eternal bliss.

(i) Sage Kaagbhusund: He was a saintly crow, deeply devoted to Lord Ram, and a pious and holy soul. The second half of Uttar Kand is entirely devoted to him. Kaagbhusund had his hermitage in the northern mountains where he regularly preached on spiritual matters, with emphasis on subjects related to devotion and affection for Lord Ram as a means to attain liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation, a path that grants eternal bliss, beatitude and felicity to a creature.

Towards this end, he used to recite and discourse on the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas. Even Lord Shiva himself had once heard this divine story of Lord Ram being narrated by Kaagbhusund.

The episode of Kaagbhusund is high in its spiritual and metaphysical quotient, and in a way it is an exposition in a simple language on the essence and the glorious spiritual virtues for which the story of Ram Charit Manas is so famed and revered. In the midst of so many paths to one spiritual goal that have been prescribed by myriads of teachers and schools of philosophies, leading to a lot of confusion and distraction, the advise of sage Kaagbhusund is like a one, single window solution to all questions that a spiritual aspirant may want answered. To that end, this episode is aptly called ‘Kaagbhusund Ramayana’—as it is entirely devoted in explaining the spiritual importance and significance of the divine story of Lord Ram, and how a creature can benefit from it, what it teaches him, and in the middle of all confusion in this mortal world, which is the safest and the easiest path for him to follow in order to attain emancipation and salvation for his soul, and enjoy eternal peace, beatitude and bliss.

The discourse of Kaagbhusund is the most glorious part of Ram Charit Manas as it epitomises the best of spiritual nectar that one can expect to derive by reading the divine story of Lord Ram. The spiritual message of this divine story has been filtered and condensed and presented in its pristine pure form by this saintly crow for the welfare of all living beings, in a language devoid of metaphysical jargon, and in a way that can actually be practiced in one’s routine life.

From this perspective, Ram Charit Manas is a singularly remarkable narrative of the life and time of Lord Ram as compared to all other such narratives, because its crowning glory is the episode of Kaagbhusund, which gives this narrative the hue of an Upanishad, an authoritative scripture on spiritual, theological and metaphysical matters related to Lord Ram.

The episode pertaining to sage Kaagbhusund is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. that precedes Doha no. 55—to Doha no. 130.

(ii) Garud: He is the celestial mount of Lord Vishnu. Though he was always close to Lord Vishnu and was fully acquainted with the divinity and greatness of the Lord, yet once he was confused by Lord Ram’s ordinary human-like behaviour, doubting the authenticity of the Lord and falling prey to delusions so much so that he was completely confounded and lost his peace of mind, becoming restless and unsettled. So he approached Lord Shiva to remove his perplexities, at which the Lord directed him to the hermitage of Kaagbhusund. The discourse that followed forms the subject matter of the so-called ‘Kaagbhusund Ramayana’ that forms the second half of Ram Charit Manas as noted herein above.

All the rest of the characters named in Uttar Kand have appeared elsewhere in Ram Charit Manas, chiefly in Baal Kand and Ayodhya Kand, and briefly introduced there itself.

(Bāla-Kāṇḍa)

Summary: The Baal Kand (pronounced “Bāla-Kāṇḍa”) is the 1st Canto of the Holy Book ‘Ram Charit Manas’. This Canto opens with verses that offer prayers and obeisance to different gods, goddesses and deities as well as saints and pious souls to invoke their blessings, and at the same time prayers are also offered to non-saints, unholy and evil souls so that they do not create unwarranted hindrances and problems out of jealousy, malice, ill-will and ego.

Then we move on to verses that extol the holy name of Lord Ram and the importance of the Lord’s divine story, enumerating their many spiritual benefits and rewards, as well as their divinity and holiness, and their metaphysical significance and importance vis-à-vis spiritual welfare of a devotee.

This is followed by a brief narration of the Genesis of the Story of ‘Ram Charit Manas’, how and by whom it was first conceived, and how it then passed down to us in its present form, which we are reading.

Then comes an outline of the different causes which obliged the Supreme Being to manifest himself in a human form as Lord Ram.

Then we read in detail the story of Lord Shiva’s marriage with Parvati, which is followed by three other narratives that tell us the reason why the Supreme Being assumed the form of Lord Ram. The first story in this respect is that of sage Narad getting deluded so much that he cursed Lord Vishnu to become a human being; the second story relates to king Manu and Satrupa doing severe Tapa (penances) with a desire to have the Lord as their son; and the third describes the fascinating story of an upright and famous king named Pratapbhanu who became the demon Ravana due to certain developments arising out of his ill fate when he was cursed unwittingly by Brahmins to become a demon along with his entire family and subjects.

These stories, along with many other things and narratives that are part of this holy book and so finely woven into the texture that they embellish the narrative with countless gems of spiritual wisdom and metaphysical principles that gel perfectly with the overall flow of the story, one such example being the discourse of saintly crow Kaagbhusund that he gave for the benefit of Garud, the heavenly mount of Lord Vishnu, that make Ram Charit Manas a unique narration of the famed story of Lord Ram that is otherwise universally known as the 'Ramayana'.

After this introduction, a sort of a preamble, which covers almost a half of Baal Kand, starts the actual narration of the story of Lord Ram, i.e. the Ramayana, which our learned poet Goswami Tulsidas chose to call 'Ram Charit Manas' as, to begin with, it originated in the heart of Lord Shiva in some ancient time, and even today it finds a place of immense honour and great reverence in the heart of pious souls and saintly persons, as well as devotees of the Lord, giving them profound spiritual peace, happiness and joy, as well as a feeling of bliss, blessedness, felicity and beatitude wherever they are, and in whatever situation or condition they are in, in this mortal world, thereby paving the way for their deliverance, emancipation and salvation.

In this Canto no. 1 called 'Baal Kand', we read about the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan; celebrations that mark their birth; the Lord's childhood days and the joy he gave to everyone present during those times. Then we read how sage Vishwamitra took Lord Ram and his brother Laxman to his hermitage so that they can protect his fire sacrifice from being defiled by demons who worked under the command of their king Ravana of Lanka. Having successfully carried out this mission, the sage took the two brothers to Janakpur to attend the Bow-breaking competition that would lead to the marriage of the successful candidate with Sita, the princess of that kingdom. As it turned out, none of the famous and mighty kings and princes of earth, who had all assembled at the venue upon hearing of the famed beauty of Sita to try their luck in marrying her, failed to move the formidable Bow, thereby losing the chance to have her as their bride. Then, on the instructions of sage Vishwamitra, Lord Ram broke the Bow effortlessly. The city of Janakpur erupted in a spontaneous outburst of joy and cheer.

Then we read that for a brief while things seemed to turn hostile to Lord Ram, the victor, because sage Parashuram, a great devotee of Lord Shiva to whom this great originally belonged, upon hearing that his Lord's bow has been broken by someone at Janakpur, came angrily to punish the offender as he took it as an affront to Lord Shiva. An angry spat that was interspersed with taunts and sarcasm followed between the sage and Laxman, but at the end, after all his anger was vented out and he could do no harm to either Laxman or Lord Ram inspite of his fretting and fuming ferociously, the sage relented and realized that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human being as he thought him to be, but a manifestation of the Supreme Being who had come down to earth to fulfill certain divine mandate for the well and good of the entire creation.

The sage asked for forgiveness and went away. Then the ceremonies and celebrations, which were abruptly halted due to the sage's angry intervention, resumed once again. Messengers were sent to Ayodhya to invite Lord Ram's father, king Dasrath, to come to Janakpur with his party to attend the wedding ceremony of his son Lord Ram. A grand marriage procession left Ayodhya and was warmly received by king Janak of Janakpur. Then we read in detail about the marriage ceremony and its different rituals, the mass celebrations and euphoria that prevailed at that time. Not only Lord Ram but all his three brothers were also married simultaneously at the same venue. So it was a rare occasion for festivities and celebrations. With this marriage, a grand alliance was established between two mighty kingdoms of that time, one was Ayodhya, the kingdom of which Lord Ram and his brothers were princes and Dasrath was the king, and the other was Janakpur of which Sita and her sisters were the princesses and Janak was the king.

Finally, the four grooms and their respective brides, along with the grand marriage procession led by king Dasrath and the royal priest Vasistha and sage Viswamitra, left Janakpur and arrived at Ayodhya to a rousing welcome.

The Canto ends with a brief narration of grand celebrations at Ayodhya, thanksgiving, distribution of liberal gifts, and the general atmosphere of happiness and joy that prevailed all over the city and the royal household during the days that followed. Sage Vishwamitra took leave of king Dasrath and went back to his hermitage.

INVOCATION

varṇānām-artha-saṅghānām rasānām chandasām-api. 1.

maṅgalānām ca kartārau vandē vāṇī-vināyakau. 2.

‘I pay my obeisance to and express my deepest reverence for Goddess Saraswati (the patron goddess of speech; “vāṇī”) as well as Lord Vinayak (Lord Ganesh, the deity who removes all hurdles that may obstruct success in any endeavour, and the patron god of writing; “vināyaka”), who preside over a vast body of pristine pure knowledge of the Truth of Divinity, hitherto existing in an abstract and unknown form, that has been made intelligible and brought within the reach of all by the means of words and their component units known as the letters or the alphabets of the language, which are manifestations of the primordial sound containing that knowledge, and the further arrangement of such words into phrases, sentences and verses conforming to different forms of classical composition, so that they convey the correct meaning that is intended (and not distort the original knowledge and put it out of context), to give a definitive body and form to the original knowledge that was transcendental and too sublime and subtle to be accessed directly by anyone without these aforesaid aids.

I (Tulsidas) pay my deepest reverence and greatest obeisance to these two deities, Saraswati and Ganesh, because it is by their grace and magnanimity that the truthful knowledge of the divine has now been made known and intelligible by the means of the ‘spoken word’ as well as the ‘written word’, over which these two deities preside, for the general good of the world (and their grace has made it possible for me to write the Holy Book titled Ram Charit Manas). (Shloka line nos. 1-2)

[Note—The great saintly poet Goswami Tulsidas was about to pen his magnum opus called ‘Ram Charit Manas’. It was to be an unmatched classic in the realm of devotional literature ever written in the vernacular, a book which would be unique and an exceptional exposition on the profound principles of spiritualism and metaphysics explained by means of the traditional ‘story telling method’, which would make such principles easily comprehensible to one and all.

It was done with the singular noble objective of opening the door to the knowledge of the truth of the divine, a door to the fountain of spiritual nectar that was to be thrown wide open for the benefit of even the humblest and the most ordinary of persons who do not have the wherewithal to access traditional scriptures because of many factors, one of them being the barrier of the language, and the other being the profundity and density of their discourses that scared away the ordinary person who found himself out of his wits to come to grasp with them.

Thus, before he started writing and putting his pen to paper, Tulsidas gives his due respects to Goddess Saraswati, the goddess of speech, and thanks her, because it was by her grace and blessings that this great poet ‘heard’ the story of Ram Charit Manas from his Guru (teacher) when the latter ‘narrated’ it to him. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line nos. 1-2 of Doha no. 30-a, and line no. 1 of the next Doha no. 30-b.}

As is obvious, to narrate anything, the faculty of ‘speech’ is needed; this faculty is the vital bridge that helps the body of knowledge to be transmitted from the teacher to the disciple. Saraswati presides over this means of transmission, the faculty of ‘speech’; hence Tulsidas thanks her and expresses his gratitude to her for entitling and enabling him to access this source of sublime nectar of spiritual bliss and beatitude, which he now wishes to pass on to others for all to benefit from it, for such fountains of pristine pure spiritual nectar should be made available to all, and never kept under wraps selfishly.

Now, it’s alright to have great knowledge, to be exceptionally enlightened and wise, and become an expert in all spheres of spiritual, metaphysical and theological gnosis, but say, what use is this knowledge if it remains locked up and sequestered in the secret confines of the mind of the wise teacher if it is not revealed by transmitting it to his disciple or student, so that the latter, and through him the later generations, can benefit from it?

It would be like the case of letting an oil lamp burn inside a cupboard, with its door closed. By-and-by, when the oil runs out, the light of the lamp would go out on its own, only to leave dark soot blackening the inside the walls of the cupboard, with no good done to the outside. Had the doors of the cupboard been open while the lamp burnt with its brilliant light, there would have been no soot accumulating inside the cupboard to blacken its walls, and at the same time its light would have given so many others the opportunity to do some constructive work in its illumination while the lamp burnt brightly.

So is the case with knowledge: a wise teacher is one who shares the knowledge he possesses with others, and not let it perish with him when he dies. Therefore, Tulsidas first pays his respects to Goddess Saraswati to make this happen; he thanks her to enable his teacher to transmit the divine knowledge of Lord Ram to him through the means of the story of Ram Charit Manas that his teacher had narrated to him, and then he prays to the goddess to bless him so that he can himself transmit the same knowledge, without committing errors of omissions and commissions, to the next generation, and from then onwards to all the future generations.

Knowledge is transmitted by two primary methods: the ‘oral word’ and the ‘written word’. Knowledge that is transmitted by the oral method has its own limitations; it is limited to the teacher and the student; the words through which the knowledge is transmitted by the teacher can be misheard or not heard at all by the student, so that when later on in life the student himself becomes a teacher one day, the original knowledge which his own teacher gave him gets distorted when it is transmitted to this next generation of students, simply because the new teacher had inadvertently misheard or had missed hearing an important component of the knowledge while his teacher was teaching it to him earlier. The obvious consequence of this is that the primary form of the pristine pure body of knowledge gets diluted and polluted and corrupted, albeit inadvertently and unintentionally, but nonetheless defiled and lost of its pristine purity for the future generations, with no one to correct it later on as the source of this knowledge, the first teacher, is dead and gone.

Herein comes the importance of the ‘written word’: once the body of knowledge is written down, it takes on a definite, concrete form; the ideas intended to be conveyed during the transmission of this knowledge take a form of certainty as they are passed on from generation to generation without getting distorted and confused. At the most, the written word can be interpreted and explained by different teachers in different ways, but the original is still retained in its pristine pure form which any earnest seeker of Truth can rely on if he is not satisfied by what others interpret it to mean, in which case he has the option of studying the original Text himself to arrive at the Truth in a conscious manner.

So the written word is the second step, and the more robust one, in the transmission process of the Knowledge of the Divine. Lord Ganesh is the deity who presides over this aspect of transmission of knowledge—the ‘written word’. Lord Ganesh is invoked here by Tulsidas to bless him so that all his hurdles in writing the divine story of Lord Ram in the form of Ram Charit Manas are removed; that he can put into words what he wishes to say with respect to the glories of Lord Ram in the best possible way by employing proper words, and then playing around skillfully with such words as poets are adept at doing so as to finally craft a beautiful story that would be exceptionally charming, as to enthrall the mind and captivate the heart of one and all in this world who would either read it, preach it, recite it or sing it.

Tulsidas prays to Lord Ganesh to help and guide him along in this holy endeavour, in choosing the correct words, arranging them in the correct order, and in general aiding him to compose this great Holy Book dedicated to Lord Ram exactly as it ought to be, without committing any error of commission and omission.

To wit, the wise poet Tulsidas seeks the blessings of both Saraswati and Ganesh to ensure that no hurdles come to interfere with his pious enterprise, as he is about to do something extremely profound that is beyond his personal ability to do, for he finds himself incompetent for it if he is not helped in this holy enterprise by the divine forces of Nature, represented by these two deities who always help noble and virtuous souls in their pious exercises.

Further, Tulsidas hopes that the future generations would benefit spiritually from the divine story of Lord Ram that he is sitting down to write. So he prays first to goddess Saraswati to bless him so that the book Ram Charit Manas would be written in such a manner as to enable teachers of future generations to transmit the divine knowledge it contains flawlessly to their students when they preach it, as well as when the great poets, bards and minstrels would sing the divine glories of Lord Ram in a charming manner, employing melodious tunes and soulful terms to captivate the mind and the heart of their audience for all times and generations to come. And then Tulsidas prays to Lord Ganesh in the same breath to bless him so that he can write in an excellent way, flawlessly and smoothly like the flow of the current of the river that no one can stop, and that carries along with it all that comes in its way, especially because it is a divine story of Lord Ram, the Supreme Being, whom even Lord Ganesh, as well as his father Lord Shiva, revere so much.

That said, we come to the next important point worthy of paying attention in these verses. It is said here that Tulsidas has paid his obeisance to the ‘word, letters, phrases and verses along with the meaning they convey’ that form the basis of Ram Charit Manas, even before he mentions goddess Saraswati and Lord Ganesh for the purpose of expressing his obeisance.

Well, the reason for doing it is simple and obvious: The knowledge of the divine, and the spiritual bliss that is derived by this knowledge, is made possible only when that knowledge, which primarily is extremely subtle, sublime and transcendental, as well as too abstract for the common mind, is transmuted into a form that is more easily accessible and intelligible, a form that can be easily understood, a form that can be conveyed by a person who has this knowledge to someone who wishes to have it, and in a manner that can be easily comprehended and grasped by the mind of the recipient.

And to enable this to happen, to enable transmission of divine transcendental knowledge and spiritual truths from the mind of the wise man to the mind of the seeker, the medium of the word is needed. These words must be able to convey the right meaning and the correct idea that are intended to be conveyed, and not otherwise by mixing it all up, for then the whole purpose of the exercise would be defeated.

To wit, the choice of the correct word, and the way these words are arranged and presented, are vital elements in truthful transmission of knowledge, whether the divine or the secular. If the word is so important, the letters that form the building blocks of such words, are obviously equally important, for without the letter of the alphabet there is no word in any language, and without the word, knowledge can not be transmitted.

The selection of the ‘correct word’ is very crucial so that it can convey the ‘correct meaning’. At the same time, a word may mean different things in different contexts; sometimes a single word encompasses a wide swathe of emotions, and the same word used in different contexts and settings give different hues of ideas about its background. So therefore, Tulsidas requests goddess Saraswati and Lord Ganesh to help him in the correct choice of words, and then arrangements of these words in verses so that the ideas and messages intended to be conveyed by him are done in the correct way, without getting distorted and lost in the maze.

The reader is requested to see note no. (4) and no. (5) that have been appended to verse nos. 3-4 herein below for more elaboration on the importance of the concept of the word and verses.]

भवानीशङ्करौ वन्दे श्रद्धाविश्वासरूपिणौ । ३ ॥

याज्ञां विना न पश्यन्ति सिद्धाः स्वान्तःस्थमीश्वरम् ॥ ४ ॥

bhavānī-śaṅkarau vandē śrad'dhā-viśvāsa-rūṇau. 3.

yābhyām vinā na paśyanti sid'dhāḥ svāntahstham-iśvaram. 4.

I (Tulsidas) pay my respects to Goddess Bhavani and Lord Shiva (the divine couple, Lord Shiva and his consort goddess Bhavani, also known as Uma and Parvati) who are embodiments of the virtues of faith, belief, conviction and reverence, for without their grace and blessings even the greatest of mystics and ascetics are unable to perceive the presence of the Ishwar (the Supreme Being) in their own hearts (in a subtle form as their Atma, which is their true self and pure consciousness that is an embodiment of bliss and happiness). (Shloka line nos. 3-4)

[Note—(1) Tulsidas pays his obeisance to Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani, the divine consort of Shiva, because Shiva is the most enlightened of the gods, for which reason he is honoured by the epithet of 'Mahadeva', the Great God. Lord Shiva is also the greatest devotee of Lord Ram, and without worship of Shiva it is not possible to please Lord Ram as the Lord has himself affirmed<sup>1</sup>; Lord Shiva constantly meditates on the holy name of Lord Ram and remains engrossed in it<sup>2</sup>; it is Lord Shiva in whose Mana (heart and mind) the divine story of Lord Ram was first revealed, a fact that lent the story the name of 'Ram Charit Manas'—i.e. the story describing the deeds done by Lord Ram as revealed in the Mana of Lord Shiva; it is Lord Shiva who is the first teacher of the divine story of Lord Ram because he had first preached it to his wife Uma<sup>3</sup>.

Later on in our reading of the Ram Charit Manas we shall come across a verse where Tulsidas has paid his due respects to Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani simultaneously, treating Lord Shiva as his eternal Guru, and the divine couple as his father and mother respectively. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 15.}

(2) Since Lord Shiva was the Progenitor and the Father of the divine story of Lord Ram that came to be known as Ram Charit Manas, because it was in his Mana that the story was first revealed, it is proper and fit to pay due reverence to him first before moving ahead with the narration of the same story, to honour and remember Lord Shiva's singular contribution towards the spiritual goal of making the divine story of Lord Ram available to one and all in this world.

It is also necessary in order to invoke the blessings of Lord Ram himself, because without worshipping Lord Shiva one cannot please Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 45.}

The third reason is that Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani are the parents of Lord Ganesh who has been shown due respect in the previous verse no. 2. So it becomes necessary to honour Ganesh's parents, Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati, to avoid displeasing him.

Lord Shiva is the patron deity of ascetics and mystics. He is the most enlightened, the wisest and a self-realised deity. Lord Shiva remains in a perpetual mode of bliss and ecstasy that is derived by meditating upon Lord Ram, as it enables him to focus his attention on his Atma, which is his pure self and the cosmic consciousness that resides within his own heart. This focus on the pure self that is cosmic consciousness personified gives Shiva a sense of bliss and ecstasy as it helps him to establish a direct communion with the Supreme Consciousness represented by Lord Ram.

To wit, if there is anyone who has truly understood and realized Lord Ram and has known the truth about him, it is Lord Shiva. So obviously he deserves his due worship and honour on this single count itself.

As for his consort, goddess Bhavani, she deserved praise as it was she who was first blessed with the good fortune of hearing the story of Ram Charit Manas directly from Lord Shiva. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.}

Lord Shiva had abiding faith in the divinity of Lord Ram, and there are numerous instances in Ram Charit Manas that reiterate it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and Chand line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 51; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 111—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 119.}

This makes Lord Shiva the best teacher of Ram Charit Manas, one who is fully competent and absolutely capable to teach the profound spiritual secrets of this holy story, and expound on the divinity of Lord Ram like no one else.

Lord Shiva, hence, is the patron deity of Ram Charit Manas, whose blessings must be sought if one were to properly and correctly understand the story of Lord Ram, not only the physical part of it, but also to comprehend the great spiritual and metaphysical messages that it contains in general, as well as about the divinity of Lord Ram in particular. Lord Shiva, in this sense, occupies the same importance as Saraswati has for being the patron goddess of speech and expression, and Ganesh for being the patron god of writing and the written word—for without the blessings of them all, one would miss the essence of the nectar that is being made available to him.

But what about Lord Shiva's consort goddess Bhavani, also known as Uma or Parvati; why is she being praised here alongside Lord Shiva? This is a very interesting question that needs to be addressed.

As we progress with the reading of our story of Ram Charit Manas we shall discover, by-and-by, that Lord Shiva's consort had developed serious doubts about the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram in spite of the fact that she had accompanied her husband, Lord Shiva, when the latter had gone to the hermitage of sage Agastya where a lot of time was spent discussing the story of Lord Ram and its divine aspects, for she thought that Lord Ram was a mere human prince sent to the forest by his family due to some internal squabbling, and in the forest his wife Sita was abducted by a demon, so he was wondering here and there frantically searching for her. Lord Shiva tried his best to dissuade her from falling in the trap of delusions and doubting the holiness and divinity of Lord Ram, for what the latter seems to be doing was a part of the greater scheme that the Supreme Being had himself devised as a device to get rid of the evil forces of the world represented by the demons led by Ravana, and to restore peace, harmony and goodness in the world, so that the creatures of the Lord's creation, who had been tyrannized by the cruel forces symbolized by the demons, can at last live in peace and harmony.

But unfortunately, as was the fiat of fate, Shiva's consort would not pay heed to what her learned husband advised; perhaps the Supreme Lord had wished it to be so for the larger good of the world and mankind, for had Parvati not disbelieved Lord Shiva and continue with her stubbornness, this wonderful ambrosia in the form of the story of Ram Charit Manas, a story that has the inherent ability of granting spiritual bliss, joy and beatitude to those who read it, recite it, hear it or sing it, would never have been made available to us, because Lord Shiva eventually took pity for his consort and agreed to tell the story of Lord Ram to her in a way that would remove her doubts and give her peace of mind and heart.

It so happened that once she approached him again with her doubts vis-à-vis Lord Ram and his worldly deeds that had stumped her and caused so much bewilderment to her since long so much so that she had lost her peace of mind, requesting Lord Shiva to remove them by retelling the story of Lord Ram, that the Lord had conceptualized in his mind earlier, in detail to her, explaining all its intricacies, and expounding on its profound metaphysical and spiritual aspects.

Lord Shiva therefore felt obliged to sit down and calmly preach the story of Ram Charit Manas to her, while she listened in rapt attention, this time shunning her stubborn attitude of incredulity, and becoming ready to accept the Truth. So by-and-by the whole story of Lord Ram, that was hitherto confined in the Mana (heart and mind) of Lord Shiva, was revealed to Parvati, and once this great river that grants spiritual fulfillment and eternal bliss leading to attainment of ecstasy was come to be known to the world in the form of Ram Charit Manas, a divine mission of Lord Shiva was fulfilled too without his being aware of it—for now the Lord realized that his consort's delusions was a blessing in disguise, because in the process of enlightening her about the truth of Lord Ram, a symbolic holy river in the form of the eternal story of Lord Ram had been allowed to flow out from the confines of his Mana and spread out over the whole world to provide the tormented souls of all its creatures with a means that would grant them succour and solace, and help them enjoy spiritual peace, bliss and beatitude, for all times to come.

Towards this end, as we now realize, we are obliged to Lord Shiva's consort Parvati as well as Lord Shiva himself, for it was on her insistence that Shiva was obliged to discourse on the holy story of Ram Charit Manas in detail, and it was this path that the symbolic river in the form of this story of Lord Ram took to descend down to us in the way we know it today, in order to enable even the common man to access the sweetness of spiritual bliss and ecstasy that comes through hearing, reading, reciting and singing of this divine story just like the way a thirsty man with a parched throat finds unbound joy and experiences ecstasy when he finds a source of cool, sweet, nectar-like water in an oasis in a desert at a time when he yearns for it like never before.

And therefore we are obliged to pay our obeisance to goddess Bhavani at the same time as Lord Shiva because it is due to them both that we have had access to this divine and holy story of Lord Ram in the form of 'Ram Charit Manas'—to Shiva because he was the chosen Lord in whose pure mind and heart this divine story was first revealed<sup>1</sup>, and also because he selflessly revealed it for the general good of the world<sup>2</sup>, and to his consort Bhavani for diligently pursuing her quest for Truth and striving to remove her doubts about Lord Ram and his divinity by insisting with Lord Shiva to tell her the story of Ram Charit Manas in detail<sup>3</sup>.

(3) Let us examine a bit more the contribution that Lord Shiva made in the spreading of the divine story of Lord Ram. We shall take a simple day-to-day example to understand it.

Suppose we have pure gold in a molten form. One day an expert goldsmith has an inspiration, and he crafts a wonderful piece of ornament or any other decorative piece of item such as a statue from it. This product enhances the value of pure gold manifold times; the product is so singularly beautiful and charming and appealing to the senses that it begins to attract lovers of rare artifacts as well as connoisseurs of art. To wit, this finished product has brought to the fore the intrinsic beauty and value of the metal known as ‘gold’ that were hitherto hidden from view and unknown to the common man.

The goldsmith, who had the first inspiration to create a wonderful piece of ornament from molten gold, contemplated for some time as to what shape he would like the product to have. He finalizes in his mind the design of the product that he plans to produce for the world, and begins to love it in his own heart. Everything was fine and going smooth, but a hurdle came along. He needed a way or a medium to put into practice the design of the golden ornament that he visualized in his mind; he puts his heart into finding a solution to this problem, and wonders how the molten gold can now be given the shape that he has designed in his mind, so that what he envisages in his Mana (mind and heart) can be actually reproduced to perfection in the ornament that he plans to create, so that it is a perfect reflection of what he had conceived in his mind.

At this point he takes the help of a mould, a cast in which pours the molten gold, so that when the metal cools down and firms up, the invisible form of the ornament he had designed in his mind finally takes a tangible, visible form. Then he polishes it and gives it a final shape, ready for display. The goldsmith wishes to be sure that his life-time effort is perfect in every respect, exactly as he had wished it to be; so he quietly listens while experts make their own commentaries about this ornament. This aspect has been elaborately explained in note no. (4) herein below.

Now, as is the way of this world, many other craftsmen take a cue from the first goldsmith and mould their own pieces of jewelry and other decorative items from molten gold. Though all these products are basically gold and nothing but gold, and all of them are beautiful and charming in their own individual rights, yet it may so happen that the one originally created by the first goldsmith is exceptional, for its beauty and charm are phenomenal and beyond measure, something that none of the other products of gold created by other craftsmen could duplicate.

From this metaphor of the ‘golden ornament moulded from molten gold’, we can easily understand the role of Lord Shiva, the importance of the words and the verses as narrated in the previous verse nos. 1-2, and the contribution of all other preachers and teachers of the divine story of Lord Ram, first in the revelation of this story, and then in its manifold versions as it spread in all the corners of the world in due course of time.

Here, the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram is like the pure molten gold that filled the Mana of Lord Shiva. The presence of Lord Ram in Shiva's heart gave the latter great bliss and made him ecstatic. Then Shiva, being a generous God, was inspired to be magnanimous and charitable by sharing this priceless knowledge of the Divinity with the world, instead of keeping it under lock in his own Mana, for it would be selfishness on his part to keep it secret. But how would he do it; how would he reveal the story of Lord Ram to others? For this revelation, Lord Shiva needed a medium, and since the knowledge of the divine that was to be transmitted was exceptionally abstract, sublime and subtle, he needed a viable medium that would help his efforts bear fruits. Further, Lord Shiva's aim was to benefit the whole world by the revelation of the story of Lord Ram, so he needed a medium suited to this gross material world, where access to that which is sublime and subtle is too difficult, if not impossible.

So here Lord Shiva took the help of sound waves to transmit to others the knowledge of the Divinity, the story of Lord Ram and his holiness that was enshrined in his mind and heart. As has been pointed out herein above, this world needed a tangible method to make use of such sound waves, and so Lord Shiva devised a device of using a tangible form of sound waves in the form of letters and their meaningful arrangements in the form of words and verses to transmit the desired knowledge that was primarily transcendental.

To wit, the words and phrases became the 'mould' that Lord Shiva used to cast and give shape to the vast repository of spiritual transcendental knowledge that was present in his lake-like heart filled with the nectar of spiritual bliss and beatitude, which in our example is the priceless 'molten gold' in its purest form filling a secret chamber hitherto unknown to and not accessed by anyone.

The word and phrases shaped the divine transcendental knowledge that Lord Shiva had, and which he desired to reveal, to give it a final form, a specific format known as the 'Ram Charit Manas', just like the molten gold, which had no particular shape in the beginning, once poured into the mould, took a definite form known as the 'ornament' as envisioned by the goldsmith.

Then, once the world came to know about the existence of a lake consisting of an endless supply of molten gold, say, who would not like to have his share of such a priceless treasure? Naturally, many other prospectors would go to explore this reservoir of gold. That is also what happened with the story of Lord Ram: many teachers and preachers down the ages used their own skills to mould the same story of Lord Ram that Lord Shiva had conceptualized first in accordance with their own skills and interpretations of it, thereby creating myriads of variations of the Ramayana. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 14; (ii) Doha no. 33 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede it; (ii) Doha no. 120-b; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 122.}

(4) As we have observed in the beginning of this discussion, the creation of the original creator, i.e. Lord Shiva and his creation 'Ram Charit Manas', remained a singular masterpiece of spiritualism and its many forms with no parallel in this world. Since he wished to be sure that the divine and holy story of his revered deity Lord Ram remained pristine pure, and unadulterated by way of interpolations and distortions, as he had first conceptualized it in his Mana, Shiva decided to test it by visiting hermitages of great sages to personally hear it being told and preached. This explains why Lord Shiva, after first revealing the story of Ram Charit Manas to his consort Uma<sup>1</sup>, had gone to hear it being preached by sage Kaagbhusund at his hermitage<sup>2</sup>, and once again to hear it from sage Agastya<sup>3</sup>.

These three planes at which the story of Ram Charit Manas was revealed—first by Lord Shiva directly to Uma, then by Kaagbhusund to Garud, and then by sage Agastya to Shiva himself—are very interesting in themselves, as they corroborate our observation that the divine knowledge originating in the Mana of Lord Shiva was transmitted by way of sound waves at different levels. Well, let us see how.

Sound travels in waves, and they have frequencies; medium as well as the receiver of sound also decide which sound is heard and which is not. For instance, all forms of sounds are not audible by us humans; there are certain frequencies that we are unable to hear but a bird can pick it up, say to communicate with each other. Similarly, we also can't hear the radio waves, but a radio receiver does, and when the same receiver converts the incoming sound in a way that suits our ears, we hear the 'radio speak in our tongue'!

The first revelation of the story of Lord Ram was done by Lord Shiva in the heaven to his consort goddess Parvati or Uma. This was done at a very subtle level, where the primary form of sound must have been employed, such as the one that is used by gods in heaven. Lord Shiva realized that this will not do; this communication was limited to him and his wife, what about others? They will not benefit from this holy story's revelation.

So then he told this story to a saint named Kaagbhusund who was in the form of a crow. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30.} The crow flies in the air, it represents that middle level of existence that falls between the subtlest in heaven and the grossest in this mortal world symbolized by life on earth. Higher up in the sky there is great calmness and no pollution from other forms of sound waves that clutter the immediate environs of the earth. Since a bird can fly, it represents a midway state of existence of consciousness that is higher than the gross, but lower than the subtlest. Birds don't use a refined language consisting of words and sentences which we humans use to communicate; they do so by means of simple sounds, unique to a species of bird. But nevertheless, the sound of birds is audible to us humans, whereas the sound in which gods communicate is inaudible. So therefore, Lord Shiva employed a grosser form of sound wave, something like a series of sounds that birds use to speak with each other, to tell the story of Lord Ram to Kaagbhusund. Once Shiva went to the hermitage of Kaagbhusund to hear him preach the story of Lord Ram to other birds, and the Lord was satisfied as to its purity and the original form being retained, which is why he sent Garud to hear the same story from Kaagbhusund. It's very obvious that Shiva wouldn't have sent Garud to Kaagbhusund if he was not satisfied with the latter's preaching of Ram Charit Manas. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 60—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 62.}

Meanwhile, the story of Ram Charit Manas began to spread in the world. How did it happen: of course by means of the spoken word. When a great sage named

Yagyawalkya learned that the saintly bird Kaagbhusund has been blessed by Lord Shiva with this divine story, and that Shiva was satisfied in the way the saintly crow preached it, he decided to go and hear it himself. Once fully enlightened about the holy story, Yagyawalkya in his turn told it to sage Bharadwaj, and from him it spread to others when the story was preached in large religious congregations. By-and-by, this story was heard by Tulsidas' Guru, from whom this our great saint Tulsidas got to know it, and then decided to unlock the door to this eternal source of spiritual nectar by writing the book "Ram Charit Manas" which we are about to read now. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it.}

Now, when Lord Shiva came to know about its widespread fame and acclaim, he decided to ascertain for himself if the divine story of Lord Ram which he had first told Uma still retains its pristine purity and holiness after it has reached the human tongue, he decided to visit the hermitage of sage Agastya, a 'human being', to hear it personally, and the Lord was fully contented with what he heard. So Lord Shiva blessed sage Agastya and the two shared many intricate details pertaining to Lord Ram, and other spiritual and metaphysical matters. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no.48.}

(5) Another point to note is this: Since Lord Shiva employed the medium of 'words' and 'their meaningful arrangements as verses' to transmit the divine knowledge of Lord Ram by revealing it in the form of the story of Ram Charit Manas, and it would not have been possible to do so without the aid of words and verses, the learned poet Tulsidas has first honoured the 'words' and the 'meaningful phrases or verses formed from these words' in the previous verse nos. 1-2 before honouring Lord Shiva himself in the present verse no. 3—because the proper words as well as the verses with the correct meaning had enabled Lord Shiva to fulfill his wish to preach the holy story of Lord Ram to the world exactly in the pure form he had envisioned to do, which he wouldn't have been able to do without such an aid.

To wit, the words and verses, the medium by which the knowledge of the divine story of Lord Ram was transmitted in the form of Ram Charit Manas, deserve precedence and the first place in the list of honours bestowed on those who have contributed to its revelation.]

यमाश्रितो हि वक्रोऽपि चन्द्रः सर्वत्र वन्द्यते ॥ ६ ॥

vandē bōdhamayaṁ nityaṁ guruṁ śaṅkara-rūpiṇam. 5.
yamāśritō hi vakrō 'pi candraḥ sarvatra vandyatē. 6.

I bow my head and pay my respects to the Guru (teacher, preceptor and guide) who is an embodiment of eternal wisdom, enlightenment and gnosis like Lord Shiva is<sup>1</sup>, for the Lord is so gracious that even the crooked moon (the crescent moon) finds its glory and fame when it is used as an ornament to adorn the lock of hairs on the head of Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. (Shloka line nos. 5-6) in the Upanishads in the course of narrating and explaining the intricacies of the story of Ram Charit Manas, is being honoured.

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here, the teacher or the preacher, who teaches or preaches the profound metaphysical truths pertaining to the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram as expounded

A learned teacher plays a crucial role in the process of transmission of knowledge in its correct and pure form, without distortions and interpolations. The wise teacher deserves honour and respect because without him the vast repository of knowledge of any kind, whether secular or divine, would remain locked up at its source, without benefiting anybody, much like the holy river Ganges which would have served no purpose if it was left locked up in the higher reaches of the Himalayas and not brought down to the plains to irrigate the land and make it productive, besides giving the population a great source of sweet water, for this helped great civilizations to thrive on its banks.

The learned and wise Guru occupies a stature similar to that of Lord Shiva, because like Shiva who is an embodiment of all virtues and wisdom, who is enlightened and self-realised, and who had revealed the divine secrets of Lord Ram by narrating and explaining the subtle meaning of the story of Ram Charit Manas to his consort Parvati, the Guru too carries out the same function in relation to his disciple or student. The disciple may not be aware of anything pertaining to Lord Ram and his divinity, and though he might have read or heard the story of Lord Ram as narrated in the book Ram Charit Manas, but it might be limited to just that—one other story that he heard or read like many others in life. In all probabilities, he may have missed the profound spiritual messages and remain oblivious of the great spiritual secrets that are contained in Ram Charit Manas, because they need a wise teacher to bring them to the fore, to explain them in a simple and comprehensible language. So herein comes the importance of the Guru and the crucial role he plays in dissemination of knowledge, and it is this reason why a Guru is being honoured in verse no. 5.

<sup>2</sup>The next point to note is the metaphor of the crescent moon that has been cited here in verse no. 6. What does it signify in the context being discussed? Well, let us see.

The crescent moon has lost its shine and beauty; it is of no use for the poet describing the beauty of Nature. But when the same 'crooked', or the crescent moon, is put by Lord Shiva on his forehead as an ornament to adorn the thick lock of hairs that form a crown on his head, the same deformed moon, which is shorn of its shine and beauty, becomes praise-worthy and looks adorable. Likewise, the disciple achieves his glory and fame by coming in contact with a wise and learned Guru, even though the disciple may have had many inherent faults inside him. The disciple gets respect by the virtue of his communion and association with a pious and holy Guru, because in due course of time the latter is bound to leave his lasting good impression on the former, just like being associated with Lord Shiva even the crooked moon gets its honour.

Earlier in verse no. 3 and the note added to explain it, we have seen how goddess Bhavani became honourable although in the beginning she had been overcome with delusions and doubted the divinity of Lord Ram in spite of her learned husband trying his best to convince her of Lord Ram's holiness. Here she represents that 'crooked moon' which is out of shape and devoid of its shine, which no one would like to praise.

Normally she did not deserve any respect, but eventually she got it. It was because of her association with Lord Shiva that Bhavani became honourable in due course of time when she finally regained her exalted stature after being convinced of the divinity of Lord Ram as Lord Shiva had patiently preached the story of Ram Charit Manas to her. Likewise, by remaining in close proximity with a learned Guru, even the dullest of disciple would one day imbibe some of the holiness that his Guru represents just like the case when by constantly living in a garden in the proximity of flowers, a gardener and his clothes too begin to smell pleasant to others.

These two verses are in praise of the learned and wise Guru, for the latter is a bridge between the darkness of ignorance and the light of knowledge.]

सीतारामगुणग्रामपुण्यारण्यविहारिणौ । ७ ॥

वन्दे विशुद्धविज्ञानौ कवीश्वरकपीश्वरौ ॥ ८ ॥

sītārāma-guṇagrāma-puṇyāranya-vihāriṇau. 7.

vandē viśud'dha-vijñānau kavīśvara-kapīśvarau. 8.

I (Tulsidas) bow my head and pay deep obeisance to the most exalted and learned Poet (a reference to sage Valmiki, the ancient bard who was the first to have penned the story of the Ramayana)<sup>1</sup> as well as to the most exalted and enlightened Lord of Kapis (a clear reference to Hanuman)<sup>2</sup>, both of whom are embodiments of pure wisdom and are well-versed in the highest form of gnosis, who live in and move around in a symbolic forest represented by the countless divine virtues and glories of Lord Ram, by meditating upon the Lord and contemplating on the various spiritual interpretations of the Lord's divine story. (Shloka line nos. 7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is not specifically mentioned here which exalted and learned Poet the author of Ram Charit Manas refers to, but in all probability it is sage Valmiki, the first sage who had actually 'written' the story of Lord Ram in the form of the Ramayana. All other sages, such as Kaagbhusund, Yagyawalkya, Bharadwaj and Agastya mentioned in the Ram Charit Manas itself, had been preaching this holy story by the 'oral method'—i.e. in the form of discourses given during regular or special sessions held to narrate the story of Ram Charit Manas.

Since our own narrator, Goswami Tulsidas, is about to 'write' the same story, he decides to pay his due respects to the ancient sage Valmiki who had done the same thing for the first time. In a sense, sage Valmiki is the Father of the written version of the story of Lord Ram. Later on in the story of Ram Charit Manas, a specific verse is dedicated to paying respects to sage Valmiki. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sortha line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no.14.}

Not only Valmiki, but Tulsidas has offered his respects to all the many poets and bards who have ever narrated the story of Lord Ram down the ages in any form they thought fit. He bows his head to all such bards of the past ages as well as those who will come in the future. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-11 that precede Doha no. 14.}

What is the difference between Valmiki's story and Tulsidas' story of Lord Ram? For one, Valmiki wrote it in Sanskrit, a language of the scholarly and educated class, while Tulsidas wrote it in the Vernacular, the language of the masses. Obviously, the latter version was embraced by even the lowly and the common man, fulfilling the main objective of Lord Shiva: which was, that this holy story should reach the masses and become a source of spiritual bliss and deliverance of the ordinary creature. That is why Tulsidas has named his narration 'Ram Charit Manas', because it is meant to fulfill Shiva's wish.

This is why Tulsidas has used simple, day-to-day language in his narration, and yet the narrative contains profound Truths pertaining to theology, metaphysics and spiritualism, which makes it a unique narrative.

Secondly, the Ram Charit Manas of Tulsidas lays great stress on the virtue of 'Bhakti', i.e. devotion for Lord God, as a simple means to attain spiritual bliss and beatitude, as well as emancipation and salvation of the soul. This is also why Tulsidas invokes Lord Hanuman in this verse, because the latter is an embodiment of the virtue of Bhakti. Hence, Hanuman's blessings are needed to succeed in actually reaping a spiritual reward and benefiting by reading or hearing the story of Ram Charit Manas because Hanuman would bless the reader or the listener with the virtue of 'Bhakti for Lord Ram' after enabling him to be fully enlightened about the divinity and holiness of the Lord.

We won't fail to note here that due respects are being paid to all exalted beings concerned, starting from the most subtle and the high, and gradually coming down the steps of the hierarchy. So, first goddess Saraswati and Lord Ganesh were offered worship (verse nos. 1-2), then Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani (verse nos. 3-4), then the learned Guru (verse nos. 5-6), and now the illustrious Bard or Poet and Lord Hanuman.

An interesting question arises here regarding Hanuman, the Lord of the Monkeys "kapīśvarau", in the context of the present verse. Why is he equated with the great Poet or the Bard who penned the story of the Ramayana, instead of dedicating a separate verse to him, or even putting him one verse ahead of the Bard? Well, there are two reasons for it: One is that both Hanuman and Valmiki were contemporaries; they both lived at the same time when Lord Ram lived on the earth. Lord Ram had visited Valmiki's hermitage in the same trip to the forest when he met Hanuman. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124; (ii) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 4.}

The second reason is that both sage Valmiki and Hanuman had preached Bhakti for Lord Ram as a means of spiritual attainment. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 126—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 132 (with respect to Valmiki); and (ii) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 7—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 8; Doha no. 32 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it (with respect to Hanuman).}]

I honour and pay my obeisance to Sita who is very dear to Lord Ram (as his beloved consort). She is the Mother Goddess representing the cosmic Shakti (the dynamic cosmic energy) that is responsible for the origin (creation) of this universe, as well as its sustenance and final conclusion. She is the divine goddess who eliminates all miseries and torments of the creature; and she is the one who looks after well-being and good of all in this creation. (Shloka line nos. 9-10)

[Note—A very similar verse is found in Atharva Veda's Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 3, verse no. 3 in praise of Sita.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 18 where also Sita has been praised and offered obeisance.

From the perspective of the Upanishads, Sita was a manifestation of the cosmic Shakti, i.e. the cosmic powers that control all aspects of creation, from its beginning, through its sustenance, till its end. These dynamic powers are visualized in the form of a Goddess, known as the 'Mother' Goddess because all other entities in this creation owe their origin to this single force of Nature.

Lord Ram in his primary form is the Supreme Being known as Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness, and Sita in her primary form is the dynamic powers of this Brahm. Brahm does anything by employing this power, and therefore, if we say that Brahm is the Supreme Father of this creation, then obviously Sita, representing Brahm's Shakti, is the Supreme Mother.

When Parvati once went to test Lord Ram's divinity, she saw a magical scene, that wherever she glanced she would see Lord Ram and Sita on a vast canvas of cosmic proportions, with myriad gods and goddesses serving them. This had convinced Parvati that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human prince she had thought him to be, but indeed the Supreme Being as Lord Shiva had said. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 54—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 56.}]

[In these two verses, the learned poet Tulsidas offers his greatest respect and deepest of reverence to Lord Ram who is actually the Lord of creation known as Lord Hari, another name for Lord Vishnu who represents the all-pervading, all-encompassing and the cosmic form of the Supreme Being, whom the Upanishads refer to as 'Brahm', the supreme cosmic Consciousness.

First we shall read the two verses together for ease of reading, and then paraphrase them separately for better understanding and analysis.]

I pay my respects to and worship the Supreme Being, the Supreme Lord of the creation whose name is Lord Ram, the Lord who transcends all reasons and causes for being himself, but who is the reason and cause of everything else that has come into being in this creation (i.e. he is beyond all comprehension and logic), who is almighty and all-able Lord of the universe, whose grace can eliminate all sorrows and miseries, and whose cosmic powers known as Maya (the exclusive cosmic powers of the Lord that is so illusive that it defies all understanding and is beyond logic and comprehension) holds its sway over the entire creation, controlling every aspect of it, for even the great Gods such as the creator Brahma as well as the mighty non-gods known as Asurs (i.e. the Demons) are under its influence, and it is due to its magical powers that the gross world becomes visible and appears to be true and real though the fact is otherwise, just like the case of a lifeless piece of rope creating a sense of morbid fear when a onlooker mistakes it for being a dangerous snake due to misunderstanding and error of perception.

Verily indeed, for those hoping to cross this vast and seemingly intractable ocean-like gross world of transmigration, where the creature is trapped in an endless cycle of birth and death, Lord Ram's holy feet that resemble the petals of the lotus flower, are like the buoy that help them float and get across it (and prevents them from drowning in this symbolic ocean full of turbulent waves and whirlpools). (Shloka line nos. 11-12)

{Now, let us paraphrase these two verses separately and see what they mean as follows:-

The Supreme Lord, under the sway of whose Maya (which refers to the exclusive cosmic powers of the Lord that is so illusive that it defies all understanding) the whole creation exists, including the greatest of gods such as the creator Brahma and all the other gods of all denominations, as well as the non-gods known as the Asurs, gives the impression of reality and life to this otherwise gross, mortal, lifeless, inane and illusionary world by pervading everywhere in it in a subtle and invisible form (as the all-pervading consciousness that makes the lifeless appear to have life in it) in the same way that one erroneously imagines that a length of lifeless rope is a live snake (because of one's delusions and error of judgment about its reality<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 11)

For those (wise creatures) who wish to cross this vast and endless ocean of delusions and its manifestation symbolized by the gross mortal world of transmigration (with its endless whirlpools and waves representing the creature's endless numbers of births and deaths), for them Lord Hari's holy lotus like feet are like the proverbial buoy (by taking the help of which a person escapes the fear of getting drowned) that would help them cross this maze of delusions and its accompanying spiritual miseries.

The Supreme Lord Hari who is beyond all causes himself but at the same time is the cause of everything in existence, who is beyond all delusions himself but at the same time is the Lord of Maya, who can eliminate all sorrows, miseries, troubles and misfortunes (of the world and its creatures), and whose name is 'Ram (rām)'—I worship with the greatest respect and offer my deepest reverence to that Lord Ram who is no one else but a manifestation of the almighty, the all-pervading and the Supreme Lord of creation known as Lord Hari<sup>2</sup>.* (Chanda line no. 12)}

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse praises the cosmic form of Lord Ram as ‘Brahm’, the supreme cosmic Consciousness that is the cause of everything in existence, from the grossest to the subtlest. This creation originates in Brahm, and at the end it merges in Brahm. Brahm, in the primary form as ‘consciousness’, is what lends life to this otherwise lifeless world. When we see life around us in this world, we think that the world is for real because, and neither imaginary nor false, because we can see it, feel it, hear its sounds, taste its multiple tastes of all hues, and enjoy its comforts and pleasures. But we forget that what we think to be a living world is because of the presence of ‘consciousness’ in it as well as inside our bodies, enabling the latter to perceive the former. If this primary element of ‘consciousness’ is removed, both the world as well as its perceiver would be dead. What makes the body of a creature alive is an invisible entity known as the ‘Atma’, which in its primary form is a microcosmic form of the cosmic Consciousness known as the ‘Parmatma’, the Supreme Atma.

The existence of the cosmic Consciousness as the source of life in this world will be easily understood by a simple and common observation. A person while alive is a ‘living entity’ who sees, hears, tastes, feels and thinks, but what happens when the same person ‘dies’? His body is the same; it is right here before us, and the world around him is also the same. So what is the difference between a living being and a dead body? It is an invisible and subtle element that makes this difference—and it is known as the ‘Atma’, the ‘consciousness’ present in the body of the living being that is not present in the dead body. That is why when a person dies, we say ‘he has passed away’. Who has ‘passed away’; the physical body is lying before us, right before our eyes; it has gone nowhere. So surely the pronoun ‘he’ or ‘she’, referring to the true identity of a person, refers to something that is beyond the physical body; and that something is the pure cosmic ‘consciousness’ known as the Atma that resides in the gross body. As long as the Atma dwells in the body, the person is alive and the world matters for him; as soon as the Atma exits, nothing matters.

This is the ‘great delusion’ that is created by Maya. The ignorant creature thinks that the world is real, and so he remains indulgent in it: enjoying it or suffering from it. Likewise, he thinks that his body is his true identity, forgetting that it is his Atma which is his ‘true self’ and not the gross body, and so he is affected by all the external impulses that are perceived by the organs of perception in his gross body. Once he becomes enlightened about the metaphysical ‘truth’ of existence, he rises above all delusions pertaining to this mundane gross world, and begins to see Brahm as the only reality everywhere, which is a liberating factor for the creature—because then there is no fear of the world, there is no fear of getting trapped in the maze of delusions pertaining to the temptations of this world, no falsehood would make him affrighted like a person getting unduly agitated and terrified out of his wits by seeing a length of lifeless rope and thinking it to be a live snake which will bite him anytime.

This is the simple and straight meaning of this verse. The world, with its countless problems, exists because of Maya, the delusions that surround the creature. So the only way to overcome all such imaginary problems is to overcome the Maya. And who controls this Maya? It is under the control of the Lord of Maya, Lord Hari, the Supreme Lord of creation whose other name is Lord Ram. So therefore it follows that to overcome Maya and all the problems it creates, one must approach Maya’s Lord, i.e. Lord Ram, for by the Lord’s grace Maya would no more trouble the creature, and so the creature would be able to symbolically cross over the vast ocean of delusions created by Maya.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 117—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 118; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 74, where the concept of Maya and the great problems it creates for the creature have been elaborately discussed.

<sup>2</sup>Here the cosmic form of Lord Ram has been praised. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 14—to Doha no. 15-a (where Mandodari has described Lord Ram's cosmic form); and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Doha no. 81-b (where Kaagbhusund has described the Lord's cosmic form).

The cosmic form of Lord Ram is also known as 'Brahm', the Supreme Being who represents the cosmic Consciousness that has no specific attributes on one hand, but all qualities and virtues in this creation owe their origin to him. This Brahm is absolute and pure Consciousness, and is free from all delusions and its effects. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 33; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no.116; (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no.119.}

There are two Upanishads of the Atharva Veda tradition, viz. 'Ram Rahasya Upanishad' and 'Ram Tapini Upanishad', which are the twelfth and the thirteenth Upanishads respectively, that elaborately describes the essence of Lord Ram, expounding on the Lord's cosmic form known as Brahm. It goes on to explain how the Lord's name 'Ram' is equivalent to 'OM', the cosmic sound produced by the cosmic vibrations generated by the supreme Consciousness, that is said to be the origin of every aspect of creation.

*In the last part of this verse we read the following words: "tamaśēṣakāraṇaparaṁ rāmākhyamīśaṁ harim". Now, let us analyze these complex words by breaking them into their component, single words.

The word 'tama' means darkness or grossness; 'śēṣa' means something that remains, as well as Lord Sheshnath, the celestial serpent that is believed to hold the world on its hood; 'kāraṇa' meaning the cause and reason of anything; 'paraṁ' meaning supreme, beyond which nothing exists; 'īśaṁ' meaning the Lord; it is also universally used to refer to Lord Shiva; and 'hari' meaning Lord Vishnu. Meanwhile the word 'ākhyā' means to report and explain the meaning of anything.

Hence, we can also interpret the last line as follows: "I pay my respects to and worship Lord Ram who is Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Vishnu), the Supreme Lord who has created this world. I pay my respects to and worship Lord Ram who is also revered by Lord Shiva, the Lord who brings about the conclusion of this delusory world. I pay my respects to and worship Lord Ram who is Lord Seshnath as he supports this creation and protects it." In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6 and 8 that precede Doha no. 92 which endorse the view expressed here.]

[In these two verses, the learned poet-saint Tulsidas, who mentions his name in verse no. 14 in order to avoid any confusion regarding the author of these verses as well as what he proposes to write subsequently, submits that the divine story of Lord Ram he now proposes to write contains within the ambit of its narrative all relevant information from various scriptures pertaining to the theme of the book, which is the story of Lord Ram and his divinity, which the poet has collected from various sources and then filtered and collated all such knowledge to arrange them at one place in the form of Ram Charit Manas. Hence, the learned reader would have the benefit of reading all the scriptures and accessing all their combined knowledge pertaining to the transcendental Truth about Lord Ram by studying Ram Charit Manas attentively.]

The esoteric knowledge of the transcendental Truth pertaining to the Supreme Being as has been expounded and espoused by various scriptures, such as the Purans (ancient histories), Vedas and sub-Vedas, as well as all other scriptures of all denominations, and other sources besides these, all such knowledge has been collated and given a definitive shape by way of writing the story of Lord Ram that is known as Ram Charit Manas (literally meaning 'the deeds of Lord Ram that have revealed themselves in a subtle form by way of a chronicled story of the time and life of Lord Ram in the Mana, the heart and mind, of someone who was exceptionally exalted, wise, enlightened and self-realised'—a obvious reference to Lord Shiva here).

Tulsidas says that he has done this, i.e. he has penned the story of Ram Charit Manas and given it a definitive shape by writing it down in the form of poetry, for the purpose of his own happiness and joy, to help his inner-self attain bliss and beatitude that comes by doing so. (Shloka line nos. 13-14)

[Note—By implication, he says, he has not written Ram Charit Manas to gain any fame and name as a poet, but to find peace for himself within, for the time spent in writing the holy story of Lord Ram would be a sort of meditation and contemplation for him, when he would be focusing his attention and all the faculties of his mind and body on Lord Ram so as to write this book coherently, for any distraction would not make it possible. He does not feign to be a great poet, but stresses here that he is fain to write it as a means to attain internal bliss and a feeling of blessedness inspite of realizing his limited abilities and knowledge.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 31.

Tulsidas' humility comes out remarkably clearly in the following verses, amongst others, of Ram Charit Manas: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8—to Doha no. 9; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 10; (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28—to Doha no. 29-c.

He also praises all poets, of the past as well as of the future, those who were learned and expert in their profession as well as those who were novices and wrote for mere pleasure, i.e. poets of all denominations who had and would in the future penned any verse in honour of Lord Ram and his divinity. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 14 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-11 that precede it.

Why did he write Ram Charit Manas, and from where did he get its script; is it his own creation or is he simply paraphrasing some great poet of the yore? Tulsidas has himself given the reason for it in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 34.

Refer also to the following verses of Ram Charit Maas where the Purans, Vedas, sub-vedas and other scriptures, collectively called 'Puran, Agam-Nigam' have been cited: (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 12; (ii) Chanda line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 51; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 103; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (iv) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 95; (v) Doha no. 237; (vi) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 293.

The word 'Puran' means ancient scripture; it generally refers to mythological histories.

Aagam: These are ancient sacred books that teach the Truth in all its aspects. The word usually applies to the scriptures known as the Vedas. The Aagam is typically divided into four parts, known as the 'Padas' (pronounced as Pādas) as follows: (i) The Gyan Pada or Vidya Pada, where deep metaphysical and philosophical concepts are elucidated; (ii) The Yoga Pada, where Yoga or meditation and its practice is discussed to purify the mind and the body; (iii) The Kriya Pada, which details physical diagrams, postures and structural forms to be used in meditation as well as in temple construction and making of icons that represent the deity to be offered worship through meditation; and (iv) The Charayaa Pada, which are expositions on sacraments and codes of conduct to be followed by a spiritual aspirant.

So, the word 'Aagam' refers to the Tantra Sastras which deal with esoteric knowledge and forms of worship of the Supreme Being in his various forms, such as the three chief deities known as Shiva, Vishnu and Shakti, and it relies on occult practices using special Mantras that are specific to a particular deity.

Thus, in accordance to the deity to be worshipped, the Aagams are divided into three chief categories, viz. Shiva-aagams, Vishnu-aagams, and Shakti-aagams that are dedicated respectively to Lord Shiva who is the concluder of creation and the third God of the Trinity, Lord Vishnu who is the caretaker and protector of creation and the second God of the Trinity, and Shakti which is the personified form of cosmic dynamic power and energy of the Supreme Being that is employed to regulate the various functions of creation.

Amongst these three categories of Aagams based on the deity they are dedicated to, the ones pertaining to the Shakti are called 'Tantra Shastras', because they employ occult practices and esoteric formulas for worship purposes.

Meanwhile, the Vishnu-aagams are called 'Samhitas', and they prescribe that Lord Vishnu is the Supreme Being himself; and the Shiva-aagams are twenty-eight in number and stress that Lord Shiva is the Param Pati and the Param Purush, the Supreme Father and the Supreme Male of creation.

Nigam: This word is used to mean the Vedas, the primary sacred scriptures. The word means 'that through which the Absolute Truth is known or ascertained clearly'. In this sense, the art of logically explaining anything, as is the practice followed in the exposition of the Upanishads, is called a Nigam.

There are four primary Vedas, viz. the Rig, Saam, Yajur and Atharva. The Yajur Veda has two sub-categories, viz. the Shukla Yajur Veda and the Krishna Yajur

Vedas. The metaphysical and spiritual Truth contained in these primary scriptures are expounded in the form of treatises called the Upanishads, also known as Vedanta, of which there are one hundred and eight in numbers—Rig Veda has ten Upanishads; Saam Veda has sixteen Upanishads; Krishna Yajur Veda has thirty-two Upanishads; Shukla Yajur Veda has nineteen Upanishads; and Atharva Veda has thirty-one Upanishads.

Further, the Vedas have many sub-vedas, known as the ‘Up-vedas’. The Rig Veda has the sub-veda known as ‘Ayurveda’ dealing with medicinal herbs; the Sama Veda has ‘Gandharvaveda’ dealing with the art of song and dance; the Yajur Veda has ‘Dhanurveda’ that deals with archery and the science of weapon and warfare; and Atharva Veda has ‘Artha shastra’ that deals with political science, governance and economy.]

[This verse is in praise of Lord Ganesh<sup>1</sup>, the God whose blessings are invoked at the beginning of any endeavour to ensure its success. Here, Tulsidas offers his obeisance to Lord Ganesh and requests the latter to bless him so that his wish to write the holy story of Lord Ram by way of a composition known as ‘Ram Charit Manas’ is fulfilled and brought to fruition without facing any hurdles.]

He, by remembering whom one achieves success in all endeavours, who is the leader and chief of all followers, subordinates and devotees (of Lord Shiva), who has the physical form of an elephant, --- (Sortha line no. 1)

--- May that Lord God (i.e. Lord Ganesh), who is a treasury of wisdom, intelligence and all excellent virtues, be pleased with me and bless me (so that I can successfully narrate the holy story of Lord Ram in the form of a composition known as Ram Charit Manas that I am about to write). (Sortha line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ganesh is a son of Lord Shiva and is worshipped first when one begins any noble enterprise; Ganesh has precedence over all other gods in all forms of worship.

An entire Upanishad belonging to the Atharva Veda is dedicated to the theme of Lord Ganesh, and it is called the ‘Ganapati Upanishad’.

Lord Ganesh is also called ‘Ganapati’ and ‘Vinaayak’. ‘Ganapati’ means the Lord of Ganas, i.e. the chief of the followers, subordinates and devotees of Lord Shiva; and ‘Vinaayak’ means one who eliminates all obstacles and hurdles.

Other names of Lord Ganapati are enumerated in the Ganapati Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition as follows:—Lord Ganesh (refer verse no. 8); Ekdanta or the Lord with one tusk, Vakratunda or the Lord with a bent trunk (refer verse no. 10); Vraatpati or the one who is the chief amongst the Gods, Ganapati or the chief of the attendants of Lord Shiva, Pramath-pati or the chief of a special category of attendants of Lord Shiva, known as Pramaths, who give immense misery to those who are sinful, Lambodar or the one with a big abdomen; pot-bellied, Vighna-Vinaayak or the one who destroys all hurdles and misfortunes, Sri Varadmuti or the one who is an embodiment of blessings and grants whatever boons one desires, and Shiva-sut or the son of Lord Shiva (refer verse no. 15).

The Lord derives his name Gajaan or Gajpati or Gajamukh from the root word 'Gaj' meaning an elephant, and 'Ja' meaning an origin or birth. Hence, these names indicate that the Lord has taken birth in a form that has the head and body like that of an elephant. The elephant head stands for the macrocosm, while the rest of the body which resembles that of a human stands for the microcosm. These two aspects of this creation are not separate from one another but form a composite unit just like the head and the body of Lord Ganesh are not separate from one another but form one composite body of the Lord, though the head represents an animal (an elephant) and the rest of the body represents a human being.

In other words, one is regarded as learned, wise and enlightened only if he is able to see the Supreme Being even in the oddest and the most unconventional form of life in this creation. One must see the Lord in a healthy man as much as in a deformed and a handicapped individual; one must see the Lord in an animal as much as in a human form.

Another connotation is the following—the word 'ga' implies 'gati' or fate and destination of creation, and 'ja' means birth or origin. Hence, the word 'Gajpati' means the Lord from whom the rest of the creation has taken birth, and in whom the creation would finally collapse and merge at the end.

He is said to be the wisest and most honoured of the Hindu Gods and is always worshipped in the beginning of any endeavour or enterprise, whether it pertains to the mundane worldly affairs or to the spiritual realm. This is done to invoke his blessings which preempt any evil forces from throwing a spanner in the wheel of the successful completion of the exercise.

In Goswami Tulsidas' epic Ram Charit Manas, Sita has prayed to Lord Ganesh and addressed him with the titles of 'Gan-naayak', and 'Var-daayak'. [Refer: Ram Charit Mana, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 257.]

Now, let us examine the meaning of these two titles.

The word "Gan-Naayak" literally means 'the chief of the attendants', the 'commander', 'the god in charge of other junior gods'. Being the son of Lord Shiva, the obvious meaning is that Ganesh is the chief or the commandar of all of Shiva's attendants. But this title of being a 'Gan-naayak' has a greater significance and far-reaching importance than this shallow meaning of just being the chief of Shiva's household attendants when we couple it with the other title of being a 'Var-daayak', one who graciously grants boons. It is as follows:—

He has an unchallenged and immaculate reputation as the God who fulfills any desire the worshipper has when he offers his worship to him. He is universally adored and offered worship on a priority basis before one offers worship to any other god because not only is he the greatest in the pantheon of gods but also because once he is pleased with the worshipper then all other gods are easy to please; none of them would ever think of denying what the worshipper wishes if Lord Ganesh has agreed to fulfill his wishes.

This fact is metaphorically depicted in his being appointed as the 'chief of the attendants of Lord Shiva'. Lord Shiva the greatest of the three senior-most gods, i.e. the three gods of the holy Trinity consisting of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva or Rudra the concluder. It is this reason why Shiva is honoured by the title of a ‘Maha-Deva’, the Great God. All other gods are his juniors, i.e. they attend to the wishes of Lord Shiva. Therefore, Ganesh’s anointment as the chief of Shiva’s attendants is a symbolic way of making him the ‘chief of all the gods who are junior to Lord Shiva’.

The two wives of Lord Ganapati are said to be Buddhi and Shiddhi who are personifications of the virtues of intellect and the glories that come with achievements.

One of the sub-Purans or Up-purans, known as ‘Mudgal-puran’ which is named after sage Mudgal is dedicated chiefly to the narration of the nine main incarnations of Lord Ganapati, or Lord Ganesh who is the son of Lord Shiva and Parvati, and is the chief deity who is worshipped first during any religious ceremony or auspicious activity. This Up-puran was probably written between 900-1100 A.D. The nine incarnations of Ganapati mentioned in this sub-Puran are the following—Vakradanta, Ekdanta, Mahodar, Gajaanana, Lambodar, Vikat, Vighna-raaja, Dhumra-varna, and Yoga. Besides these nine incarnations, it also lists 23 more forms of Lord Ganesh.

He is said to be the wisest and most honoured of the Hindu Gods and is always worshipped in the beginning of any endeavour or enterprise, whether it pertains to the mundane worldly affairs or to the spiritual realm. This is done to invoke his blessings which preempt any evil forces from throwing a spanner in the wheel of the successful completion of the exercise.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 3, verse no. 15, describes the Mantra of Lord Ganesh which highlights his exalted nature and superior stature amongst all the gods, while Canto 4, paragraph no. 12 describes its importance for the worshipper.

The Mantra is “Ganaanam Twa Ganpatim Havaamahe Kavim Kavinaamupasra-vastabham; Jyestha Rajam Brahanam Brahmnapata Aa Naha Srinva-nnutubhiha Seed Saadanam”. [Briefly it means—‘I pay my obeisance and respect to Lord Ganesh who is the most senior amongst all the attendants of the Lord and even the Gods. He is most exalted, wise and learned. He is like the biggest king or emperor amongst those who are enlightened about Brahm, and is Brahm himself personified. There is no one better or senior than you. Be gracious upon me; be pleased with me. I bow before you most humbly and submit myself before you.’]

When this hymn is being said, the worshipper should prefix and suffix it with the Beej Mantra of Ganesh, which is the Sanskrit letter ‘Ga’ (as in gum) with a Bindu (dot) on top, and pronounced as ‘Gam/Gan(g)’ (pronounced as gum or gun(g)).]

The Tarak Mantra of Lord Ganapati is ‘OM Gum/gun(g)’ according to the Ganapati Upanishad, verse no. 8.

Now let us understand the symbolism of the various parts of this God. His large ears imply that the Lord hears everything, from every corner, and from everyone; the Lord is extremely receptive and gathers information and knowledge from all available sources. He is a good listener, a virtue that makes him a good teacher, because one has to learn first and it is only then that he can teach others. The large size of the ear that resemble a winnow-basket or a hand-held fan indicate that the Lord is able to blow away useless pieces of information and accept only the useful ones like the case of the winnowing basket or the hand-fan that is used to blow away chaff and retain the grain.

His large head stands for great intellect and mind.

He has two tusks—one that is full stands for the Truth that is perfect, complete, priceless and beautiful. The other tusk that is broken indicates an imperfect world that is incomplete, worthless, and not as good as it seems to be. Since the two tusks are part of Lord Ganesh's body, the implication is that both the Absolute Truth as well as the not-so-absolute truth is a part of the universal whole known as Brahm. In other words, the perfect world of spiritual truth represented by the full tusk, and the imperfect world of material sense objects represented by the broken tusk are part of the same universal Truth known as Brahm. The fact that the intellect helps one to discriminate between the right and the wrong only when there is a choice is indicated by the two tusks—one that is full indicates the correct and the straight path, and the one that is broken implies the crooked and the wrong path.

The bent and long trunk has the following connotations—(i) it stands for OM, the cosmic sound that reverberates ('trumpets') in the ether that fills the space of the sky where the entire creation is harboured; (ii) since the trunk emerges from the head of the elephant and it can uproot big trees and clear the path ahead for the elephant, the implied meaning is that the Lord employs his mind and intellect to get rid of the greatest of delusions and ignorance and other spiritual obstacles or hurdles, no matter how crooked they may be, that come in the way of seekers of Truth.

His wide mouth indicates a good appetite, and this stands for his ability to accept a wide range of knowledge. It also means that the Lord can speak on a wide range of topics with the greatest of ease and with the highest level of erudition and expertise at oratory.

His big belly stands for his endless appetite for knowledge and wisdom which he assimilates with ease. Being a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, it also means that the Lord harbours the entire creation inside his own self. His big belly stands for the immense size of the universe.

Ganesh has four arms indicating the four components of the Anthakaran, called the inner-self. These are Mana (mind), Buddhi (intellect), Chitta (sub-conscious) and Ahankaar (ego, false pride etc.)

One of his hands holds a Paasha (snare; rope) which stands for worldly attachments and entanglements that the Lord is able to control. The second hand holds an Ankush (goad) which stands for the ability to exercise control over the sense organs and natural urges. The third hand holds a Modak (a ball of sweetmeat) which stands for the spiritual rewards. And the fourth hand is held in the Var Mudra which is used to bless his devotees and give them fearlessness.

His mount is a small mouse. The mouse is notorious for stealing grain and ruining the store. Hence it is a metaphor for all the evil and negative qualities in a creature that are demeaning for his soul and lead to his ruin, and the fact that the Lord sits on the mouse shows that the Lord helps one to overcome them; or the fact that the Lord is able to overcome and subdue all the negativities of creation. The 'small' size of the mouse indicates that even a small negative trait in us can rob us of all the other good we have like the small rat can ruin the greatest of harvest or a huge granary.

The mouse is fond of sweets and grains. This indicates that the Lord is fond of good virtues and qualities of creation, and he searches them out from all the corners of creation like the mouse that goes on rummaging for grain and sweetmeats throughout his life.

The Ganapati Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, which is the twenty-fifth Upanishad of this Veda, is entirely dedicated to him. It is propounded therein that Lord Ganapati resides in the inner-self of all living beings as their Atma, the soul and the pure consciousness. It then goes on to explain the meaning of the word Ganapati, how to meditate upon the Lord, the Mala-Mantras dedicated to him which are used to turn the beads of the rosary while doing Japa (repetition of the holy Mantras), the spiritual rewards of such meditation and contemplation, some special Mantras of the Lord which helps the worshipper fulfill his desires and attain fruits of his efforts, the benefits of reading this eclectic Upanishad, and the rules to be followed while doing so as well as for preaching this Upanishad to others. The visible form of Lord Ganapati has also been described in this Upanishad (verse no. 11-14).

The image of Lord Ganapati is described in verse nos. 11-12 of the Ganapati Upanishad as follows—

“verse no. 11 = The Lord (Ganapati) has one tusk and four arms. He holds a ‘Paash’ (a snare) and an ‘Ankush’ (a goad) in two of his arms, while the third is held in the ‘Abhaya Mudra’ (the posture that grants perpetual fearlessness to his devotees) and the fourth in the ‘Var Mudra’ (the posture that grants boon of wish fulfillment to his devotees). He holds a flag with the insignia of a rat/mouse (11).

“verse no. 12 = His countenance is red like blood. His abdomen is large (big and pot-bellied). His ears are also large like the hand-held winnowing fan. He is covered in clothes of red colour.

His body is covered by a paste of red-coloured perfume. He is duly worshipped with red coloured flowers (12).”

The famous Book of Prayers written by Goswami Tulsidas, known as “Vinai Patrika”, has the first verse (i.e. verse no. 1) dedicated to Lord Ganesh.]

मूक होइ बाचाल पंगु चढ़इ गिरिबर गहन । ३ ॥

जासु कृपाँ सो दयाल द्रवउ सकल कलि मल दहन ॥ ४ ॥

mūka hō'i bācāla paṅgu caṛḥa'i giribara gahana. 3.

jāsu kṛpām̐ sō dayāla drava'u sakala kali mala dahana. 4.

The merciful and gracious Lord by whose grace and blessings even the dumb becomes an expert orator, even the lame can ascend the highest mountain<sup>1</sup>, --- (Sortha line no. 3)

--- And the Lord who can burn (destroy; neutralize) all the sins of Kaliyug (the present age of spiritual decline, perversity and moral degradation), along with their horrible consequences—may that great and exalted Lord be gracious and kind upon me, and bless me. (Sortha line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is not clear to which ‘Lord or God’ these verses are dedicated. If we take into account the previous verses where Lord Ganesh was being offered prayers, then obviously these two verses refer to him.

But at the same time it is also possible that these verses are dedicated to Lord Vishnu who is being offered prayers in the next set of verses that follow, i.e. verse line nos. 5-6.

Or, it is also very likely that they are dedicated to Lord Shiva as he is the one who had first conceived the holy story of the book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ in his heart and mind, and is offered prayers in verse line nos. 7-8 herein below.

Since no name of any particular deity is mentioned here, it is equally possible that these two verses are dedicated to Lord Ram himself, the Lord to whom this entire book is dedicated. This possibility is greater than the rest because Lord Ram is a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, and is also revered by both Lord Ganesh and Lord Shiva.

The verses that precede these present two verses are dedicated to Lord Ganesh, and the ones that follow are dedicated to Lord Vishnu. So therefore, these two verses praising an un-named Lord are a sort of a bridge between two important deities, Lord Ganesh and Lord Vishnu. To wit, this prayer is dedicated to that Lord God who is revered by Lord Ganesh and is also the one who is no different from Lord Vishnu—and obviously he is none but Lord Ram.

The greatness and majesty of Lord Ram and his authority is far superior to all the gods and other great entities in this creation taken together—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 91—to Doha no. 92.

It is to be taken specific note of here that Lord Ram is being praised here for being the Supreme Lord whose ability to take care of and protect the world is equivalent to countless Lord Vishnus taken together, as well as countless Lord Shivas as far as conclusion of creation is concerned—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 92.

But it is also said elsewhere that Lord Ram is a manifestation of Lord Vishnu—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 186 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that follow it. Lord Vishnu represents the cosmic power and authority of the Supreme Being that are concerned with taking care of, protection and sustenance of this creation—for whenever the creation is subject to sufferings and miseries that no other power in the world can remove, it is Lord Vishnu who comes down in various forms to help the creatures by removing the cause of their torments.

Besides ‘sustenance and protection’ of this creation, the Supreme Being has other functions too—such as ‘creation’ and ‘conclusion’ of this creation among others functions. So the wise Lord decided to make things easy for himself by assuming three distinct forms known Brahma, the creator, Vishnu, the sustainer and protector, and Shiva, the concluder; these three primary forms of the Supreme Being, also known as ‘Brahm’, formed the three Gods of the Trinity. This is a stellar example of ‘delegation of authority’ by Brahm, whereby he authorized these three Gods to carry out their respective responsibilities and duties within their domain, without interfering with each other. This clearly delineated areas of function and proper regulation of the activity of the world, with accountability and responsibility.

So by saying that Lord Ram embodies in himself the power and authority of countless Vishnus, it is meant that the Lord is verily Brahm, the Supreme Being, himself; Lord Ram is a visible manifestation of Brahm whose cosmic form is expounded in the Upanishads, and we read about it in Ram Charit Manas too—refer: (i) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 95; and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Doha no. 81-a.

Further, there is an interesting set of verses in Ram Charit Manas which are very pertinent here as they perfectly resonate with and fits in well with the idea expressed in the present verse we are reading. What do they say? Well, Lord Shiva tells his consort Parvati that: “Lord Ram is the Lord who walks without having a physical leg, who hears everything without possessing a physical ear, who does everything without having a physical hand, who feels and touches without having a physical body, who sees without any physical eyes, and who smells without having a nose; such are the Lord’s magical and mystical deeds that they defy comprehension and logic as they seem very strange, outlandish and superhuman to an un-initiated person who does not know the Truth of the Lord”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 118.

Refer also to one of Tulsidas’ other classic books on Lord Ram, known as ‘Vairagya Sandipani’, where in verse no. 3 magical powers of Lord Ram are mentioned, powers that are clear indications of the Lord’s primary cosmic form as the supreme Consciousness known as ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being who “hears without ears, sees without eyes, tastes without tongue, smells without nose, and feels without a skin”.

So therefore, the deity being offered this prayers and requested by Tulsidas to bless him in his writing endeavour is surely and certainly Lord Ram, though the Lord is not mentioned by name specifically.]

करउ सो मम उर धाम सदा छीरसागर सयन ॥ ६ ॥

nīla sarōruha syāma taruna aruna bārija nayana. 5.

kara'u sō mama ura dhāma sadā chīrasāgara sayana. 6.

The Lord whose countenance is dark, whose eyes resemble fully open lotus flowers of a red hue, and who reclines on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk known as the Kshir-Sagar<sup>1</sup>—may that gracious Lord dwell in my heart. (Sortha line nos. 5-6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is an obvious reference to Lord Vishnu who has all these characteristics. The Lord’s dark complexion symbolizes the vastness of the sky, for he is indeed the all-pervading Lord who is as infinite as the sky. Just like the sky that encloses everything in existence, for all heavenly bodies are embedded in the sky and there is nothing beyond it, so likewise everything that exists in this world is embedded in the Lord’s cosmic body, and nothing exists outside of him.

The lotus flower is not only beautiful but also considered pure as it remains free from all impurities and dirtiness of the water that surrounds it in the pond where it grows. Likewise, Lord Vishnu remains aloof and free from all worldly delusions and other spiritual contaminants that pollute the world which he has to take care of in his role as the ‘protector and sustainer of creation’.

The ‘Kshir-Sagar’ is the celestial ocean of milk symbolizing the cosmic ether where the Supreme Being reclines in his meditative posture. This primary form is known as Brahm, and it represents the cosmic Consciousness that is the primary cause of everything that came into being. The colour of ‘milk’ is white, symbolizing purity and holiness. Hence, the dwelling of Brahm is as pure as milk that has yet not been adulterated or polluted by other factors.

By inviting this pure and holy form of Lord Vishnu to reside in his heart Tulsidas wishes that his own heart, his inner-self, should be as clean and untainted as the Kshir-Sagar where the Lord resides eternally.

And how does Lord Vishnu recline on the surface of this Kshir-Sagar? According to Purans, he reclines on the coiled body of Lord Sheshnath, the celestial serpent who has a thousand hoods and is said to support the world by holding it aloft on them. Likewise, Tulsidas prays that the Lord would hold his spirits and enthusiasm high and not let him feel dejected or depressed while he is writing the holy story of Lord Ram.

The charming and most captivating form of Lord Vishnu has been described in Ram Charit Manas elsewhere too—for instance, Baal Kand, Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 148, where the Lord has revealed himself before Manu and Strupa to bless and reward them for their doing severe Tapa (penance and austerity) with the wish of having a physical view of the invisible Lord.]

jāhi dīna para nēha kara'u krpā mardana mayana. 8.

He whose countenance is like that of the jasmine flower as well as the moon (i.e. white, due to ash from the fire sacrifice that the Lord rubs on his body)<sup>1</sup>, who always lives with and moves about with Uma (the goddess who is a consort of Lord Shiva), who is a treasury of compassion, mercy and kindness, and who has affection for the humble and the lowly—let that Lord (Shiva), who had crushed the ego and haughtiness of Kamdeo Cupid<sup>2</sup>, show grace and mercy upon me. (Sortha line nos. 7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse is dedicated to Lord Shiva as is clearly evident from the fact that his consort, goddess Uma or Parvati, is mentioned here as being his constant and inseparable companion.

Lord Shiva's body appears to be grey in colour—because the Lord lives like an ascetic and rubs the ash of the fire sacrifice on his body, giving it a greyish colour.

Then the Lord wears the crescent moon on his forehead, and the moon's diffused moonlight spreads over his body, further enhancing the grey colour of the sacrificial ash smeared on his body as one would see the colour of the ash in the light of the moon during the night. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 106.}

<sup>2</sup>The patron god of love and passion, known as Kamdeo or Cupid, had once tried to disturb Lord Shiva's meditation by shooting arrows of flowers at him and enticing him with all the weapons of passion and lust that he had in his arsenal. Shiva got angry, and he opened his third eye, located on the Lord's forehead just between his eyebrows, and burnt Kamdeo with the fire of wrath that spewed forth from it. This story is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 88.

Lord Shiva is often times referred to as an enemy of Kamdeo, or one who destroys passions and lust. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 107.}

We shall be reading this entire episode in the course of our reading of the wonderful story of Ram Charit Manas when we come to it by-and-by.]

banda'um̐ guru pada kan̐ja kṛpā sindhu nara-rūpa hari. 9.
mahāmōha tama puñja jāsu bacana rabi kara nikara. 10.

[This verse is dedicated to the wise Guru, who is a moral preceptor, a teacher and a guide who enlightens his disciple, student or ward about the truth of anything, enabling the latter to become wise himself, and reach the goal of his search with proper guidance and help from the Guru.]

I offer my obeisance to the Guru, and worship his holy lotus-like feet, for he is an ocean of the grand virtues of graciousness and kindness, is a personified form or a living embodiment of Lord Hari (the Lord God) himself, and his wise and enlightening words are like the rays of the brilliant sun for the purpose of eliminating the darkness created by a horde of gross ignorance and delusions (that surround the creature, leading him astray from the path of Truth). (Sortha line nos. 9-10)

[Note—After offering obeisance to chief Gods, Tulsidas now offers his respect to his Guru without whose guidance and help he couldn't have had the knowledge of the story of Lord Ram he is about to pen. It will be noted that the praise of the Guru and his blessings that enabled the learned poet to write this holy book is continued in the verses that follow too—from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 2.

A wise and learned Guru's help is necessary for a seeker of Truth, and for that matter, for anyone who wishes to acquire any kind of knowledge, secular or religious. A school teacher, a college professor, and even one's parents are Gurus in their own rights because each of them shows the child the way to live in this world and acquire skills and knowledge that would help it to stand on its own two feet when the child grows up and has to face the roughness and the rudeness of this world himself.

In the spiritual field, the Guru shows the seeker the right path that he ought to follow in accordance with his aptitude and natural inclinations, from amongst the countless paths prescribed in the scriptures, which would otherwise be like a dense forest through which navigation would be well-nigh impossible and make one lose one's path if there is no expert guide to hand-hold him through the complex maze.

In this aspect, a Guru is like the 'sun' which removes the darkness of the night symbolized by ignorance and delusions, collectively called 'Moha'. In the night one is not able to see anything, one is not able to see the path ahead, and so gets lost. As soon as day breaks and the sun appears, its light lights up the world and shows the traveler the path ahead. Likewise, the Guru is the wise teacher who shows the spiritual aspirant the right path to his destination.

In the case of Tulsidas, he is very obliged and indebted to his Guru and thanks him much for enlightening him about the finer spiritual and devotional aspects of the story of Lord Ram, explaining to him its subtle nuances and pointing out many sublime metaphysical principles quietly incorporated in it, spiritual ideas and philosophies that would grant happiness, bliss and beatitude to his soul, and to all those who would read his story later on, instead of just re-telling of the story of a prince of Ayodhya known as Lord Ram by quoting other poets and scriptures as part of his basic education like so many other students do in a routine manner during the course of their traditional system of education where they are made to learn by rote without even understanding what they reading.]

चौ०. बंदउँ गुरु पद पदुम परागा । सुरुचि सुबास सरस अनुरागा ॥ १ ॥

अमिअ मूरिमय चूरन चारू । समन सकल भव रुज परिवारू ॥ २ ॥

banda'um'guru pada paduma parāgā. suruci subāsa sarasa anurāgā. 1.
ami'a mūrimaya cūrana cārū. samana sakala bhava ruja parivārū. 2.

[After the preliminary invocations and offering of prayers as done in the foregoing Shlokas and Sorthas, Tulsidas now proceeds with the text of Ram Charit Manas, but before he starts with the actual narrative he begins by once again offering his respects to his Guru, and then to all other living beings of all denominations, small and big, high and low, holy and god-like as well as evil and demon-like, in order to ensure that they are kept in good humour, expecting the noble spirits to bless him in his divine mission, and to pray to the evil spirits not to create any hindrance in his path if they can't help him in a constructive way, as the evil elements are likely to become jealous and overcome with malice if they are not properly appeased in the very beginning of any enterprise. After that, Tulsidas seeks the blessings and goodwill of other learned poets and bards, of the past and the present and the future. This helps Tulsidas to assert his humility and affirm his deep faith in Lord Ram as he feels that since what he is about to write is a holy book totally and completely dedicated to Lord Ram, he is absolutely certain that he would get everyone's blessings and support. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Doha no. 15.}]

'I pay my respects to the holy feet of my Guru<sup>1</sup> which is like a symbolic lotus flower that contains nectar granting bliss and fulfillment of wishes. This nectar is flavoured with the taste of blessings; it is fragrant with the sweetness of affection; and it is succulent with the juice of love.

[To wit, I pay my obeisance at the holy lotus-like feet of a Guru who is like an ocean of mercy and grace, who is like a personified human form of Lord Hari (Vishnu, the Supreme Lord), and whose words of wisdom are equivalent to the brilliant rays of the sun so far as removing the darkness of ignorance is concerned.

I pay my obeisance to the holy feet of an illustrious Guru and offer my thanks to him for granting me the privilege of getting access to the nectar of spiritual bliss and happiness that drips from his lotus-like feet. This nectar is extremely delicious, fragrant and succulent (i.e. it provides succour to me and helps me to feel contented just like a bee feels when it gets access to the nectar of the lotus flower)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

The dust of the feet of the Guru is like a magical powder having the mystical power to destroy the whole family of moral and spiritual ailments that torment a creature in this mortal gross world of transmigration.

[To wit, the auspicious dust of the holy feet of the Guru is like a medicinal powder made from the herb known as Sanjivani<sup>3</sup> that helps to eliminate all sorts of torments and miseries associated with life in this vast ocean-like mundane world of grossness and pain, as it helps alleviate a disciple's spiritual and temporal problems, and dispel all his doubts and confusions. The Guru's blessings help allay the many fears that overwhelm a person in this mundane existence, where he seems to be at sea had it not been for the Guru who acts as a buoy as well as a lighthouse for support and guide him through.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A Guru is expected to be a saintly person with a pious disposition, a person who has some stellar qualities and excellent virtues, which are enumerated in (i) Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 38 where Lord Ram himself enumerates them briefly; as well as in (ii) Tulsidas' book called 'Vairagya Sandipani', in its verse nos. 8-42 which are very comprehensive in this respect.

In the present verses which we are currently reading now, Tulsidas pays his homage to his Guru by bowing to the latter's feet, saying that by the blessings of the Guru all fears arising out of spiritual ignorance and worldly delusions are got rid of. For a spiritual aspirant, the Guru is like a loving parent who is always concerned with the ward's good, welfare and happiness.

In traditional system of medicine, the doctor prepares a power by crushing and mixing different herbs to prepare a concoction that is aimed to cure the patient's disease. Likewise, the wise and erudite Guru would prescribe the right spiritual practices to his disciple and show him the moral path whenever the latter needs guidance and support in complex situations that vex him, so that the latter can overcome all his emotional problems, attain internal peace and stability, thereby enabling him to live a life of contentedness and happiness, and reach his desired goal calmly, amidst the turmoil that surrounds him in this world where everything seems to be in a flux.

One serious illness is enough to kill a man, but the problems associated with this mundane existence are countless—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 121-a.

What are these spiritual, moral and emotional problems, or so-called diseases, that afflict a person in this world and keep him agitated? Well, the saintly crow Kaagbhusund was asked this question by Garud who had gone to his hermitage to hear the divine story of Lord Ram and remove certain doubts he had about the Lord's divinity and truth. Kaagbhusund lists the prominent ones in his answer given to Garud, and also stresses that they can be taken care of by the grace of Lord Ram as well as the Guru—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 71 (grace of Lord Ram); (ii) Chaupai line no. 28 that precedes Doha no. 121—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 122 (grace of the Guru as well as Lord Ram).

<sup>2</sup>To wit, when one serves the Guru and worships his holy feet with the same faith and reverence as one would have for the Lord God, for it has already been said in the previous verse that a Guru is a living form of the Lord, then surely the Guru would be obliged to grant his blessings and divine grace upon the disciple even as the Lord does for his devotee. The dust of the feet of an enlightened and wise Guru is compared here to the pollen that falls from the lotus flower. It provides happiness and bliss to the worshipper in the same way as the nectar does to the bee.

Here it means that when a person finds himself in a quandary in this world, when he is utterly perplexed and confused due to circumstances, when he sees darkness all around him, when he sees no friend in this world who would help him, show him a way, and stand by him, when he thinks he is virtually doomed and marooned in a hostile and selfish world —at that time he can turn to his Guru for support, guidance, advice, solace and succour. A Guru would give him a selfless and wise advice; he would apply a soothing balm over his troubled mind and wounded heart.

From the spiritual and metaphysical perspective, there are no greater torments and fears as the ones that this mortal world of transmigration presents. It's a vicious trap from which one finds it almost impossible to escape. In this situation, the Guru helps one to see the path that would lead to his freedom and emancipation. It is like a good and compassionate doctor who would not only prescribe the correct medicine to his patient but also ensures that the patient duly takes his doses and is on the path of recovery. If the need so arises, the compassionate doctor would personally tend to the patient's wounds and nurse him back to complete recovery. The grateful patient can never sufficiently thank his doctor! A Guru's role in the spiritual field is almost like it; that is why the metaphor of the Sanjivani herb is cited in this verse. Whereas the doctor can heal only the physical body of the suffering man, the Guru can heal his spiritual and emotional wounds.

To wit, by worshipping the holy feet of the Guru the worshipper receives his blessings, and this in turn rejuvenates his inner-self by eliminating all sorts of consternations, fears, confusions, doubts and delusions that are tormenting him endlessly. These negative emotions are a part and parcel of life in this gross mundane world, and the remedy for this misery is found in the form of blessings that come to a person when the Guru is pleased. It is because the Guru is one's best friend and associate, and he is also qualified and skilled enough to show the person a way out of his problems in a very practical way.

A wise and true Guru is like a person's anchor in this tumultuous world where one finds it too difficult to hold ground and find one's mooring. The Guru is also like a symbolic lighthouse that warns a ship of any danger that may lurk underground inasmuch as that he faithfully alerts his disciple of any pitfalls that he may encounter in his journey through life, whether in the spiritual field or the humdrum affairs of the world, showing him a way out of any predicament that he may find himself in. A Guru would illuminate the path for his disciple with the light of knowledge, and should the disciple need the Guru would be there to assist him to reach his destination.]

sukṛti sambhu tana bimala bibhūṭī. maṇjula maṅgala mōda prasūṭī. 3.

jana mana maṇju mukura mala haranī. ki'ēṁṁ tilaka guna gana basa karanī. 4.

The dust of the feet of the Guru is as holy and sanctified as the ash smeared on the divine body of Lord Shiva, and therefore it grants auspiciousness and happiness to a person who rubs it on his own body<sup>1</sup>. (3)

This dust from the feet of the Guru can remove the stain on the symbolic mirror of a person's mind and heart<sup>2</sup>; it can be used to make a mark on the forehead (called the Tilak) as it would attract all the good virtues and enable the disciple to master them<sup>3</sup>.

[To wit, this dust removes the spiritual dirt clinging to the mirror represented by the devotee's heart and mind. If it is used to mark the three lines of the Tilak on the forehead then it helps (the disciple) to overcome the effects of the three Gunas and invites a host of good values and qualities.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The auspicious dust of the Guru's august feet is equivalent to the holy ash that is smeared on the divine body of Lord Shiva, and is therefore equally reverential. It is a producer and a bestower of all welfare and happiness upon the worshipper; it grants him joy and blessings.

If a devotee uses the dust of the feet of his Guru to be smeared on his body then it would be equivalent to smearing the ash of the sacred fire sacrifice that Lord Shiva smears over his own body. To wit, the dust of the Guru's feet is as holy and auspicious as the ash of a fire sacrifice.

The idea is that just like ordinary ash of firewood becomes holy when it is applied by Lord Shiva on his divine body, the ordinary dust of the earth becomes sanctified and holy when it comes in touch with the feet of the revered Guru, and hence can be used as a holy powder equivalent to the ash one gets from Lord Shiva's temple which is used for rubbing on a devotee's body.

<sup>2</sup>The mind and the heart of a man are like a mirror of his thoughts and feelings. By being exposed to this deluding world of material attractions and sensual pleasures, his heart and mind become corrupted as he is driven away from his spiritual goal and sucked in the vortex of this gross mundane world which churns him round and round, leaving him perplexed and deluded. Just as coarse sand is rubbed on a mirror to remove oil stains from it, so likewise the dust of the Guru's feet can be symbolically used to rub off the moral degradations and perversions from the inner-self of a spiritual aspirant. To wit, if a person surrenders himself before a true and wise Guru, it is quite sure that he will be able to clean his inner-self and restore its spiritual shine.

To wit, just like the case when one can see an object clearly when the mirror is scrubbed clean, the worshipper is able to remove all delusions from his mind and free his heart of all worldly attachments by the grace of the Guru so much so that now he can experience the bliss of self-realisation that comes with experiencing the presence of the Atma, the cosmic Consciousness that is known as the Parmatma, the Supreme Conscious Being, in his own bosom.

Once all veils of ignorance are removed, once the thick layers after layers of numerous faults and impurities and taints are scrubbed off, the spiritual aspirant is able to witness the inherent blissful and peaceful nature of the 'truthful self' known as the Atma within his own self. This is the aim of all spiritual practices—to realise the Truth and Reality by overcoming all delusions and ignorance.

This verse draws from the popular way of cleaning mirrors. A tarnished mirror, or any other smooth surface like it, is made to shine once again if sand or some ash is spread over its surface and then rubbed with a clean piece of cloth.

lightening of the clouds, or the antenna of a radio receiver attracts relevant signals of the frequency to which the radio is tuned, the Tilak mark made from the dust of the Guru's feet would help the disciple to attract all the good virtues around him, while at the same time repel all negative forces that may harm him.

The Tilak mark is an auspicious sign marked on the forehead, just above the root of the nose and between the eyebrows. It normally has three vertical lines in the shape of a tuning fork or a trident. These three lines represent the three Gunas—the Sata Guna, the Raja Guna and the Tama Guna. These three basic and inherent qualities are present in all living beings, and their mutual ratio and activeness would determine an individual's character, nature, habit and temperament, his overall personality, and the way he deals with the world and circumstances of life. Among the three, the best is the Sata Guna, the worst is the Tama Guna, and in between lies the Raja Guna.

In a symbolic manner, the Tilak mark—or shall we say the 'trident'—helps one to remind him that he is supposed to remain vigilant and overcome his tormentors in the form of the different Gunas that constantly cause mental restlessness and emotional problems for a living being, pulling him this way and that, and leaving him exasperated and bewildered. A disciple is reminded that his Guru is always there to watch him like a commander of an army who may not be physically present at all times but his token presence is enough to keep huge battalions disciplined. The purpose is nevertheless served.

In this context, refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 3 where king Dasrath has praised the holy dust of a Guru's feet when he went to meet his own Guru, sage Vasistha. Dasrath said: "He who puts the dust of his Guru's feet on his own head is able to conquer the whole earth in a symbolic manner".

We read in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 352 that when Lord Ram and his three brothers returned home after their marriage, their father Dasrath and his queens had put the dust of sage Vishwamitra's feet on their heads as a mark of great respect to the latter. The sage had been instrumental in getting the four brothers married to the princesses of Janakpur.]

śrīgura pada nakha mani gana jōtī. sumirata dibya dr̥ṣṭi hiyaṁ hōtī. 5.
dalana mōha tama sō saprakāsū. barē bhāga ura āva'i jāsū. 6.

The nails of the Guru's feet are like self-illuminated gems<sup>1</sup>, the mere remembrance of which enables a disciple to have the divine light of wisdom inside his inner-self.

[To wit, the nails of the feet of the Guru have the sublime shine resembling that of priceless gems so much so that their light illuminates the subtle heart of the worshipper as soon as he remembers them.] (5)

This divine light has the ability to eliminate the darkness of Moha (spiritual delusions and attachments with the world and its sense objects) that eclipses the inner self of the disciple. Fortunate is he whose heart is illuminated with this light (of wisdom).

[To wit, this light of knowledge and self-realisation that springs forth spontaneously in the subtle heart of the spiritual aspirant is able to dispel and eliminate completely all traces of darkness of ignorance and delusions that had earlier shrouded his inner-self. He is very lucky and fortunate in whose heart this light shines brilliantly.]<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—Remember: The Guru has already been treated as being a personified form of Lord Hari, or Lord Vishnu—refer: Sortha line no. 9 herein above that precedes these Chaupais. So therefore, the learned poet says that one ought to worship his Guru with the faith that he is worshipping the Lord God in that form, instead of an ordinary person.

<sup>1</sup>A certain category of gems are said to be self-illuminated, for they effuse light on their own, and so they are visible even in complete darkness. The obvious idea here is that by following the advice of a wise and learned Guru, the disciple becomes wise and enlightened himself so much so that the light of Truth begins to shine spontaneously inside his heart and mind, thereby removing all forms of darkness arising out of ignorance and delusions that had covered his inner-self with a thick veil and eclipsed his wisdom previously. The disciple, in due course of time, becomes self-realised, enlightened and wise, acquiring spiritual wisdom from his Guru much like a mirror that reflects the light of the candle placed in front of it. Verily indeed, such a person is very lucky. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 259.

This is symbolism only. It simply means that when one worships the Guru's holy feet his mind and heart should be focused on its subtle and holy aspect, its sublime and spiritual value, and not on its grosser physical appearance such as the colour of the skin of the feet, whether they are wrinkled and chafed due to old age and hardships of life, if the nails are healthy or rough and brittle, etc. Just as a pearl or piece of diamond, for instance, has a subtle glow and smoothness that is inherent to them inspite of the fact that its origin is in an oyster and the ocean or in the dark bowls of the earth respectively, the nails of the feet of the Guru also enables the worshipper to illuminate his inner self with the light of 'consciousness' that comes from within.

The 'consciousness' lives in the subtle space of the heart of the spiritual aspirant in the form of an ethereal entity that is known as the Atma, the soul. This Atma is self-illuminated, and its realisation makes the inner-self of the worshipper glow with the light of self-realisation like the inherent shine of a priceless piece of gem. This is possible by the grace and blessing of a Guru.

ugharahim̐ bimala bilōcana hī kē. miṭahim̐ dōṣa dukha bhava rajanī kē. 7.
sūjhahim̐ rāma carita mani mānika. guputa pragaṭa jaham̐ jō jēhi khānika. 8.

With the aid of the knowledge that he receives from his Guru, a disciple's internal eyes of wisdom represented by the abilities of his mind and heart to see the subtle truth and the reality of anything are opened wide, making him able to see things in the correct perspective<sup>1</sup>.

This removes all causes of misery and grief arising out of being associated with this gross, mundane and perishable world of material sense objects, which is like being freed from the endless fear of ghosts and phantoms of the dark night<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Further, as a result of this wisdom (acquired by the mind and the heart), one is able to see the truth and understand the reality of Lord Ram, both in the hidden form as well as in the evident and apparent form, in whatever form and wherever it is narrated when one reads the Lord's story as described in Ram Charit Manas<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, with the help of the knowledge that he gains from his association with the wise Guru, a disciple is able to overcome all delusions and ignorance vis-à-vis his own 'self' as well as the world surrounding him. He begins to understand who he truly is, that the gross body of his is not his 'true self', for the latter is his pure consciousness known as the Atma that lives inside the gross body, and that the world around him is gross and entangling, almost like a trap for him as it would catch hold of him and suck him in an endless vortex of pain, misery and grief if he allows himself to be lured by its material attractions just like a fish gets caught by the bait dangled by the fisherman and regrets later on.

What are these fears: the answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 72.

As soon as this light of spiritual awakening, self-realisation, true knowledge illuminates one's heart, the subtle eyes of wisdom and enlightenment open spontaneously. This in turn removes all the fears and horrors arising from the darkness of night symbolized by this mortal world of transmigration and its delusions that are like the terror of a huge roaring ocean that a man faces in the pitch darkness of the night.

A man sees many imaginary ghosts and phantoms in the darkness of the night, but as soon as daylight dawns, they vanish, and all fears and terrors arising from these phantoms go away automatically. Similarly, as soon as wisdom, self-realisation and enlightenment sprouts in the inner-self of the spiritual aspirant, all his fears having their genesis in the darkness of ignorance run away. By the grace of the Guru his disciple is able to see the reality of things because the light of knowledge provided by the Guru removes the dark veil that surrounds the truth.

The mortal gross world is likened to an ocean here, the mere sight of which instils fear in the heart. When a person faces the horrifying prospect of having to cross a huge obstacle in the form of the heaving and surging ocean with its huge dark waves looming menacingly on the horizon and the roar of the ocean as if it would devour anyone who dares to challenge its might, the sight of a sturdy ship is very heart-warming and reassuring. Likewise, when a person has to cross this world of transmigration which is no less awesome and fearsome than a mighty ocean, the support and help of an illustrious Guru is of no less importance than that of a great ship to cross the physical ocean!

The grand spiritual benefits of this self-illuminating light of wisdom and enlightenment that begins to shine in one's inner-being upon self-realisation attained by the blessing of the Guru, accompanied by the ability to see things that have a subtle, sublime and ethereal existence (as opposed to those that have gross and mundane existence in this physical gross material world) due to the grace of the Guru, enables the seeker to see and understand the esoteric secrets of the divine story of Lord Ram (the personified form of the Supreme Being), and be privileged enough to be able to peer behind the exterior to have a divine glimpse the glittering gems, large and small, of profound spiritual value that lie embedded in the holy story of Lord Ram that are normally hidden from view.

To wit, by the grace of the Guru a disciple is able to understand the real meaning of the story that narrates the time and life of Lord Ram, and see the reality behind the apparent worldly deeds of the Supreme Being when he manifested himself in the form of a human prince known by the name of Lord Ram.

The idea here is that by the grace of the Guru a disciple is able to get at the bottom of the teaching of the scriptures that would otherwise baffle him. He is able to separate the grain from the chaff, and draw meaningful message from the scriptures. Obviously only an expert can tell him these things, and this expert is his learned and wise Guru who satisfies all queries and removes all doubts.]

[The ability to see and understand the subtle aspects of the truth and reality of Lord Ram that are ordinarily imperceptible but nevertheless incorporated in the story of Lord as narrated in the holy book called Ram Charit Manas is made possible by the grace of the learned Guru.]

It is just like the case of a magical eye ointment that is applied by expert clairvoyants and those with mystical abilities that enables them to see things not visible to the naked eye, so much so that they can see secret treasures hidden inside mountains and hills, in forests, and under the surface of the earth (which others can't). (Doha no. 1)

[Note—It is like the case of some magical eye ointment having some mystical or occult powers that, when applied over the eye, enables a person to see some secret and esoteric things that are normally not visible to the naked eye, such as being able to see wonderful treasure troves of wealth that is hidden from view on mountains and forests and in the deep bowls of the earth.

To wit, with the grace of the Guru the disciple is able to learn many secrets of life and spiritualism that are not easily known and understood. Here the metaphor of the forests, the mountains and bowls of the earth is used because priceless herbs, gems and precious metals are found on mountains, forests and in mines dug deep into the earth, about which only experts can know. Without the help of an expert one may not be aware of them even if one perchance happens to see them right before his eyes; he won't be able to recognise them nor determine what their worth is.]

Here, the countless spiritual and metaphysical principles that would benefit the seeker of Truth who reads the story of Lord Ram as narrated in the book 'Ram Charit Manas', as well as the many facts about the divinity and truth nature of Lord Ram that are incorporated in the story but which remain hidden as they are not so obvious and apparently not understood by the common reader, are compared to the secret treasure hidden from view in the side of mountains, deep inside forests, and even underground.

The Guru highlights them and focuses the attention of the disciple on these profound principles and truths which usually miss the eye of the mind by unraveling their secrets and explaining their significance and importance to the eager disciple. To wit, the disciple is able to see and learn the many hidden secrets of the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas with the help of his Guru and his blessings, just like a clairvoyant is able to see and disclose the presence of a secret treasure to his faithful follower by applying some mystically empowered ointment on his eyes that enables him to see what is ordinarily invisible, so that the privileged follower would then take it out and benefit from it.

The guidance and the wisdom given by the learned Guru to his disciple are like the mystical ointment that enables the mystic to see priceless treasures that normal persons can't see.]

tēhiṁ kari bimala bibēka bilōcana. barana'um' rāma carita bhava mōcana. 2.

The dust of the feet of the revered Guru is like the medicinal eye-ointment that fully cures the eye of its various ailments because once the Guru's benevolent grace is obtained by the disciple all his doubts and bewilderments are dispelled for good, and he is able to see the Truth and the Reality clearly, without any kind of distortion, which removes all confusions of his mind<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Tulsidas says—] By symbolically applying this holy dust of the Guru's feet on my eyes of wisdom, I hereby start my narration of the divine and holy story of Lord Ram, a story that can help destroy all the fears and consternations arising from this mortal world of transmigration with its endless chain of problems and miseries that torment the creature and keeps him yearning for freedom from them<sup>2</sup>. (3)*

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just like a patient suffering from blurred vision due to some eye disease is unable to see things clearly but is freed from his problem by the application of an eye-ointment prescribed by an expert ophthalmologist, likewise the guidance and advice given by a learned Guru helps the seeker of Truth and spiritual aspirant see what he has set out to find in the spiritual field, clearly and unambiguously.

Previously the reader may have read the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas with the intention of learning the truth of Lord Ram and gain from its profound spiritual messages, but many kinds of doubts and confusions arose in his mind regarding the truth of Lord Ram and his divinity and holiness, which kept on lingering because of the lack of his ability to clearly see, understand and analyse the secret meaning and subtle spiritual messages that are incorporated in the story, leaving him perplexed, and this disturbed the peace of his heart.

But when he approaches a wise and enlightened Guru who explains the subtle nuances of the story with its profound spiritual and metaphysical import, the disciple feels exhilarated and fain, and he exults in his newly acquired wisdom as it makes him feel fulfilled. The knowledge given by the Guru makes the vision of the disciple clear as he is now able to see things in the right perspective and understand the reality of Lord Ram as a personified form of the Supreme Being though his physical form and deeds were like that of an ordinary human being, and why the Lord should be worshipped, revered and honoured, as well as the importance of the virtues of devotion and love for the Lord.

This verse line must be properly interpreted and understood. The 'eye' referred to here in this verse is the subtle inner-eye of the mind and intellect, and not the physical eye of the gross body. It is not the physical organ of the gross body that is known as the eye with which one sees the grosser aspects of the equally gross world of material sense objects, and therefore the 'disease' mentioned in this verse also does not refer to some physical disease that afflicts the physical organ of sight known as the eye.

The 'disease' here is the spiritual problems arising out of delusions and ignorance that prevents the creature to see the Truth and Reality. Worshipping the holy feet of the Guru and focusing the mind on the dust of his holy feet acts like a medicine for this subtle disease. It enables a person to develop wisdom and ability to see what is wrong, unethical and unrighteous, and segregate it from what is wise, righteous, ethical and correct. It opens the eyes of wisdom, erudition and discrimination that allow the man to see and examine the surrounding world intelligently and analytically. It is like removing cataract from one's eyes when suddenly he begins to see the whole world clearly, brightly. The auspicious reward of worshipping the holy feet of the Guru is that this empowers the spiritual aspirant to have the ability to have deep insight into the reality of the world and its existence with eyes of wisdom that can see behind the shroud of delusions that surround the entire world like a thick veil of smoke, preventing clarity of sight.

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas says "Using this dust like an eye-ointment, I (Tulsidas) clean my eyes of wisdom and erudition so that I may be able to narrate the wonderful, the sublime, the holy and the divine story of Lord Ram that is known as Ram Charit Manas. This divine story is able to free its listener from the snare of this mortal world of transmigration that is like a huge ocean known as ‘Bhavasagar’”.

The learned poet says that he has been able to see the spiritual merit and experience the mystical abilities of this story of Lord Ram by the grace of his Guru, and this wisdom has enabled him to overcome all his worries about the welfare of his Atma, his soul. It has granted him abiding peace, happiness, joy, succour and solace; now he is free from all fears that had been tormenting him all along like it is the case of all living beings in this mortal, mundane world who are concerned about their fate in this life and the life hereafter.

Tulsidas says that he is so peaceful now, and so completely assured of deliverance, emancipation and salvation that he has decided to share this eclectic knowledge with the readers of this story of Ram Charit Manas that he will narrate anon, with an assurance that they too would benefit and feel blessed like him if they not only read and understand this holy story of Lord Ram properly but also have full faith in its mystical powers, the spiritual blessings that it grants, and its ability to bestow all-round happiness and welfare to the devotees of Lord Ram.

At first (to begin with), I bow to and pay my respects to the revered feet of those who are literally like living gods (or personified forms of gods) on this earth (mahīsura)<sup>1</sup>.

They are able to eliminate all doubts and vexations arising out of Moha (delusions and worldly infatuations) that cause so much fear for a creature<sup>2</sup>. (3)

I most reverentially and with the most polite words I can command pay my respects to the entire community of saintly and pious people who are like a treasury of good virtues and noble character<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Brahmin community is usually referred to with this epithet of ‘mahīsura’, literally meaning “living gods on earth”. It is because they are expected to have stellar qualities and excellent characters, possessing noble virtues and truthful knowledge that makes them exalted and senior amongst all living beings in this world. They act as guides and advisors to the rest of the society, meaning that they are no less important than a Guru for the world at large.

<sup>2</sup>So therefore, it follows that like the individual Guru these Brahmins too help the world by showing the people correct path, help solve their spiritual problems and doubts, and to teach them the scriptures not only in the literal way but also by expounding upon the hidden spiritual and metaphysical philosophy they contain.

To wit, what the individual Guru is to his disciple vis-à-vis removal of the latter's ignorance and doubts, the Brahmins are to the world at large, and so they are equally worthy of reverence.

A detailed list of what constitutes 'Moha' has been given in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 71-a.

And how long does Moha live in the inner-self of a creature, troubling him and ruining his peace? Well, it is till Lord Ram is not enshrined in the heart of the creature, because obviously there cannot be darkness in a chamber if there is light in it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 47.

But for this, the person must be convinced about the divinity of Lord Ram, and that the Lord is not an ordinary man but the Supreme Being himself in a personified form. For developing this faith and conviction, a proper understanding of the story of Ram Charit Manas is essential.

<sup>3</sup>This verse is remarkable in as much as it includes within its ambit 'all those who have saintly and pious qualities', irrespective of which class in the society they belong to. This is the greatness of Tulsidas' broadness of vision to define who is a praise worthy person, as well as who can be a devotee of Lord Ram: he says that he can be 'anyone' who has stellar qualities of mind, heart and character, who is wise, enlightened and self-realised, who has love and devotion for Lord Ram, who believes in the Absolute Truth as envisioned in the scriptures themselves rather than the distorted version of it as propagated by selfish elements.

Those persons who love the company of good people like saints and sages, who have affection for and faith in the Guru who himself follows the path of righteousness and auspiciousness, who serve Brahmins as representatives of the gods on earth, and who have special affection and love for Lord Ram—such persons are eligible to hear story of Lord Ram. [Others would mock at it and find faults with it.] Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 128 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it.]

sādhū carita subha carita kapāsū. nirasa bisada gunamaya phala jāśū. 5.
jō sahi dukha parachidra durāvā. bandanīya jēhim jaga jasa pāvā. 6.

The auspicious and glorious lives, deeds and conduct (subha carita) of (true) holy saints and pious people (sādhū) are pure and untainted (subha carita) like the life of the cotton plant (kapāsū). The reward of such a life, howbeit tasteless, insipid and unattractive (nirasa), is nevertheless huge and full of virtues (bisada gunamaya)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

This cotton plant allows itself to undergo immense hardship so that the faults, shortcomings and infirmities of others can be hidden.

[To wit, when a cloth is made with this cotton, it is used by others to cover themselves, their bodies, and make many others things of daily usage such as bed-sheets, towels, napkins, cotton sheets used as shrouds or to wrap other things, and so on. So the cotton plant does not mind its own sufferings because it gives comfort and protection to others.]<sup>2</sup>.

Verily, this is the reason why such saintly souls (whose lives are compared to the cotton plant) are praised, honoured and revered in this world<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The cotton plant produces fruits that are tasteless, white in colour, fibrous and dry; no one enjoys such fruits. Likewise, saints and truly holy men are not attached to this world of illusionary charm; they have renounced all worldly pretensions and do not wish to waste their time and energy in worthless talking, thinking or pursuing matters of the mundane world. As such, ordinary people do not find them as a good company; they do not look charming to people who wish to delve in matters related to the world and its numerous material objects.

But albeit such saints seem without any charm, they are nevertheless full of virtues and excellent qualities that have great spiritual value and are worthy of praise. Like the colour 'white' of the cotton, they are pure at heart and their deeds are holy as well. Their detachment from the material charms of the world and seemingly dry and emotionless nature resembles the fruit of the cotton plant.

The stellar qualities and excellent characters of saintly souls, and the benefit of having communion with them are enumerated in Ram Charit Manas elsewhere too, viz. in its Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 38; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 71; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 128.

They are also enumerated in (a) Tulsidas' book 'Vairagya Sandipani', verse nos. 8-61; and (b) extolled in Narad Bhakti Sutra, verse no. 69 as the basis for developing the virtue of Bhakti (devotion) for the Lord God.

<sup>2</sup>The cotton suffers a lot when it is passed through the ginning machine which separates the cotton from its seed, then it is pulled and stretched into a thread, spun into a yarn, and weaved into cloth of various textures. All this puts the cotton through a lot of toils, pains and sufferings, but it never complains. It is rather happy that its sufferings would help others to cover themselves with clothes that would be made from this cotton.

muda maṅgalamaya santa samājū. jō jaga jaṅgama tīratharājū. 7.

An assembly or gathering of saints and holy people especially, and the community of saints and pious people in a general way<sup>1</sup>, is a provider of auspiciousness, blessedness, joy and happiness to all. In all sooth, this community is like a living embodiment of 'Triveni', which is regarded as the 'King amongst pilgrim sites' (tīratharājū)<sup>2</sup>, in this mortal and mundane world.

[To wit, the spiritual benefits that one gets by visiting so many religious places can be got by the company of saints. People visit pilgrim places to clean their inner selves, do penance for sins, and derive some spiritual peace and happiness. This same benefit is availed in the company of saints.] (7)

In this assembly of saints and pious people (which is like a walking 'tīratharāj' in this mundane world), the holy river Ganges symbolized by 'Bhakti' (devotion; surrender; submission; faith) for Lord Ram, and the holy river Saraswati symbolized by thoughts and discourses of Brahm, the Supreme Being, the Supreme Atma, the Supreme Self, flows<sup>3</sup>. [One gets a spiritual environment in the company of saints. This is marked by the devotion and enlightenment.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In a religious congregation a large number of saints and holy people collect at a single place. This helps to bring together at one place a good collection of great virtues, excellent qualities and noble characters that these saints possess. On the other hand, they live scattered as a community, and it becomes very tedious and impossible for a person to visit every saint and pious man worth his name, for it may not be possible for him to have knowledge of each individual saint of great quality.

Besides this benefit of an assembly of saints vis-à-vis their general community, the other benefit is that one can easily compare the different virtues and characters that the gathered saints possess, which makes it all the more easy to assess them individually and see how they learn from one another, how they strive to overcome their shortcomings without any sign of inferiority or superiority.

While a visit to an individual saint is surely rewarding, but this reward has its limitations because that particular saint may be exalted on one or two counts of virtues but may be lacking to some degree in another virtue. It is also time consuming for a spiritual aspirant if he goes hunting for virtuous saints, wandering from one place to another, for in all probability he may miss to meet them. These shortcomings are done away with when all great saints collect at one place. It helps the spiritual learner because he has the best teachers and guides at one place.

Now, this assembly of saints and holy souls is compared to 'Prayag' because just like the latter is a 'confluence of three great holy rivers', bringing with them their religious benefits and spiritual rewards at one single place, the assembly or gathering of saints 'showcases at one place, in a concentrated form, all the finest of virtues and characters that they possesses'. If one of these saints is deficient in one virtue, then this deficiency is compensated by another saint. The beneficiary of such a show of the best of spiritual talents at one place is the seeker himself, because he is able to make a wise and considered choice, and decide for himself which of the virtues best suits him and his temperament. It also helps these individual saints as well, because it helps them to identify their own shortcomings and take necessary steps to overcome them.

Briefly, river Ganges is an embodiment of the virtues of Bhakti (devotion) as it emerged from the toes of Lord Vishnu and was held on the head of Lord Shiva before it descended to earth to provide liberation and deliverance to those who had no other means of salvation. River Saraswati is named after a goddess of the same name who stands for 'Gyan' or knowledge, wisdom and enlightenment. Hence, river Saraswati embodies these virtues.

River Yamuna (cited in Chaupai line no. 9 herein below) is the daughter of the Sun God who sustains life in this world, and he inspires the creature to do deeds during the time the sun shines in the sky. The sun also is a symbol of 'light' that removes darkness, the darkness of ignorance and delusions. So therefore, Yamuna symbolizes those saints who do their duty in this world like other ordinary creatures, but with a thought on what is good and what is bad, which deed is righteous and which is to be avoided. Such saints may look engrossed in the affairs of the world, but internally they are pure and holy and tranquil. Their company helps a person to learn how to go about one's life normally, while still gaining spiritual blessedness.

The first river 'Ganges' is called the river of Gods, and it is highly praised in the scriptures as very spiritually purifying, and is considered as the holiest amongst the three. It is said that by bathing in its waters a sinful person can literally wash off his sins, i.e. easily atone for them.

In this verse, 'devotion for Lord Ram' is likened to this holy river, and its significance is clear: one can easily find liberation and deliverance from sins and troubles of the soul that one encounters while living in this gross world by having devotion for Lord Ram who was a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, just as it is easy to clean one's body by taking a dip and rubbing off the dirt from one's body in the crystal clear waters of a great river.

This eclectic spiritual virtue of 'devotion for Lord Ram' is invariably practiced in the community of saints. So when a person comes in contact with saints, he feels the positive energy flowing freely; he lives in this spiritually clean and positive environment. He sees how these saintly people are happy and carefree; he observes their lifestyle and conduct. This sets and acts as an example for him, and true to the adage that 'one becomes like the company one keeps', a person who is fortunate to come in contact with saints undergoes transformation for good.

This virtue of having true knowledge, enlightenment, self-realisation and so forth, is an added bonus and a complimentary virtue to the first virtue of devotion. True saints and holy people are wise enough to take the help of both these two tools for their spiritual good and elevation.

They never waste their time talking about the affairs of the gross, perishable and deluding world of material sense objects and their transient charms and comforts and pleasures. On the contrary, they discuss means to purify their inner self and attain self-realisation. Both 'devotion' and 'contemplation on the Truth of existence, of the self and the Atma' go hand in hand, as two complimentary tools for one's spiritual welfare, liberation and deliverance from this gross world and its delusions, attainment of a state of bliss and beatitude, and the final salvation and emancipation of the 'self'.

Since both these virtues—(i) devotion for Lord God, and (ii) self-realisation and enlightenment about the Atma, the 'true self' of a creature which is not his gross and perishable body, but pure, sublime and subtle Consciousness—are needed for one's spiritual welfare, and the community of saints practices them in a wholesome manner, and therefore for a spiritual seeker the community of saints is the best place to learn about these eclectic and glorious virtues, and to see them being practiced first hand.

The idea in this verse is that when saints gather at a place, one sees two types amongst them—(i) one who is like river Ganges, and (ii) the other who is like river Saraswati. The first sorts of saints have pure devotion for Lord Ram, and by their communion one is able to learn this virtue, its benefits and practice. The second sorts have self-realisation and knowledge of the Truth, and their company helps one to be enlightened about these virtues, their spiritual benefits, and how to practice this path towards fulfillment of spiritual goals.]

bidhi niṣēdhamaya kali mala haranī. karama kathā rabinandani baranī. 9.
hari hara kathā birājati bēnī. sunata sakala muda maṅgala dēnī. 10.

The revered river, who is the daughter of the Sun God (i.e. river Yamuna, which is the third river of the trinity of holy rivers), symbolises the virtue (wisdom) that enlightens a saint about which of the different deeds he should do and which he should avoid. This virtue helps the saint to eliminate the sins that are associated with the era called ‘Kaliyug’, the present period of evil and sinful life<sup>1</sup>. (9)

At such a congregation of saints and pious people, there is a confluence of noble virtues, and freely flowing discourses about divine stories of Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu) and Lord Har (Lord Shiva) which are like the rivers (Ganges, Saraswati and Yamuna) that converge at Triveni (the tīratharāj) with their swift currents symbolising their abilities to wash away sins and evil nature of a person who bathes in them<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A wise and enlightened saint can differentiate between righteous and unrighteous deeds. He will endeavour to do the good deeds, while avoiding those which his sub-conscious tells him are bad for his spiritual welfare. River Yamuna is given a special name here—as being the ‘daughter of the Sun God’. The hidden implication is that this river represents the inherent quality of the sun that it lights up the world and removes its darkness. It is a metaphoric way of saying that the wisdom that river Yamuna stands for enables the saint to see things in the light of knowledge and wisdom. In the bright light of the sun a person is able to see all things distinctly, so likewise by the blessings of river Yamuna a person is able to distinguish between the good and the bad.

The ‘sun’ represents life with all its dynamic activities—because it is during the daytime that every individual gets up and does whatever he is supposed to do in this world. On the other hand, night is dark, and it represents the darkness of delusions and ignorance that makes a creature virtually stunned into inactivity, and this is evident when he shuns all activities and goes to bed, lying motionless as if knocked unconscious, stupefied and numbed. The light of the sun removes all lethargy and delusions, and the same creature regains vitality and energy to do all his pending work as soon as he sees the sun rise and show its light to him.

As we have observed, true saints therefore have three eclectic virtues: (i) devotion, (ii) truthful knowledge, (iii) and the ability to use this knowledge in practice by using the light of wisdom and prudence.

There are four eras according to Hindu scriptures. The fourth era is known as 'Kali-yug'. It has the word "Kali", meaning 'dark; black', as a part of its name. This implies that this era is especially marked by dark deeds that are collectively called sinful. This is why this river also looks dark in colour because it represents the deeds done by a creature during Kaliyug. But this is the external feature of this 'holy' river, for albeit it is dark in colour yet it provides holiness and purity internally. How come? It is because it represents that light of wisdom and discrimination that enables the creature to distinguish between deeds that are righteous, good and noble, and deeds that are not.

So a saint who embodies the virtues of river Yamuna goes about his daily life like ordinary men, but he carefully selects what deeds he does and what he avoids. Therefore, by observing their lives and conduct, the learner spiritual seeker gets to know and see in practice how to live in this world and do one's duties diligently, while still reaping spiritual rewards by remaining aloof from the world and free from its entanglements.

These saints who embody the virtues symbolised by river Yamuna show how one can skip all spiritual and moral faults, taints, shortcomings, smears and scars that will degrade his Atma, his soul, and drag him into the quagmire of worldly affairs that would rob him of his peace and happiness even while remaining involved in one's worldly duties.

<sup>2</sup>At 'Triveni', the rivers come from different directions, but converge into a single body of water. Metaphorically it means that different saints tell the divine stories of the Lord God in different ways and style, highlighting their different aspects and glorious messages, but when the hearer hears them, he is able to stir them into one homogenous story about the divine Lord and his glories in his inner-self, in his mind and subconscious, thereby helping him to extract the best of rewards from all of them by mingling them into one.

Just like bathing in the holy waters of these revered rivers is believed to wash away the sins and evil tendencies of a person, listening to the discourses of saints and holy men at this pilgrimage site known as Triveni helps to dispel all spiritual doubts and their attendant perplexities that cause so much mental unease to a spiritual aspirant, thereby not only granting him peace but also showing him the right path ahead.

These discourses from countless teachers are exceedingly helpful for the seeker of truth because each speaker explains a fundamental principle in his own way and in the way he has himself understood it, but it is quite possible that the idea which he tries to convey is not properly understood by the audience, so then when the listener gets an opportunity to hear the same subject being spoken of by a wide variety of speakers, it is certain that at least one of them would be fully understood by the listener. Besides this benefit, if still any doubts linger, the spiritual aspirant can have an appointment with the teacher he thinks would be best suited for answering his questions and have a direct intercourse with him. No better opportunity to remove doubts, get proper advice and solve spiritual problems can be had as during a large religious congregation where experts in the field assemble at a single place.

There is another benefit of attending such religious congregations. It enables the seeker of truth and a spiritual aspirant to have access to a large number saints and sages at a single place, which helps him find the correct answers to his queries and get these answers double-checked. It is also helpful because then he won't have to go to different places in search of a right teacher who can enlighten him about the subject he wishes to be learn or certain specific questions he wants answered clearly and unambiguously.

Further, the chance to hear many preachers at a single place aids a person to select the right Guru who could help him in his spiritual pursuit by taking into account the individual's personal temperament and aptitude, for such religious congregations provide a vast choice and makes the task of searching a right Guru very easy for the spiritual aspirant as compared to going to any single learned teacher by knowing about him through word-of-mouth and relying on references from others, for it is probable that this teacher may not be the right one for the individual concerned just like the case of a chronically ill patient for whom only a particular doctor's medicine works well though there is no dearth of doctors or hospitals in the world.

In the community of saints (here meaning in all individual saints), the faith and trust that each one of them has in the spiritual path that he has chosen to follow, and his steadfastness in that spiritual path (which is the sacrosanct principle of life for him, his “dharamā”) are like the ‘Vat tree’ (the banyan tree) that is strong, has deep roots, and a long life.

[To wit, the noble virtues that these saintly people possess are qualities that are permanent in them and are deeply ingrained in their character, like the Banyan tree which has deep roots and literally an eternal life as it lives through countless centuries.]

The noble and virtuous actions and deeds of saints are like the working of the royal court of ‘Tīratharāja’, the King of holy places.

[To wit, just as only noble people are admitted in the court of a great King, so only those saints who possess noble qualities are allowed to remain in the community of saints. It is not a place for imposters and mavericks. Therefore, their actions and examples of life are reliable.] (11)

This communion of saints, pious souls and noble people is a blessing that can be accessed by all; people from all geographical areas and communities, of whatever belief and faith, can benefit from their knowledge and communion with them at all times. By respectfully serving such saints and begetting their blessings, by following their examples and advice, all the internal torments and sorrows that one suffers from can be easily eliminated.

[This is because one would learn to lead a noble life and inculcate good qualities, have spiritual wisdom and enlightenment, which all lead to internal peace, happiness, calmness, solace and comfort.] (12)

akatha alaukika tīratharā'ū. dē'i sadya phala pragaṭa prabhā'ū. 13.

This confluence of holy virtues at the symbolic holy place called 'Triveni', the King of pilgrim places (tīratharā'ū) has so great an importance that it cannot be described in words, and neither is it visible in physical terms.

[To wit, the 'Triveni' that is described in the foregoing verses only has a symbolic form. It is used as a metaphor to highlight the importance of the combined virtues of saints and holy people that serve as an example for all spiritual aspirants to follow in their own lives.]

The assembly or congregation of saints grants quick spiritual rewards, and albeit it is only a symbolic form of Triveni (confluence of holy rivers that symbolise flow of abundant good virtues), but these rewards are tangible. (13)

[Note—It is only for the purpose of emphasizing the importance of a community of noble saints and the immensity of spiritual rewards one gets in their company that the holiest of pilgrim places known as Triveni has been cited in these verses. It is merely a metaphor and example.]

So, just like the case that a visit to Triveni bears fruits that are manifold times more than visiting many individual holy places during one's pilgrimage, attending a congregation of saints has far greater benefits than searching them out individually.]

दो०. सुनि समुझहिं जन मुदित मन मज्जहिं अति अनुराग ।

suni samujhahiṁ jana mudita mana majjahiṁ ati anurāga.
lahahiṁ cāri phala achata tanu sādhu samāja prayāga. 2.

Those wise people who cheerfully hear about and understand the symbolism and significance of this holy place known as 'Prayāga' (whose other names are Triveni and Tirtha-raj) that represents an assembly of great saints and holy people, take a dip in the waters of this holy place<sup>1</sup> with great faith, affection and reverence, and such people are able to get the four rewards of life as a human being<sup>1</sup> during their lifetime. (Doha no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This refers to the practice of taking a ritualistic dip or a bath at the confluence of the three holy rivers at the pilgrim site known as 'Prayag' or 'Triveni' as a religious duty that is said to help the pilgrim to wash off the negative effects of his sins, and atone for them. The implied meaning here is that a spiritual aspirant should join a community of saints and live with them for some time to observe their lifestyles and learn from their virtues, seeking guidance whenever needed, and endeavouring to gradually transmew oneself from what one is at present into a noble person who walks on the same path as shewn by these saints to him.]

The analogy of the confluence of three great holy rivers and taking a dip into them as a means of obtaining spiritual merit with the communion of saints is very significant. One gets actual benefit and merit by taking a dip or a bath in any holy place, not only at Triveni, only if he mends his old evil and sinful way of life. Otherwise this is a completely futile exercise, and a waste of money and time going on a pilgrim, if one does not become determined to change himself.

Remember: Taking a bath at a pilgrim place merely as a ritual without sincerely following its subtle requirements for purification of the inner self is equivalent to taking a bath in an ordinary pond, or better still in one's home, because the waters of these rivers at pilgrim places are dirty and full of microbes if one thinks that its physical touch will do some magic. It will make him sick instead.

This bath is a symbolic way of washing one's past and cleaning one's self. So the real cleaning comes when no new dirt is allowed to stick to the inner-self. Similarly, merely meeting saints and sages won't help. The real benefit comes if one follows in their footsteps.

suni ācaraja karai jani kōī. satasaṅgati mahimā nahim gōī. 2.

The rewards or benefits of taking a bath in this symbolic holy place (Prayag; Triveni that represents an assembly of saints) is seen soon, and is so astounding and wondrous as if crows mysteriously get transformed into cuckoos, and cranes into swans<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Let no one be astonished with such transformations, for the glory and mystical powers of saints are tremendous and are not hidden from anyone. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These two instances of a crow getting converted into a cuckoo and a crane into a swan are used in a metaphoric way to emphasise the ability of saints to transform even the most sinful and vile person into one who is honourable and like themselves.

Both the crow and the cuckoo are black in colour, but while the former (the crow) is a hated bird not only for its harsh crowing voice but also because it feeds on flesh of cadavers, the latter (the cuckoo) is a loved bird that sings sweetly and eats plant products like other ordinary birds. The cuckoo is a pet bird of poets.

Similarly, both the crane and the swan have white colour, but their habits and characters are diametrically opposite. The crane is a flesh eating bird, catching fish by standing on one leg in water like a hermit, a posture that cheats the onlooker who may think that the bird is meditating by standing mid-stream; the swan also lives in water but is regarded as a symbol of purity. The swan is a vehicle of goddess Saraswati because it is a symbol of purity though it may live in a surrounding of polluted water of the lake. The swan is a favourite bird with teachers who teach on metaphysics and spiritual philosophy.

Further, the colour of the two sets of birds chosen by Tulsidas also is significant. One set of birds is ‘black’ skinned and the other is ‘white’. It implies that all the people of this world, no matter to which continent or country they belong and which tone of colour their skin has, would universally benefit by their association with saints.

Another reason for selecting a crow and a crane to represent bad and evil people is this: the crow has no pretensions of piety or holiness like the crane which stands mid-stream on one leg like a meditating hermit, only to dive at an innocent and unaware fish and pick it up for food in its beak. To with, this means that there are two sorts of people in this world: one sort that is overtly evil and does not hide its wickedness like the crow, and the other sort is like the crane who are deceitful and cunning, fooling the world by their pretentious exterior of holiness. But both are radically changed when they come in contact with true saints.

Just as this transformation seems magical and astonishing, the change that is brought about in a person with his association of saints is also great and unbelievable.

A similar idea is expressed in Tulsidas’ book of prayers called ‘Vinai Patrika’, in its verse no. 185, stanza no. 3.]

bālamīka nārada ghaṭajōnī. nija nija mukhani kahī nija hōnī. 3.

Great sages like Valmiki<sup>1</sup>, Narad<sup>2</sup> and Agastya<sup>3</sup> (known as “ghaṭajōnī” because he was born in a pitcher) have narrated with their own mouths about their lives, and how they were transmewed into exalted sages due to contact with great saints<sup>4</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Valmiki was a highway robber and hunter in his early life. Once he met the seven celestial sages called the ‘Spata-rishis’ who prevailed upon him to change his lifestyle. So, when Valmiki paid heed to their advice, he was transformed into a great sage and poet.

<sup>2</sup>Narad was the son of a maid-servant in his previous birth. By his good fortune he came in contact with holy men who imparted spiritual wisdom to him and their advice and example made Narad into a great devotee of the Lord. In his next birth, he was born as mind-born son of the creator Brahma.

<sup>3</sup>Agastya was the son of Varun, the Water God. He was conceived in and took birth from a pitcher. Another great and renowned sage Vasistha (who later became the teacher and court priest of Lord Ram and his father king Dasrath of Ayodhya) was also born from the same pitcher. This embryonic association of Agastya with another great sage Vasistha made him an exalted sage himself because now both were like brothers as they shared the same incubator, the pitcher.

Any creature, whether it is an inhabitant of the water (all sorts of aquatic animals), of the land (terrestrial animals of all species and families), or of the air (birds etc.), whether it is animate or inanimate (such as animals that show dynamic movement, or plants as well as those animals that do not show any apparent movement), anywhere in the world [4]---

---whosoever amongst them who has ever got or acquired at any time (jaba jēhim pā'ī) in their lives, any sort of wisdom (mati), glory, fame and acclaim (kīrati), spiritual liberation, deliverance, salvation and emancipation (gati), material prosperity, welfare, or any other good for themselves (bhūti bhalā'ī), by any method or means in this world (jēhim jatana jahām') [5]---

---all of these great and laudable achievements ought to be deemed as the eclectic fruit or reward of good company with saints and holy people.

Verily and forsooth, there is no other means prescribed either by the Vedas or by traditional wisdom in the world by the virtue of which these glories can be achieved. [6] (4-6)

[Note—If a person wishes to acquire good set of virtues and characters that would make him praise worthy in this world, the best and the easiest way for him or her is the company of pious and holy saints. But one should be committed and sincere in his pursuit of true knowledge and a desire to inculcate good virtues, for it is only then that he would closely observe the life, conduct, characters and behaviour of saintly people, try to learn from them and practice these noble virtues in his own life to actually benefit from the company of such great souls. Otherwise it becomes an exercise of mere scrutiny to find faults with these men and prick holes in them and their character. For remember, no matter how excellent a person may be, after all he is a human being, and can't therefore be cent percent perfect. The trick is to pick up and learn the good things, and discard the things that seem not too good.

To wit, a word of caution has to be added here: one has to be discerning and wise if one were to benefit from examples of others or their teachings, for blindly following anyone or any idea would often produce undesired consequences. In this context, the reader should refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 6 which explicitly stresses this point.

The central idea of these verses is that all living beings, whether they are birds and insects, creatures of the water and subterranean world, animals living on land, human beings, including those who live in remote parts such as forests, and even inanimate elements such as rivers, mountains, earth and trees—all have a right to attain deliverance, emancipation and salvation for their souls. This is the singular glory of Lord Ram's divine story, that whosoever hears it becomes entitled to its inherent rewards. This idea is clearly hinted when we read that all those who had the opportunity to see Lord Ram or came in contact with him while he was wondering in the forest, were blessed with the feeling fulfillment, and all became eligible to attain the most exalted state of existence that a soul yearns for. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 136; Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 137; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 138—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 139.]

binu satasaṅga bibēka na hō'ī. rāma krpā binu sulabha na sō'ī. 7. satasaṅgata muda maṅgala mūlā. sō'ī phala sidhi saba sādhana phūlā. 8.

Indeed, true wisdom and the ability to discriminate between the good and the bad cannot be learnt without the company of and association with good and virtuous people (because such company or association is a practical method to learn these virtues and see them in action)<sup>1</sup>. And such a fortunate opportunity of having contact, company or association with good, saintly and holy men (known as “satasaṅga”) is not possible without the grace of Lord Ram (i.e. without the blessing of Lord God)<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Verily, ‘satasaṅga’ is the root of all happiness and joy, of all welfare and well-being, both spiritually and temporally.

Such contact with virtuous people is akin to having fruits for all endeavours because it culminates in spiritual successes (by way of attaining bliss, peace, liberation and deliverance) as well as temporal gains (by way of general improvement in one's character, actions, behaviour, thinking and lifestyle that brings in fame and reputation).

All other methods are merely like flowers (as they may look very attractive and colourful, and may also give temporary fame and signs of happiness, but they do not provide any solid nourishment to the soul and neither are they permanent). (8)

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram's grace is essential for getting the chance to meet good teachers who would show the right and the correct path to the devotee, and remove all his confusions and doubts. Hence, a devotee should pray to the Lord to guide him to a wise and enlightened Guru.

Even the wicked, evil, mischievous and unscrupulous creatures are modified and transmuted for good under the positive and auspicious effects of contact with and company of saints and virtuous people just like iron that is converted into gold by the mere contact with the 'pārasa mani', or the 'philosopher's stone'<sup>1</sup>. (9)

On the other hand, if virtuous and saintly people come in contact with evil and wicked people by ill fate or unfortunate circumstances, they still are able to maintain their noble virtues and characters instead of being tainted by the evilness of their unfortunate company just as the 'Mani' (gem) present on the hood of a special class of serpents is not affected by the poison present in the body of the host snake<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 37 where a similar idea is reiterated. When someone comes in contact with a holy and pious person, the latter's positive energy and auspicious aura leaves a lasting impression on the former so much so that if this contact is sustained then one day the former becomes a changed person and more in likeness to the holy person with whom he has come in contact than his own previous self. It is like the case of an axe used to cut sandalwood; though the axe hits the sandalwood with the intent to harm it by cutting it, but the mere contact with the latter leaves its sweet aroma on the blade of the axe. Similarly, though a wicked man may intend harm to a saintly person, but his contact with the latter leaves a positive impression on him so much so that in due course of time the wicked man regrets his actions and feels the urge to beg forgiveness; not only this, but the wicked man may even have a change of heart and gets transmuted into a gentleman.

<sup>2</sup>A special species of snake secretes a thick sap from the cells of the skin on its hood. This viscous secretion solidifies and glows in darkness. It is believed that these snakes see their path in its light when they move out from their holes in search of food. The idea is that albeit the snake is very poisonous, the gem manages to retain its glow and shine; it is not darkened by the thick dark poison present in the body of the snake although the Mani is a product of the secretion of the cells of the same snake.

In like manner, virtuous saints are able to maintain their virtuousness inspite of the evil company that surrounds them. But howbeit, the wicked company that surrounds them gains by its association with these saintly people just as the snake gains its sight in the presence of the Mani.

Even the Creator (Bidhi; Lord Brahma), Hari (Lord Vishnu), Har (Lord Shiva), expert poets and scholars who are wise and well-versed in the knowledge of qualities that are deemed to be excellent and exemplary, feel hesitant to speak of the immensity of glories and the profound effects of wonderful characters and noble virtues of such saints and pious people (11),-----

-----then say how can I (Tulsidas) ever enumerate them or tell about them fully just like the case of a vegetable hawker who can never be expected, by any count, to ever be able to tell the value of a priceless gem. (12)

[Note—Tulsidas just gives a hint of the greatness of saints and holy men, and the rewards one can get by being associated with them, by keeping their company, and having contact with them. For in all sooth and without gainsay, their greatness and goodness are so huge and immeasurable that even the most learned and wise amongst men would be unable to describe them fully. To wit, the stellar virtues and spiritual qualities of saints and pious people are so great that it is impossible to list them.

A vendor of vegetables will not be able to judge the price of a gem if he finds one, for his skills at judgment of the quality and price of a thing is limited to vegetables, and he is not competent and qualified to decide the quality or price of a gem; this falls in the realm of a jeweler. So likewise Tulsidas says that he is not an expert to give a lecture on the qualities of saintly persons and define their characters exhaustively except to say that they are great and honourable in every respect, and worthy of emulation.]

banda'um̐ santa samāna cita hita anahita nahim̐ kō'i.

an̐jali gata subha sumana jimi sama sugandha kara dō'i. 3 (a).

I (Tulsidas) bow my head most reverentially before saints and holy men of immaculate virtues and noble characters, who practice the virtues of equanimity and evenness of mind under all situations (samāna cita), who have no friend who will favour them nor any enemy who could harm their interests (“hita anahita nahim̐ kō'i”; because they treat everyone alike and see the same Atma or pure consciousness in all of them)—just like the case of the flower that lends its sweet fragrance equally to both the hands: one hand that had torn it away or plucked it from its natural habitat in the tree (i.e. the hand that caused injury to the flower and caused it immense pain and misery by forcibly pulling it out of its natural home on the tree, thereby depriving it not only of its natural shelter but also a source of its nutrition and chance to live its life fully and peacefully, spreading its natural beauty and fragrance all around), as well as the other hand that holds it softly, lovingly and caringly in its palm, the hand that picks up the flower that falls on the ground and fears being trampled upon. (Doha no. 3 a) [Note—Two situations are compared here vis-à-vis the flower. One case is when someone who is selfish and heartless would mercilessly pluck the flower from the tree just because he develops a fancy for it, without bothering how much pain he is causing to the flower by pulling it out of its natural habitat. Then soon this cruel person would throw this flower away once his lust is satisfied, and let it perish on the ground.

The second case is that of a kind person who would hold the flower softly in his hands, appreciate its beauty and fragrance, admire the glory of its creator, the Lord God, and leave the flower as it is on the tree; if by chance he sees a fallen flower he would pick it up tenderly and keep it safely with him till it dries up on its own.

In both the cases it is observed that the hands that touch and hold the flower acquire its sweet fragrance in equal measure, because the flower has a natural habit of blessing all those who come in contact with it by lending its pleasant scent to them, irrespective of the nature of the person who holds it, and without distinguishing between anyone. To wit, whether or not the holder of that flower had been its tormentor or benefactor, the flower lends its pleasant scent equally to both of them.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 37.

Similarly, a saintly person wishes good of all people; he harbours ill-will against none. He would equally bless a person who means harm to him and a person who would love to serve him. A saintly person practices equanimity, evenness of mind, fortitude, calmness and composure under all circumstances, favourable or otherwise. For him, there is no foe or friend, for he understands that the true identity of all living beings is their Atma, their pure self which is eternal and pure consciousness, and not their external gross body that is mortal. So therefore, all notions of being a friend or a foe of anyone are meaningless for saints as these notions are limited to the gross, physical, mortal body and its relationship with an equally gross mortal world, and not to the Atma.

True saints are of a pure and simple heart, without any kind of deceit, conceit or pretensions whatsoever. They are universally a well-wisher of the world at large, and never think of any harm to it.

Recalling their kind and gracious nature as well as their natural affection for all the creatures, wishing for the good of all without exception and distinction, Tulsidas says that he is inspired and encouraged to pray to them so that they can hear his earnest child-like plea and grant him the boon of having steady and robust devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram (who is the revered deity of Tulsidas). (Doha no. 3 b)

[Note—Tulsidas asks saints and noble-hearted persons that they should please bless him with the boon of having love and affection for his dearest Lord Ram in order to live upto their reputation of being king, gracious and benevolent towards one and all. He seeks no other blessings except this one, and being exalted and realized souls, who naturally are endowed with spiritual powers, it is not difficult for them to grant him his wishes.]

para hita hāni lābha jinha kērēm̐. ujarēm̐ haraṣa biṣāda basērēm̐. 2.

Tulsidas says—‘Now I bow my head sincerely (bandi --- satibhā'ēm̐) to those who are wicked (khala gana) (so that they leave me alone in peace, do not create unnecessary nuisance for me, and let me move ahead in my endeavour to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram), because they have a natural habit of and a propensity for creating trouble and mischief for others without rhyme or reason, even to those who are their well-wishers and cause no harm to them (jē binu kāja dāhinēhu bā'ēm̐). (1)

[Now, Tulsidas enumerates the negative qualities of those people who are classified as ‘non-saints’—i.e. those who are wicked, wild, pervert, sinful, evil, deceitful, jealous, full of vices, mean and lowly.]

Non-saints are wicked people who are evil and pervert. In their view, harming the interest of others is equivalent to getting profit for themselves. They get immense pleasure when others are uprooted or destabilized or ruined, and feel grief and become miserable if others are established, become prosperous, are happy and cheerful. (2)

[Note—It is to be noted that Tulsidas has clearly stated the reason why he is praying to those who are called ‘Non-Saints’. He wants to keep them in good humour and pleased so that they don’t feel offended that Tulsidas has neglected them and insulted them by not bowing before them even as he has prayed and bowed to others. Non-Saints are egoist, hypocrites and haughty, and they easily get angry if they feel someone has not offered them respect. So Tulsidas thought to himself that there is no use of unnecessarily creating a problem if it can be avoided. It is wiser not to provoke people who come under the category of being ‘non-saints’ and inviting their wrath; what harm is there if a little pretension of showing false respect to them by bowing one’s head before them can help in avoiding a confrontation with them wicked rascals.

But then he thought that if he does not clarify his position then it would give a wrong signal to posterity. So he lists the negative traits of Non-Saints, saying in effect that it is not that he does not know that such people are bad and evil by every imaginable count, but it is wiser to keep them pleased and at bay by false praise so that they do not create a ruckus and throw a spanner in the wheel of some noble endeavour. What great purpose would be served by stoking their hurt ego and inviting their wrath unnecessarily?

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 40; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 17-20 that precede Doha no. 121.

In the opening verses of his epic ‘Ram Charit Manas’, Tulsidas has praised everyone and has prayed to one and all seeking their blessings and good wishes so that he is able to fulfill his mission of narrating the glorious and divine story of Lord Ram, the Lord dearest to his heart, successfully and without any unwarranted obstacles. During this process of humbly seeking everyone’s patronage and blessing Tulsidas has also bowed and prayed to those who are wicked and evil, i.e. the ‘Non-Saints’.

Now, on the face of it this seems extremely odd and incredulous that a great saint like Tulsidas would even think to pray to and praise those who come under the category of Non-Saints. But this is a very clever and wise move by the erudite and prudent poet as he wants to keep those who are wicked and evil-in-heart in good humour by pretending to offer his respects to them, lest they feel side-lined and insulted by him and therefore do their best to harass and torment him no end, and do whatever they possibly can do to stop him from achieving success in his endeavour. Tulsidas has expressly said this thing while offering his obeisance to the wicked and the vile, the Non-Saints, when he says that these people find great pleasure in tormenting others for no rhyme or reason, and so it is wiser to keep them happy with the purpose of keeping them at bay instead of antagonizing them by either neglecting them or criticizing them outright.

But even while praying to such Non-Saints Tulsidas has pointed out their negativities and evil character, saying in effect that he wished to keep them pleased precisely for these reasons—for otherwise they would unleash their horrifying acts against him, and causing unwarranted torment and hindrance in his work.

For our purpose this helps us to understand the evil nature and the pervert character of Non-Saints. Hence, let’s start reading them in these verses.]

हरि हर जस राकेस राहु से । पर अकाज भट सहसबाहु से ॥ ३ ॥
जे पर दोष लखहिं सहसाखी । पर हित घृत जिन्ह के मन माखी ॥ ४ ॥ hari hara jasa rākēsa rāhu sē. para akāja bhaṭa sahasabāhu sē. 3.

jē para dōṣa lakhahīṁ sahasākhī. para hita ghr̥ta jinha kē mana mākhī. 4.

They are like ‘Rahu’<sup>1</sup>, the trunk-less head of the demon who devours the sun and the moon to cause the solar and the lunar eclipses respectively, for the good name and fame of Lords Hari (Vishnu) and Har (Shiva).

[Lord Vishnu is the second god of the Trinity responsible for sustenance of creation, and Lord Shiva is the third god of the Trinity responsible for conclusion of creation. These two gods are regarded as the senior most in the pantheon of gods. Hence, this stanza means that wicked and un-saintly people do not like the good name and fame of the Lord to spread, and they do everything within their might to obstruct them and ridicule them.]

They are like the very powerful and strong demon called Sashastra Bahu<sup>2</sup> (the one with a thousand arms) when it comes to harming the interest of other creatures.

[To wit, they use thousands of ways and countless stratagems to torment others and see that they and their interests suffer. They derive sadistic and animal-like pleasure in doing so.] (3)

They see even minor faults of others with a thousand eyes.

[To wit, they magnify even inconsequential shortcomings in others. They literally use the magnifying glass to scrutinize each and every action, word, behaviour and other aspects of the other person’s life so that they can pounce upon him at the first slip that he makes, and are ever eager to prick holes in others and find one fault in them which they blow out of proportion as an opportunity to humiliate him, ridicule him and cause discomfort to him. As already said earlier, they derive sadistic pleasure in doing so, in spite of themselves being full of gaping black holes and vices of all kinds.]

For anything that is good for the welfare of others, they act like an insect that falls in clarified butter to ruin it.

[The good of others is compared to clarified butter here, and wicked people to the insect. By falling in the butter, the insect has nothing to gain, but it nevertheless falls in it just to ruin the butter even if this means its own death. Likewise, wicked and pervert people would allow themselves to suffer if it also means suffering for others.] (4).

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Rahu and Ketu: The legend has it that Rahu was the eldest son of the demon Viprachitti and his wife Shinghikaa. His younger brothers were Ilvala, Vaataapi, Narak amongst others. When Lord Vishnu, disguised as the beautiful Mohini, was distributing the ambrosia of eternity called Amrit to the Gods during the episode of the churning of the ocean as told in the Purans, Rahu assumed the form of a God and surreptitiously entered the lines of the Gods to take this Amrit. When his cheating was discovered, Vishnu cut-off his head with his weapon called the Chakra Sudarshan (a circular saw-like discus). But it so happened that before the head was severed Rahu had already drunk some Amrit, and so did not die. His head and torso became two independent entities. The former was called ‘Rahu’ and the latter ‘Ketu’.

Since the Moon God and the Sun God had betrayed him, Rahu takes revenge by devouring them periodically to satisfy his hunger. He devours them when they are in their full glory—viz. he devours the Moon God during the full moon night, and the Sun God only during the day time, either when the sun rises or during its journey across the sky, but never at sunset when the sun is already losing its radiance and is on the decline.

Again, since the head of Rahu was severed from the neck, hence both the Moon God and the Sun God re-emerge from the lower end of the head after they have been devoured by the mouth of Rahu. This is why the moon and the sun appear to be getting gradually cut-off from view from one end of their discs, symbolizing their gradually entering the mouth of Rahu as the latter begins to devour them. Then for some time they remain dark or obstructed from view symbolizing the period when they remain inside the mouth of Rahu. Finally, they gradually regain their original shape symbolizing their ejection from the lower end of Rahu's neck where it was severed from the trunk.

Thus we see that the mythological origin of the solar and lunar eclipse can be traced to this event of the churning of the ocean and the demon Rahu getting his head cut-off because he had cheated Vishnu in an attempt to drink Amrit. But having already drunk this elixir, he could not die; the head became Rahu and the trunk became Ketu (a comet). Because of this enmity, Rahu extracted a boon that he would eat the sun and the moon periodically when he felt hungry, which, according to mythology, he does during the solar and lunar eclipses respectively. The sun or the moon enter his mouth (the beginning of the eclipse), and emerge from his severed throat (marking the end of eclipse).

The story of Rahu appears in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Chapter 8, Canto 9.

Actually however, the phenomenon of the lunar eclipse is due to the earth's shadow falling on the moon's surface when it comes in the path of this shadow during its revolution around the earth. This scientific fact was known to the great Rishis (sages and seers) who had preached the Upanishads, and it is clearly mentioned in Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 74 of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition which says "When the moon is said to be devoured by the demon Rahu (the severed head of a demon) during the lunar eclipse, people start offering worship, making sacrifices, doing penances, taking purifying baths, giving alms and making charities, observing austerities etc. so that the Moon God is freed from the demon's curse, but all their deeds are a waste of effort and done in utter ignorance because there is no such event, and the darkness on the moon's disc is actually a shadow of the earth falling upon it. This shadow would go away on its own when the time comes even if no such hue and cry is raised by worried worshippers. So it is a height of stupidity and profound ignorance to even think that the Moon God has been cursed or is being devoured, and by doing so many religious deeds it can be freed from its torments."

Similarly, the solar eclipse is caused when the moon comes in between the shiny surface of the sun and the view from earth, thereby blocking the former's view from the latter's surface.

The elongated torso of Rahu came to known as 'Ketu' and it is recognized as the comet in modern science. That is why sighting of the comet is regarded as a bad omen.

Both Rahu and Ketu are placed amongst the nine planets. They represent the two nodal points where the celestial equator cuts the ecliptic.

In iconography, Rahu is depicted as just a head or even as a snake's hood.

<sup>2</sup>Sahastra Bahu: The story of ‘Sahastra-baahu’ in brief is as follows—There was once a thousand-armed Kshatriya (warrior class) king known as ‘Sahastraarjun’ or ‘Arjun with a thousand hands’. He was the son of king Kritvirya whose kingdom was known as Anup; its capital city was known as Maahismati and it was situated on the southern bank of river Narmada.

In his early life he was a very righteous and conscientious person, a man of upright thoughts and noble conduct. After the death of his father when the court ministers wished to anoint him on the throne of the kingdom, he refused, saying: ‘Kingdom leads a king to hell if he cannot live upto the expectations of his subjects and rule according to the principles of Dharma (righteousness and probity). The main source of income of a king is ‘tax collected from his subjects’, but if this tax is collected in an improper way, and if it is not utilized for the welfare of the subjects of the kingdom in accordance with the principles of Dharma which say that the main use of state revenue is to ensure that traders are given all facilities and protection for carrying out legitimate trade, are not looted by thieves, the subjects of the kingdom are given due protection and their interests are always kept ahead of everything else, and so on and so forth. So unless I acquire such powers and abilities by doing Tapa (penance), I will not accept the throne.’

When Sahastrabahu said this, the great sage Garg advised him that if he indeed wishes to do Tapa and acquire mytical powers to rule the vast kingdom in accordance to Dharma then he should go and serve Lord Dattatreya, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu. Dattatreya lived in a cave of Mt. SahyaParvat and did Tapa there (Markandeya Puran, Canto 18). So, Sahastrabahu went to Lord Dattatreya and began serving him diligently for a long period of ten thousand years.

According to Padma Puran, Sristi Khand, Canto 12, when Dattatreya was pleased with his service and austerities, he granted him four boons: (i) First, the king asked for one thousand arms. (ii) Second, he wished that no one in his kingdom would even dare to think in an unrighteous and sinful way. (iii) Third, he wanted to conquer the whole earth and rule over it. (iv) Fourth, that if he has to die then it must be in the battle-field at the hands of a warrior who is superior to him in every way.

According to Markandey Puran, Canto 18, verse nos. 14-18, the king was granted ten boons as follows: (i) The powers and authority to rule over his subjects without acquiring sins. (ii) The ability to know the thoughts of others. (iii) No one should be able to face in the battle-field (i.e. he should become invincible). (iv) During a war he should have a thousand arms so as to fight his opponent with all of them at once. [This is also mentioned in Harivansha Puran, Canto 33, verse no. 14.] (v) He should have unhindered access to all places in the sky, water, earth, mountains and the nether world. (vi) If he has to die then it should be at the hands of someone stronger than him. (vii) If by chance he goes astray and falls on the wrong path, then he must have a chance to get good advice and company of saintly persons (i.e. he must be given an opportunity to mend his ways). (viii) He must have illustrious persons as his guests so that he can serve them and get their blessings. (ix) His wealth should never diminish even after liberal charities and giving of alms regularly; there should be no shortage of wealth in his kingdom. (x) The virtue of Bhakti (having devotion for Lord God) should be firm and perpetual in him.

In Mahabharat, Van Parva, Canto 115, verse no. 12, it is said that by the grace of Dattatreya the king acquired an air-plane made of gold; that he ruled over the entire earth; and that no one could stop his chariot. He was a great Emperor who conquered the whole world and made liberal charities. He is also regarded as a great scholar of Tantra Shastra.

He was so powerful and mighty that when he bathed in the ocean and thrashed it with his thousand arms, he could turn the tide backwards. He would splash the water so heavily that marine creatures were tossed into the air like ninepins. [Brahm-Vaivarta Puran, Ganesh Khand, Canto 23-27.]

But the Laws of Creation are such that every good thing has to come to an end one day; nothing is eternal and permanent in this mortal gross world. This also applied to Sahastrabahu. As time passed, he became extremely haughty and cruel. He started subjugating even the Gods so as to remove all challenges to his authority and power. It is said that he ruled for eighty-five thousand years before he was killed by sage Parashuram.

Once he was asked by the Fire God for alms, and the noble king could not refuse. The Fire God used this grant to burn everything and cause havoc everywhere, because he was certain that Sahastrabahu would not stop him. During this burning spree, the Fire destroyed the hermitage of sage Aapava (who was later on known as sage Vasistha according to Brahm Puran during its description of the race of Yayaati). The sage cursed king Sahastrabahu that his arms, relying upon whose strength the Fire God had destroyed his hermitage and was wreaking havoc on earth, would be cut by sage Parashuram. [Refer: Mahabharat, Shanti Parva, Canto 49, verse nos. 35-45; and Padma Puran, Sristi Khand, Canto 12.]

One day, he was wandering along the shore of the ocean and out of his pride and haughtiness he covered it with thousands of arrows. The Ocean assumed a form and appeared before him to plead that he stop showering arrows into the water as all the marine creatures that live in the water would die. Sahastrabahu accepted the prayer but asked the Ocean to tell him about someone who could face him in battle, as he was itching for a face-off with anyone who could claim to be stronger than him as he wished to conquer the opponent and become an unchallenged warrior in this world. The Ocean told him to go sage Jamdagni whose son Parashuram would be fit opponent for him and would welcome him in battle. [Refer: Mahabharat, Ashwamegh Parva, Canto 29.]

Such was Sahastraarjun's sense of ego and pride that he could not bear that someone stronger be there on earth in his presence. So he collected his huge army and went to the hermitage of sage Jamdagni.

The sage duly welcomed the king and extended warm hospitality to him. Sahastraarjun was however astonished at the lavish way the forest-dwelling hermit had entertained him. So he wanted to know the reason. Upon finding out that the sage managed to do this miracle because he possessed a divine cow known as 'Kamdhenu' or Kapila cow which could produce anything desired in an instant, the greedy king was filled with jealousy. Driven by avarice and rapacity, he demanded that the sage give this cow to him. Obviously Jamdagni refused. So the king forcefully snatched the cow from him and in the ensuing tussle he killed Jamdagni.

At that time, Jamdagni's brave son Parashuram was not there. When he returned, home he found his mother grieving. Coming to know of the reason, he immediately took the vow that he will eliminate all the Kshatriya kings from the surface of the earth by killing all of them. His mother had beaten her chest twenty-one times as a sign of mourning, so he declared that he will continue to wipe out the Kshatriya kings for an equal number of times, i.e. for twenty-one generations.

He comforted his mother and attacked Sahastraarjun, severed all his thousand arms with his battle-axe and then killed him. [This story is narrated in Mahabharat, Ashwamegha Parva, Canto 29.]

Extremely peeved by the Kshatriya race to which this king belonged, Parashuram vowed to eliminate the entire race from the surface of the earth as a revenge for the killing of his father. This was the reason why Parashuram had fought and killed thousands of Kshatriya to avenge the killing of his father by Sahastraarjun.]

तेज कृसानु रोष महिषेसा । अघ अवगुन धन धनी धनेसा ॥ ५ ॥

tēja kṛsānu rōṣa mahiṣēsā. agha avaguna dhana dhanī dhanēsā. 5.
udaya kēta sama hita sabahī kē. kumbhakarana sama sōvata nīkē. 6.

They are as vicious, stern, fierce, crude, rude, vengeful and scorching as the raging fire, and are comparable to the God Yam<sup>1</sup>, the god of death, as regards their anger and wrathfulness. They have a rich treasury of evil virtues of sins and vices so much so that they are comparable to Kuber, the treasurer of gods who has immense wealth at his disposal, in this respect. [To wit, in vengefulness and anger they are compared to the Yam, and in the quantity of sins and vices they have they are like Kuber.] (5)

Their ascendance in this world is like the appearance of the comet<sup>2</sup> which is an evil omen heralding ruin and destruction for all others in this world. Therefore, it is better for them that they keep sleeping like the demon Kumbhakaran<sup>3</sup> (who was a brother of Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, and slept for months together which was a sort of blessing for others, because when he woke up once in a while he ate everything he laid his hand upon, creating widespread ruin and shortage in the kingdom).

[Unholy and un-saintly people are better off remaining dormant and in oblivion, because if they are given any chance to become active and influential, it would be detrimental for the welfare of the rest of the society.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word used in the text is ‘mahīṣēsā’. It means ‘the God who is the lord of a buffalo’, or ‘the God who rides a buffalo’. Yam, the god of death, is the one who rides a buffalo, and his angry, wrathful, vicious, stern and uncompromising temperament is just like that of non-saints.

Another interpretation of this word is that it refers to a ferocious demon named ‘Mahisasur’ or the demon with the body of a wild buffalo. He was a ferocious demon so-called because he had the form of a huge wild buffalo, or could assume this form at his free will. He was the son of the demon Rambha; his mother was named Mahishi. In Srimad Bhagvat Mahapurāṇ, 6/18/16, he is said to be the great grandson of the demon Hiranyakashipu.

He did severe Tapa (penance; austerity) on the summit of Mt. Hemgiri and obtained a boon from Brahma (the creator) that he would not be killed by anyone except a woman. The demon thought that if no male can kill him no matter how strong his opponent is, it is well nigh impossible for a woman to face him for he considered woman as physically weak and meek who could be easily subdued and conquered by him if she ever dared to challenge his might. After acquiring this boon he became extremely ruthless because he felt no one would ever kill him. So he conquered the heaven and the Gods; enslaving them and usurping their power and authority, and declaring himself as the 'lord of the world'.

When the Gods prayed to the Mother Goddess to eliminate this demon, she assumed the form of Goddess Kalika Devi, the 'Goddess of Death'. In the fierce battle that ensued between her and Mahisasur, a description of which is given in Markandeya Puran, Mahisasur Vadha, Canto 3, the Goddess finally slayed him.

Mahisasur is regarded as an embodiment of anger, cruelty, viciousness, wrathfulness and vengefulness as well as pride, ego and haughtiness. So therefore non-saints are also compared to him. Like this demon, the non-saints cause immense misery to one and all, and they are difficult to control.

His story also appears in 'Devimahatamya' which is considered as a part of Markandeya Puran, Chapters 78-90. However, it is also believed that Devimahatamya is an independent work that was later on inserted in the Markandeya Puran. It is also known by two other names: viz. Durgasaptashati and Chandi. This work has three parts known as (i) 'Pratham-Charit' that has chapter no. 1 and deals with the greatness of goddess Mahakali; (ii) 'Madhyama-Charit' that has three chapters, 2, 3 and 4, and deal with the greatness of goddess Laxmi; and (iii) 'Uttama-Charit' that has chapters 5 to 13 and deal with the glories of goddess Maha-Saraswati.

It is in the second part, i.e. 'Madhyama-Charit', that the story of Mahisasur is narrated. It is said here that the demon was slayed by Goddess Durga who rides a lion.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 177. When Kubhakaran, the younger brother of the demon Ravana, did severe Tapa, and Brahma, the creator, appeared before him to grant him a boon, he saw the colossal body of Kumbhakaran and thought that if he ate daily then the whole earth would begin to starve. So Brahma instructed the goddess of wisdom known as Sarada or Saraswati to confuse and delude Kumbhakaran's mind, and so he asked for a stupid and absurd boon—which was that he should enjoy sleep for six continuous months! And the day he woke up he ate so greedily and voraciously that the earth faced a crisis of food for a long time thereafter. How voracious his appetite was, and how ferocious and colossal he was is clearly hinted in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 64, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 65, and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 67—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 71 that describe the scene of the battle at Lanka where Kumbhakaran fought Lord Ram and was finally slayed by the Lord.]

Even as hail destroys the harvest though it is ruined itself in the process and dies (i.e. dissolves and go to waste after ruining the standing crop), such evil and un-saintly people enjoy causing harm to others and obstructing their interest and well-being for no rhyme or reason, and even it means that they have to die for it<sup>1</sup>.

[To wit, wicked people would die to cause harm to others. They find sadistic pleasure in tormenting others and inflicting misery upon them. Earlier it was merely said that they derive pleasure in harming or troubling others, and here it is emphasized that not only this, they are so wicked, cruel, mean and evil-minded that they won't mind suffering themselves if it creates problems for others.] (7)

I (Tulsidas) treat such people as the thousand-hooded serpent called Seshnath, and pay my respects to them.

[This is said in sarcasm. Tulsidas compares them to the celestial serpent known as Seshnath who is said to have a thousand tongues. He says that this huge dragon-like serpent pours venom and spouts fire from its mouth, and anyone daring to go near it would be scorched to death. So non-saints are like this dragon. Nay, non-saints are worse than an ordinary poisonous serpent, for they are like a thousand-hooded dragon. When they open their mouth to speak, the words that come out are like the scorching fire spouting from the mouth of a dragon. They spit abuses and mouth sinful words which are a thousand times more irritating and pricking than the bite of a serpent. So Tulsidas says that it is better to bow before them and avoid them from a distance lest they would scorch him with their ferocious fire-spewing venomous tongue!]

They have the habit of highlighting and shouting loudly with thousands of mouths about the faults of others. [To wit, they rarely think about their own faults, but exaggerate those of others.] (8)

पुनि प्रनवउँ पृथुराज समाना । पर अघ सुनइ सहस दस काना ॥ ९ ॥

 bacana bajra jēhi sadā pi'ārā. sahasa nayana para dōṣa nihārā. 11.

Again, I (Tulsidas) treat them as king Prithu<sup>1</sup> because they have thousands of ears to hear about faults and shortcomings of others.

[King Prithu had sought a boon from Lord Vishnu that he may have thousands of ears to hear the greatness and the glories of the Supreme Being. But these wicked people enjoy hearing wicked things, and they are all ears for wild gossip, back-biting and tattling.] (9)

Similarly, I treat them like Indra, the king of Gods, who derives pleasure in drinking ambrosia, because like Indra these wicked people derive pleasure in drinking wine and other intoxicating drinks.

[To wit, whereas Indra and other Gods like to drink nectar and other good drinks, people who are non-saints like to indulge in intoxicating drinks and eat things that are generally not worthy to be eaten.] (10)

They always like to use words which are harsh and rude just like the weapon of Indra that is known as Vajra. [This weapon of Indra is said to be extremely harsh and merciless. Similarly, the words that non-saints use for others cause immense pain to them.]

And when it comes to observing and closely analyzing the faults of others, they have thousands of eyes ready for it (just like the so-called thousand eyes of Indra)<sup>2</sup>.

[Indra was cursed to have thousands of holes in his body as symbolic eyes because he had cheated sage Gautam's chaste wife Ahilya. These holes were shaped like eyes so that the world could know about Indra's promiscuous nature. Likewise, evil people use their faculty of sight to see wrong in other people and in everything else in this world. Again, like the Indra drinking the lowly wine in spite of his being the king of gods and having an easy access to the ambrosia meant for the gods, these wicked and lowly people enjoy things which are not regarded in high esteem. They are born as humans, but do not use this once in a lifetime opportunity to do something good and constructive for their own spiritual welfare as well as for the others. Instead, they enjoy wallowing in the muck and the junk of this world and its material objects, spending their lifetime scheming against others, plotting how to harm them, finding immense pleasure in gratifying their sense organs and satisfying their lust and passions. ] (11)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Prithu was a great ruler who ruled according to the laws of Dharma (laws of righteousness, probity, propriety and noble thought and conduct). He was a religious man who is credited with making the earth habitable and civilized by establishing great towns and cities and a civilized society in a planned manner. All the Gods were pleased with him. His story appears in Srimad Bhagvat Mahapuran, 4/15-20. Once Lord Vishnu appeared before him and asked him to request for a boon of his choice. Prithu said: 'Oh Lord. I don't want heaven. If indeed you are pleased with me then grant me a boon that I may hear your glories and stories of your divinity and greatness with a thousand ears.' [Refer: Srimad Bhagvat Mahapuran, 4/20/24.]

Citing this example Tulsidas says that wicked people are like king Prithu, but with a difference. While Prithu wished to hear about the Lord God with his thousand ears, those who are non-saints revel in hearing wicked things and dirty gossip without end.

<sup>2</sup>Indra is the King of Gods, but unfortunately he is extremely passionate and lustful. The reason is that from the metaphysical point of view he personifies the sense organs of a creature that are always eager for gratification and yearn for sensual pleasures of this gross material world. According to mythology, Indra was once cursed by sage Gautam to have a thousand holes all over his body because he had deceitfully had sex with the sage's wife named Ahilya by assuming the form of her husband. The sage said: 'You see nothing but a vagina everywhere; so let the world see your body punctured by a thousand holes symbolising the vaginas you yearn for.'

It is a natural habit of wicked and evil minded people that they become jealous, develop malice towards, and become indignant upon hearing something good about others, or about their welfare and good fortune, irrespective of the fact that such persons may have nothing to do with them, are not even remotely related to them or concerned with them, or may be their friend or enemy. Taking this habit of theirs into consideration, I (Tulsidas) thinks it proper to join my hands (palms of the hands) to pray to them (to leave me alone in peace). (Doha no. 4)

[Note—Tulsidas says that evil persons are living devils; their hearts are workshops of Satan. They are inclined to see negative side of everything, and think that every person is evil like them, whether that person is their enemy or a friend, or even those who are neutral towards them, persons who will cause them no harm even in the remotest possibility.

To wit, no matter how good others do to them, they will always be suspicious of their benefactors; nay, they will even think of harming the latter at the first opportunity. Their character is absolutely opposite to that of a saintly person.]

I (Tulsidas) have done my bit by praying to them and showing my respect to them, entreating them to be kind to me and spare me any trouble. But (I know for certain that) they (non-saints and wicked people) would not defer from their path; they would not restrain themselves and refrain from doing what they are accustomed to do (which is to torment others endlessly for no rhyme or reason)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Say, would a crow ever become a non-meat eater (i.e. a vegetarian) even if one rears it carefully and feeds it fondly with the choicest of food<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, although a wise person may be careful not to offend wicked and non-saintly person and might also show superficial respect to such people just to keep them in good humour, yet these rascals pay no heed to his kind overtures and remain true to their habit of causing distress and misery to others. Tulsidas means that though he has done the incredulous thing of bowing his head to non-saints in the hope that they would leave him to have his peace, yet he is quite certain that they would continue to haunt him because it is their dismal nature to remain ungrateful and unobliging.]

To wit, a wise person must not expect anything from a non-saint except evil and rebuke.]

bichurata ēka prāna hari lēhīm. milata ēka dukha dārūna dēhīm. 4.

[In these verses, Tulsidas has compared Saints and Non-Saints by judging them against each other in a judicious manner like a true judge by using the same sets of criteria or similar parameters for both to determine why and how one is good for the society and the other is bad. He sort of pits the Saint against the Non-Saint and lets us judge for ourselves their usefulness or otherwise for us. It ought to be noted here that the distinction between a Saintly person and a Non-Saintly person is made solely on their inherent character, qualities and virtues, either positive or negative, but not at all on their birth, caste, creed, religion and lineage. This is very important as it gives a secular, balanced and an unbiased method of judgment that is based entirely on merits and qualities of a person with no other factor interfering in arriving at the final verdict.]

Tulsidas says—‘I bow at the feet of both the saintly people as well as those who are un-saintly. Both give pain and grief—but there is a difference between the two. (3)

What is the difference between a saint (i.e. person who is holy, pious, noble, righteous, truthful and spiritually enlightened and wise) and a non-saint (i.e. a person who is the opposite of a saint; he is wicked, cruel, sinful, pervert, corrupt, evil, selfish and gross by nature)?

Well, the difference is that when the first (i.e. the saintly person) leaves someone, it gives sorrow of separation; no one wants a saint to go away; their company provides happiness and a positive energy to one and all. On the other hand, when the second type of person (the non-saint; the wicked and the pervert) meets someone then he immediately causes a lot of pain and trouble to the latter.

उपजहिं एक संग जग माहीं । जलज जोक जिमि गुन बिलगाहीं ॥ ५ ॥

सुधा सुरा सम साधु असाधू । जनक एक जग जलधि अगाधू ॥ ६ ॥

upajahim ēka saṅga jaga māhīm. jalaja jōṅka jimi guna bilagāhīm. 5.
sudhā surā sama sādhu asādhū. janaka ēka jaga jaladhi agādhū. 6.

Both a saint and a non-saint are born in the same way in this world, and both live in the same world. But while the former (the saint) is like a beautiful lotus flower, the latter (the non-saint; the wicked and the pervert, the sinful and the corrupt) is like a blood-sucking leech<sup>1</sup>. (5)

A saint is like the ambrosia that helps one to overcome the fear of death and provides a remedy for all the worldly torments, while the wicked non-saints are like wine which is the cause of all problems faced by a person. Both are born in the same world which is like a vast ocean<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lotus grows in a dirty pond, but it is so inherently pure by nature that the dirty water does not stick to its petals. The lotus is universally treated as a metaphor for purity, beauty, cleanliness, immaculacy and holiness. On the other hand, the leech is a parasite; it thrives on the blood of others. Likewise, the saintly people are a blessing for the world, and they adorn it and add beauty and purity to it. On the contrary, the un-saintly and wicked people are a burden for the world and a wart on the face of the society.

To wit, both types of people, i.e. a saintly person as well as a non-saintly person, are born in the same world, in the same time frame of history, and most often even in the same household. We have many examples of this. We have Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, who was extremely cruel and evil, and his brother named Vibhishan who was righteous and pious by his very nature. We have Hiranyakshipu, the evil demon king, and his own son Prahalad who was an ardent devotee of Lord God. Then we have the Kauravs and the Pandavas in the epic Mahabharat—both had opposite characters.

So we see that it is not necessary that brothers born of the same father will have the same character and nature. Both the types of people, the saintly ones and the non-saintly ones, are born in the same world, and hence the ‘world’ is their common parent. Tulsidas has cited the instance of poison and wine as well as ambrosia which were produced during the churning of the ocean by the gods and the demons in some ancient time. They had the same source of birth (the ocean) and cause (its churning by the gods and the demons), but their effect was diametrically opposite to each other. While ambrosia is life-giving and holy, poison and wine are killers.

To wit, saints and non-saints are to be judged and distinguished based on their character, qualities, nature and virtues, and not by their birth or caste or creed. This fact is explicitly mentioned in the next verse.]

सुधा सुधाकर सुरसरि साधू । गरल अनल कलिमल सरि व्याधू ॥ ८ ॥

bhala anabhala nija nija karatūti. lahata sujasa apalōka bibhūti. 7.
sudhā sudhākara surasari sādhu. garala anala kalimala sari byādhū. 8.

Those who are good, noble and righteous on the one hand and those who possess the opposite qualities on the other hand, acquire a good or bad name and reputation that are in accordance with their respective nature, virtues, qualities and character.

[To wit, saints and holy people acquire good name, fame and reputation because of their exemplary good virtues, while the evil and wicked person gets bad name and infamy because of his own character and not due to some else's fault.] (7)

Saintly persons are like the ambrosia (that is life-giving and invigorating), the moon (which has a soothing effect after the heat of the sun) and the holy river Ganges (which provides water to all and is regarded as a river that has descended from the heaven, and therefore its water is regarded as sanctified and can grant liberation to the creature if he worships it with due reverence).

Non-saintly persons, on the other hand, are like poison, or fire (that ruthlessly burns everything that comes its way) and a polluted river whose water is so filthy and stinking that it better to avoid even touching it.

[To wit, contact with non-saintly persons undermines one's goodness and casts a dark shadow over whatever good qualities that one may have.] (8)

गुन अवगुन जानत सब कोई । जो जेहि भाव नीक तेहि सोई ॥ ९ ॥

guna avaguna jānata saba kōi. jō jēhi bhāva nika tēhi sōi. 9.

Everyone knows the good virtues and the positive effects of the ambrosia, the moon, the holy river Ganges, and the company of saints and pious people. Similarly, everyone also knows the horrifying effects of coming in contact with poison, fire, the countless rivers symbolizing sins in the present era called Kali Yug, and of cruel hunters.

In spite of that, one person prefers the company of the former group, and the other of the other group according to his natural inclinations and bent of mind. This is because one chooses things that are to his liking. (9)

[Note—Everyone knows that it is good to have company of saintly people, and equally unwise to have contact with wicked and sinful persons, but still there are people who prefer to court the wicked and the corrupt because it suits their narrow vested interests and temperament. They are so stupid that they bargain their long-term spiritual good for some short-term material benefit.

On the other hand we have people who would go to great troubles to meet saintly persons and enjoy their company. It is their natural habit and instinct to avoid the unholy and prefer the holy.

This idea is further expanded in the following Doha no. 5.]

दो०. भलो भलाइहि पै लहइ लहइ निचाइहि नीचु ।

dōhā.

bhalō bhalā'ihī pai laha'i laha'i nicā'ihī nīcu.
sudhā sarāhi'a amaratām' garala sarāhi'a mīcu. 5.

Those who are naturally good and internally holy and pious have an inborn tendency and a natural inclination to accept what is good, holy, pure and clean, while those who are internally wicked and inherently pervert will always swerve towards that which is bad, unholy, unrighteous, impure and corrupt. It is just like the natural habit of ambrosia which has a natural propensity to provide immortality and overcome the fear of death, while the natural habit of poison is to kill. (Doha no. 5)

[Note—It is natural for saints to give joy, happiness and a feeling of blessedness to all those who come in contact with them just like the case of ambrosia that provides joy and immortality to the creature who drinks it. On the other hand, non-saints are poisonous for the society and lead one to fall and become sinful by having mere contact with them just like the case of actual poison that kills immediately anyone who drinks it even inadvertently.]

khala agha aguna sādhu guna gāhā. ubhaya apāra udadhi avagāhā. 1.
tēhi tēm kachu guna dōṣa bakhānē. saṅgraha tyāga na binu pahicānē. 2.

The narratives of sins and wicked qualities of non-saints on the one hand, and the holy and noble virtues of saints on the other hand, are legendary and countless; they are limitless like the vast ocean. (1)

That is why I (Tulsidas) have briefly narrated some of the good virtues of Saints and evil qualities of Non-Saints, because unless one knows about them it is not possible to be aware of who a Saint is and who a Non-Saint is, and therefore one is not able to distinguish between these two types of people and be on the guard<sup>1</sup>.

Without this knowledge and awareness, it is also not possible for a person to choose which virtues and characters are worthy of inculcating, emulating and practicing in one's own life, and which ones are to be avoided<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, it is well nigh impossible to list exhaustively all the wicked qualities of those who are evil, and likewise it is also not possible to enumerate completely all the good virtues of those who are saintly—because in both the cases the list of their unique qualities, either bad or good respectively, are too long to be fully enumerated.

So therefore, one must contend with a few of them that I am pointing out here by way of illustration. This illustration would help one to get an idea of what sort of person he is dealing with, and be on the guard.

<sup>2</sup>A general idea of what constitutes good virtues and what bad would also help a person to get rid of certain bad qualities that he may already have, and instead strive to inculcate good virtues as much as he can.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 37; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 41 where Lord Ram has himself briefly compared the qualities of saints and non-saints.]

भलेउ पोच सब बिधि उपजाए । गनि गुन दोष बेद बिलगाए ॥ ३ ॥
कहहिं बेद इतिहास पुराना । बिधि प्रपंचु गुन अवगुन साना ॥ ४ ॥ bhalē'u pōca saba bidhi upajā'ē. gani guna dōṣa bēda bilagā'ē. 3.

kahahim bēda itihāsa purānā. bidhi prapañcu guna avaguna sānā. 4.

[In the following verses Tulsidas explains why Saints and Non-Saints are both present in this world even though, undoubtedly, Non-Saints are a like scum; they are like a thorn for the world and its scourge. Why not have only Saints amongst us and get rid of Non-Saints? Well, it's not possible, and Tulsidas now gives his wise reason for it as an answer to this vexing question.]

This entire creation, consisting of the good and the bad, the noble and the ignoble, the wise and the wicked, the straightforward and the crooked et al (bhalē'u pōca saba), are created by the Creator Brahma (bidhi upajā'ē). All have the right to live. But the Vedas (ancient scriptures) have segregated them and classified them into two separate categories based on their inherent nature, temperament, qualities, virtues and character. (3)

The Vedas (primary scriptures), the Ithihas (ancient Hindu historical narratives such as the story of the Ramayan and the Mahabharat) and the Purans (ancient Hindu history based on mythological narratives) have unanimously said that the creation of Brahma is a combination of the good and the bad qualities<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is a great paradox of creation that the good and the bad coexist and cohabit in this world. Perhaps the good old Creator wished to strike a balance between the two and wished to see how these two forces would interact with each other and help him to perpetuate his creation. He thought that if everything was kept holy and righteous and good, then all the creatures, the Jiva or the living being, would soon find deliverance from this gross world and get salvation. Should this happen, who will go to hell? Then again, everyone becomes righteous and holy, what would be the need of creating so many Gods and so many rules of conduct because good people would not commit sins and would not need a set of laws to tell them what to do and what not to.

Besides this, where would there be the need of a Doctrine of Karma which says that a creature is judged by the deeds done by him. Everyone knows that the true identity of a creature is not his gross body but his Atma or soul that is pure consciousness which is inherently pure, holy, un-corrupt and self-illuminated with knowledge and wisdom. So if this was the case, where would 'sins' and 'vices' come into play?

Herein lies the great secret of creation: Though it is true that the Atma is the real identity of the creature, but this Atma lives inside a gross body and has to act via this body. The mind and the intellect (Buddhi) and its ability to pick and choose between any two options by applying wisdom (Vivek) is the factor that determines what the creature, read the 'Atma', does. The Creator gave the creature the power to choose and determine what suits him best. It is here that the need arose for the Creator for creating an array of choices—such as the choice between the good and the bad. If the Atma falls prey to the distorted advice given to it by the mind that comes under the influence of the sense organs of the body and chooses the bad path such as those pursued by Non-Saintly persons, it would lead to the downfall of the concerned creature. On the other hand, if the Atma decides to rely on its own inner voice and overlooks the pestering demands of the gross body that wants gratification and the mind that yearns for pleasures, then the creature would become righteous and pure like the Atma itself.

Obviously, for the creation to perpetuate and the cycle of birth and death to keep on rolling, to allow this world to be populated by all sorts of creatures of all genres and families, from the lowly to the highest, it was necessary for the Creator to keep a maze of options and opportunity open so that the creatures could decide for themselves what destiny they would like to pursue—whether they want their Atma to find eternal peace and freedom from the tangle of this world, or whether they wished to enjoy more of this world by indulging into it. For to happen there must be a choice; if everything is immaculate and clean and holy and pious then the mind and the Atma would have nothing to choose from, for whatever they choose would be of a good nature, and all the creatures would soon find liberation and deliverance for themselves. By-and-by, the wheel of creation would grind to a halt, so thought Brahma. And then he would have to continue creating newer and newer creatures. But if the creature would be sinful and indulgent in this world, they would re-enter this world in a new birth, and hence the cycle of creation would roll-on on its own.

Indeed, Brahma was very clever in this—that he created the bad and the good simultaneously to ensure the wheel of creation that he has created and set in motion carries on its own without him having to exert any more of his energy? Innovative thinking really!

But he thought over the matter that if it was necessary to create bad qualities in order to keep the creature entangled in this world instead for finding liberation from it, then it was equally important to create good qualities at least to keep a balance, for otherwise he would be creating a Monster that would kill him first. So he created goodness and saintly persons to balance the negative effect of evil and non-saintly persons. This gave him leverage—that in case things went out of hand, he would encourage and help the holy and the saintly figures to helm the affairs of this creation and subdue the bad and the evil who were non-saintly.

In fact, this is what actually has been happening down the centuries and eras. At one point of time there is a noble and good ruler, then as time passes there is a vile ruler who is ruthless and cruel, and once again some good, righteous and gracious ruler comes to rule over the earth—and the cycle continues.

Saints and Non-Saints are like the two poles of a magnet; a magnet is incomplete without its two poles, the north and the south. One attracts and the other repels. Likewise, this creation is kept in balance by the presence of Saints who counter the negative effect of Non-Saints.

The following verses further elaborate on this concept.]

दुख सुख पाप पुन्य दिन राती । साधु असाधु सुजाति कुजाती ॥ ५ ॥
दानव देव ऊँच अरु नीचू । अमिअ सुजीवनु माहरु मीचू ॥ ६ ॥

dukha sukha pāpa pun'ya dina rātī. sādhu asādhu sujāti kujātī. 5.
dānava dēva ūm̐ca aru nīcū. ami'a sujīvanu māhuru mīcū. 6.

Indeed, the world (the creation of Brahma) is a mixture of pain and grief as well as joy and happiness, of sin and evil as well as merit and goodness, of day and night (symbolizing light and darkness respectively), of the saints and the non-saints (i.e. of saintly qualities and non-saintly vices), of high and the low forms of birth, --- (5)

--- Of demons and gods (i.e. of demonic qualities and godly ones), of the high and the low (i.e. those who are noble and glorious, and those who are lowly and vile; also meaning high mountains and low valleys), of nectar and poison that grant life and death respectively. (6)

कासी मग सुरसरि क्रमनासा । मरु मारव महिदेव गवासा ॥ ८ ॥

māyā brahma jīva jagadīsā. lacchi alacchi raṅka avanīsā. 7.
kāśī maga surasari kramanāsā. maru mārava mahidēva gavāsā. 8.

It (the world) is a paradoxical creation consisting of a combination of Maya (delusions and attachments with material world) and Brahm (the pure cosmic Consciousness that is free from all Maya), of Jiva (the living being; the creature represented by his Atma) and Jagdish (the Lord God who is the ruler of this entire creation; here referring to the Supreme Being who is also known as the Parmatma, the Supreme Atma).

Then there are the rich and the poor; the plenty and the dearth of the basics; the pauper and the king! (7)

It is not limited to this, for there is the place called Kashi (or Varanasi which is regarded as a holy land where those who die find deliverance from the cycle of birth and death) and the place called Magadha (which is said to be a cursed place).

Then on the one hand there is the holy river Ganges which is said to have descended from the heaven and hence called the 'river of gods', and on the other hand there is the river known as Karmanasha which is unholy and impure so much so that if one takes a dip in its water then whatever goodness and merit he may have accumulated till this point of time are all washed away by its polluted water. [To wit, while taking a bath in the Ganges is considered as holy and auspicious, doing so in the river Karmanasha has the opposite effect.]

On one hand there is the uninhabitable land of the vast desert of Marwar (in the present day state of Rajasthan in western India) and on the other hand there is the green and fertile land of Maalvaa with its rich cultivable soil.

Similarly, there are the Brahmins (who are said to represent Brahma and hence their name; they are supposed to be learned and wise men, and therefore get respect in the society), and there are also the barbarians who are cruel hunters who relish eating flesh (and are also lowly by nature). (8)

saraga naraka anurāga birāgā. nigamāgama guna dōṣa bibhāgā. 9.

Similarly, there is the heaven and the hell. [The heaven is a pleasurable destiny for the good and the meritorious people where they go after death. Hell is the very opposite of heaven where life is a suffering and full of utter misery and torment where sinners go after death.]

There is love, affection, emotional attachment and union on one side, and separation, grief, detachment, dispassion and renunciation on the other side.

In this aforesaid way, the sacred scriptures such as the Vedas etc. have separated the good and the bad, and have classified them into separate categories accordingly. (9)

The Creator has made this mortal world consisting of animate as well as inanimate creatures in such a way that it has both the good and the bad qualities in varying proportions. But true Saints are those who, like the legendary Swan, accept only the good virtues and goodness of the world symbolized by pure and un-adulterated milk, while discarding aught and everything that is gross and mundane (i.e. is un-virtuous, unholy and unrighteous) symbolized by water<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘Swan’ has a unique quality—it drinks only pure milk and leaves aside its pollutants or adulterations such as additional water that is used to dilute it to increase its volume, as done by milk merchants to get more money from the same quantity of pure milk. Saints accept all that is pure and holy, and simply neglect aught that is naught.]

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 232 where Lord Ram has said similar thing while praising Bharat.]

चौ०. अस बिबेक जब देइ बिधाता । तब तजि दोष गुनहिं मनु राता ॥ १ ॥
काल सुभाउ करम बरिआई । भलेउ प्रकृति बस चुकइ भलाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

asa bibēka jaba dē'i bidhātā. taba taji dōṣa gunahim manu rātā. 1.
kāla subhā'u karama bari'ā'īm. bhalē'u prakṛti basa cuka'i bhalā'īm. 2.

When the Creator becomes favourable to a person, he grants him the wisdom not only to be able to discriminate between the good and the bad qualities but also to be able to develop a strong liking for the good ones and abhor the bad ones. (1)

However, it often happens that under the influence of times and circumstances, or habits and inclinations that one develops while living under unrighteous and spiritually adverse conditions in this world that also effects the sort of deeds done by him, a person, who is otherwise very holy and pious and noble, unfortunately becomes so deluded and corrupt that he misses the chance of doing good and being virtuous, and instead gets inclined towards the bad and the evil, altogether forgetting about his primary good nature. (2)

सो सुधारि हरिजन जिमि लेहीं । दलि दुख दोष बिमल जसु देहीं ॥ ३ ॥

sō sudhāri harijana jimi lēhīm. dali dukha dōṣa bimala jasu dēhīm. 3.
khala'u karahim bhala pā'i susaṅgū. miṭa'i na malina subhā'u abhaṅgū. 4.

Just like persons who are basically good, righteous, pious and holy, such those who are devotees of Lord Hari (Lord Vishnu; Lord God), may have fallen from their good path and acquired some demerit due to some mistake they might have made in their lives, are able to overcome their failings, spiritual errors and sinfulness by coming in contact with Saints and Saintly Persons, and in the process they regain their earlier purity and holiness and reclaim their claim to glory and meritorious position in the world. (3)

In a similar way, even those who are inherently wicked, unholy and sinful too acquire some positive virtues and exhibit goodness when they come in contact with Saints and Saintly Persons. But the irony is that this glory and merit is short-lived as they are habituated to revert back to their bad and ugly old ways; they aren't able to shed their evil nature and wicked ways. (4)

[Note—These verses basically say that communion with saints has a positive effect on one and all in an universal manner. But while those who are basically good and holy make a permanent gain from such contact and interaction with Saints, those who are inherently wild, sinful and wicked do not benefit in the long run.

Devotees of Lord God overcome any mistakes they might make or sins they might commit in life by making a diligent effort to repent for them and mend their way by way of surrendering themselves and their offences to the Lord and vowing not to repeat their mistakes again, and in the process they not only eliminate the negative effect of their sins and misdemeanours but also get good name and fame in this world when they are guided by Saints. But those who are inherently wicked and evil do not gain much even after coming in contact with righteous and holy people such as great Saints. Though they too are influenced by the latter's positive energy and spiritual qualities so much so that a positive change begins to happen to them, but this change is short-lived as compared to those who are spiritually elevated and devotees of Lord God for sooner rather than later the wicked persons would tend to revert back to their bad old ways while the pious persons acquire perpetual goodness.

To wit, it is to the credit of Saints and noble persons who are pious, righteous and holy that when wicked and evil persons come in contact with them the latter are influenced by the former's positive energy and eclectic qualities so much so that they too begin to do good and act nobly themselves. But unholy and unrighteous people have bad qualities so deeply engrained in them, so deeply embedded in their mind and psyche that after some initial good acts and signs of rehabilitation they have a natural tendency and an inherent propensity to revert back to their bad old ways.]

lakhi subēṣa jaga baṇcaka jē'ū. bēṣa pratāpa pūji'ahim tē'ū. 5.
ugharahim anta na hō'i nibāhū. kālanēmi jimi rāvana rāhū. 6.

Those who are crooked and wicked inwardly often get outwardly honoured in the world due to their pretension of being a holy men because they don a garb of a pious and saintly person (5).

But sooner or later their deceit comes out into the open and they are exposed just like was the fate of Ravana (the demon king of Lanka who had disguised himself as a mendicant to kidnap Sita, the wife of Lord Ram, from the forest, but was ultimately exposed and his truth as a ferocious demon revealed which led to his slaying by the Lord in the ensuing war of Lanka)<sup>1</sup>, or that of Kalnemi (another demon who tried to cheat Hanuman by posing as a hermit, but his truth was also revealed and Hanuman killed him)<sup>2</sup> and Rahu (a demon who disguised himself and sat amongst the line of Gods to drink nectar of eternity, but was exposed by the Sun and the Moon Gods, and as a result had his head cut by Lord Vishnu's discus)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—To wit, a wicked person will be exposed sooner or later. He may have mislead the world for some time by his pretentious behaviour of a saintly and good person, but his inherent evil nature will soon have the better of him and his truth as a evil and sinful person would come out in the open. Indeed, evilness, sinfulness, wickedness and crookedness can't be hidden for long. So therefore, non-saints cannot cheat the world for much long no matter how best they try.

<sup>3</sup>The story of Rahu and how he was exposed and got his head cut by Lord Vishnu is narrated in Srimad Bhagvat Mahapurāṇ, 8/9/24-26.]

Even if a Saintly Person has donned some garb or has to assume some form that may look odd and unholy outwardly, he is still praised and honoured in the world for his inherent goodness and excellent virtues and character just like the case of Jamvant and Hunuman<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Bad company is exceedingly harmful and injurious, while good company is highly beneficial and helpful. Bad company is worthy of contempt, while good company is worthy of emulation. This is a fact that is well known; everyone knows it and it is endorsed by the scriptures such as the Vedas. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Jamvant was the king of bears, and Hunuman had the body of a monkey. But inspite of this shortcoming they have been lauded and extolled in the scriptures for their good virtues and devotion for Lord Ram. Their physical form of a bear and a monkey respectively did not come in the way of them acquiring good fame and acclaim in this world.

To wit, a wise person should not be misled by the external appearances of Saints and Saintly Persons. It is their natural goodness that one should pay attention to.]

When a dust particle comes in contact with the gust of wind, it rises up high in the sky, while the same dust particle comes down to earth and enters a dirty swamp when it comes in contact with water (either as rain falling down on earth or as water running on the surface of earth after heavy rainfall and collecting in pools and swamps)<sup>1</sup>. (9)

The parrot and the blackbird living in the house of a saint learn to speak sweetly and utter the holy name of Lord Ram, while those who live in the house of an un-saintly man learn to abuse, to speak rudely and use cuss words<sup>2</sup>. (10) sō'ī jala anala anila saṅghātā. hō'ī jalada jaga jīvana dātā. 12.

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, contact with saints raises the creature to a high pedestal of respect and glory, while contact with wicked and sinful people pulls him down and heaps ignominy and miseries on him.

<sup>2</sup>This shows the effect that company has on a person. The parrot and the blackbird pick up the words spoken in the normal course of the day in the house where they live. In the saint's house they learn sweet and holy words such as the divine name of Lord Ram, and become soft spoken. In the household of a wicked and evil person, they learn cuss words and become abusive. This instance is used to show what happens to a man if he keeps good company, and what if he keeps bad company.]

Smoke assumes different forms and acquires different values depending upon from where it originates and what things it comes in contact with. For instance, smoke having a lowly origin such as that coming from a smouldering fire lit to burn some sort of garbage is suffocating in nature and only produces dark soot that is of no use to anyone (and it needs to be scrubbed clean on any surface upon which it settles).

On the other hand, if the same smoke arises from the wick of a lighted candle or an earthen lamp that uses pure oil as fuel to produce light, then this smoke converts into soot that settles on a surface from which it is scooped up and mixed with some oil or any other lubricant to become a beautiful and useful thing such as the writing ink with which holy books such as the Purans and other books of knowledge are written. [To wit, when a smoke is formed from smouldering heaps of lowly things such as half-burnt wood, leaves, dry grass, coal, flakes made from cow-dung etc., it is dark and suffocating and causes nuisance for others, but the same smoke is sought after as a writing medium when it has a high origin such as that which is formed by the flame of a lighted candle or an oil lamp because it settles down as a soot that is then collected and used as a writing medium by mixing it with some oil etc. In ancient times, writing ink was made from soot that was mixed with some oil.] (11)

The same smoke by its conjunction with water, fire and wind is converted into a cloud that brings rain and life to this world. [The cloud is also a sort of smoke because it is alike it in most every respect. The cloud is formed or made when the 'heat' (fire) of the sun is able to evaporate the 'water' from the ocean that condenses in the higher reaches of the atmosphere to form the 'cloud'. This cloud is carried to all the places on the surface of the earth with the help of the 'wind', thereby bringing rain and life to the earth.] (12)

[Note—To wit, the same 'smoke' assumes three distinct identities and values depending on circumstances of its birth and environment. In the first case when it has a lowly origin as when produced by burning garbage it becomes useless and harmful.

In the second case when it arises from a lighted lamp which is regarded as noble because it gives light and removes darkness, the smoke gets its due respect and value for then it is used as a writing material. In the third instance, this smoke is adored as life-giving cloud which grants life unto the world in the form of rain when it is associated with other pure elements of Nature such as (i) water element (i.e. the ocean from which the cloud draws its water content, and which forms the very body of the smoke-like cloud), (ii) the fire element (i.e. the heat of the sun that evaporates the water from the ocean), and (iii) the wind element (that first transports the evaporated water to higher reaches of the atmosphere to form cloud, and then transports this cloud over to all parts of the earth).

In all sooth, likewise, a person becomes good or bad depending on the company he keeps; any knowledge too becomes good or bad depending upon the source from where it is acquired, on who uses it, on the mind that is used to use it, and on the purpose for which it is used.

The following Doha no. 7 further expands on this concept.]

The planets (or 'stars' that are said to have influence upon a person's life and destiny in accordance with the principles of astrology), medicines or herbs, water, air and cloth becomes good or bad in the world depending upon what they are associated with. Only the wise and illustrious ones are able to distinguish between them and understand this phenomenon. (Doha no. 7-a) [Note—There are nine Grahas or stars that influence a person's life depending upon which place they occupy and which Graha sits next to which in a person's birth chart that is known as the horoscope. The same Graha can be beneficial or harmful depending upon these conditions.

In the same way, merely selecting a single correct medicine or herb is not important to cure a disease, for much depends upon other factors such as other complimentary medicines or herbs that are used with the principle remedy, the dosage of the medicine, the accompanying proper diet and the lifestyle that is to be regulated, the severity of the disease, the age of the patient, the environment in which the patient lives, and many other such tangible and intangible factors combine to give result of any given medicine.

Similarly, plain and simple thing such as the ordinary water assumes multitudes of forms and shapes and names depending upon as many factors. For instance, the same water is called a river, a stream, an ocean, a pond, vapour, steam, cloud, etc. Then we have salt water, sweet water, lemon water; dirty water and clean water; potable and un-potable water; hard water and soft water; then we have ice and snow and glacier and frost and hail and rain and sleet; boiling water and frozen water; then the water assumes many shapes such as that in a cup, a tumbler, a glass, a bucket, and so on and so forth the list may go on and on.

The air also has countless forms and names. For instance there is the air called breath, the air called atmosphere, the air that is called a some-kind of gas, the hot and the cold air, the storm and the gust of wind and the breeze and the tornado as also the whirlwind, the sweet fragrance of the flower or the repulsive foul air from a decomposed corpse, the enticing aroma of some delectable food and the vomit-inducing pungent smell of the same food that rots.

And cloth is no exception either for we have countless forms and multitude of shapes and names by which the humble ‘cloth’ is known.]

The proportion of light and darkness of the moon is the same in the two fortnights of the month such as the light fortnight and the dark fortnight respectively. But the Creator has named them differently.

While the one fortnight during which the brightness and the light of the moon waxes gradually to grant increasing happiness and joy to the world, and as it symbolized a gradual enhancement of positive values—it was thus named the ‘bright fortnight’ by the Creator to honour this glory.

On the other hand, the other fortnight when the moon wanes and symbolizes rise of gloom and dark forebodings, it was named as the ‘dark fortnight’ by the same Creator. (Doha no. 7-b)

So therefore, realizing that this creation that consists of inanimate as well as animate things and creatures is nothing but a manifestation of Lord Ram in all its forms, I (Tulsidas) therefore always bow my head and pay my respects at the feet of all with my palms joined together in supplication. (Doha no. 7-c)

[This is an important observation. Tulsidas gives the reason why he has chosen to show respect even to the unworthy ‘non-saints’. It is because all living beings—nay, even the inanimate things such as the planets and the plants, and for that matter all that exists here, there and anywhere else in whatever form and state—are all one or the other form of the same Supreme Being known by the name of Lord Ram.

Forsooth and without gainsay, so says the Upanishads, there is nothing but Brahm in this universe! This is Brahm, that is Brahm, and there is nothing but Brahm!!]

[Extending his all-encompassing and all-inclusive view of this creation, Tulsidas says—]

I give my reverence to one and all—to the gods, the great demons, the human beings, the serpents and other subterranean creatures, the birds, the spirits (holy and unholy), the souls of departed ancestors, the celestial beings such as the Gandharvas and Kinnars (who live in heaven and are said to be dancers and musicians for the gods), the nocturnal creatures (such as the wild animals and ghosts that venture in the night alone)—in fact one and all who exist in this universe, I pray to you all to have your grace upon me and be kind and gracious to me. (Doha no. 7-d)

There are in all eighty-four lakh species of creatures that take birth in this world<sup>1</sup>, and they are broadly divided into four classes<sup>2</sup>. All of them find their habitat either under water (as aquatic creatures of all denominations), or on the earth (as terrestrial creatures of all denominations), or in the sky (as birds of all denominations)<sup>3</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed, I pay my respects to all of them by joining the palms of my hand and bowing my head because I have a firm faith that this entire living world is a manifestation of Lord Ram and Sita (representing respectively the Supreme Being and his cosmic energy known as Shakti)<sup>4</sup>. (2)

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 44.

<sup>2</sup>The four classes or types of living beings are the following: (i) 'Andaj' (those born from an egg, e.g. birds, snakes, crocodiles, fish, tortoise etc.); (ii) 'Swadej' (those born from sweat and dampness, e.g. bacteria, fungi, mosquitoes and lice etc.); (iii) 'Udbhij' (those born from seeds, e.g. plants); and (iv) 'Jarayuj' (those born from an embryo inside the womb, e.g. 4-limbed man, and animals with four legs, such as horse, deer, lion, goat etc.).

Refer: (a) Padma Puran, Shivagitayam; and (b) Manu Smriti, Canto 1, verse nos. 43-48.

<sup>3</sup>All living beings have their habitat either under water, on earth (either underground or on its surface), or in the sky. Fish and all such creatures come under the first category who live under water; plants and animals come under the second category of creatures who live either on the surface of the earth or underground (such as edible roots, bulbs and tubers amongst plants, and worms and snakes who live underground by burrowing holes in the earth), while birds and all other creatures who can fly (such as insects) come under the third category of creatures who have their habitat in the sky.

<sup>4</sup>The entire creation is a manifestation of Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness. There is nothing in this world which is not one or the other manifestation of that single universal entity known as Brahm. Each unit of creation, from the invisible to the visible, from the subtlest to the grossest is a form of Brahm. This is the metaphysical view of creation as expounded in the Upanishads.

Since Lord Ram is a manifested form of Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness that is also known as the Supreme Being, obviously because without Consciousness nothing would live, and this cosmic entity is almighty and all-powerful, being at the core of life and existence in this world. Further, according to the Upanishads, the cosmic powers and energy of the Consciousness that enables the latter to do anything is called its Shakti, literally meaning the dynamism and energy of cosmic Consciousness. In the case of Lord Ram, a manifestation of Brahm, this Shakti is represented by Sita, his constant companion.

Since everything in this creation is a revelation of Brahm, and since Brahm does anything by employing his cosmic Shakti, it follows that this creation is regulated by Brahm from within by the medium of his Shakti, for without Shakti of Brahm which keeps the world active from within, this creation would be lifeless and dead.

Hence, here the learned poet Tulsidas shows the high level of his enlightenment and wisdom, as well as the broadness of his vision and expertise in metaphysical knowledge when he says that he is actually offering his respects to Lord Ram and Sita, who represent the supreme Brahm and the cosmic Shakti respectively, while bowing his head before all living beings in this world and praying to them—because all of them are a manifestation of Lord Ram and Sita.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 14—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 15 (where Mandodari has affirmed this view of cosmic manifestation of Lord Ram); and (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Doha no. 81-a (where the saintly crow Kaagbhusund has also reiterated this view.)

nija budhi bala bharōsa mōhi nāhīm. tātēm binaya kara'um̐ saba pāhīm. 4.

Recognising me as a humble servant of the Lord who is an embodiment of grace and kindness himself (i.e. Lord Ram) (jāni kṛpākara kiṅkara mōhū), I beg all of you to sincerely bless me<sup>1</sup>. (3)

I don't have the confidence, competence, skills or intelligence needed to undertake the enormous task of narrating the divine story of Lord Ram in the proper way, in the way it should be actually done to bring out the spiritual beauty of the story called Ram Charit Manas, as it requires specialized talent and acumen which I lack. Hence, I am virtually out of my wits, and this is why I need the blessings, good will and grace of one and all, for it would go a long way to help me succeed in doing justice to the narrative and give my writing the spiritual shine it so rightly deserves<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In verse no. 2 herein above, the learned poet Tulsidas has already said that he sees the entire world as a manifestation of his beloved Lord Ram. This means that when he prays to anyone, seeking the latter's grace and blessings, he is actually praying to Lord Ram. And since Lord Ram is an ocean of mercy, kindness and grace, all forms of his manifestations too must have these virtues in them.

Hence, Tulsidas feels sure that everyone, even his opponents, would bless him with success when he tells them that he wishes to write the story of Lord Ram in the form of Ram Charit Manas in a fine and beautiful way. This would preempt even evil ones from creating unnecessary hurdles and problems for him, for they would feel obliged to cooperate with him, instead of obstructing his way, as he was about to narrate the story of Lord Ram, the Lord who is compassionate, king and graceful towards all. It is a holy venture, and so no one would ever think of throwing a spanner in this wheel, for if they do so they would invite the wrath of the Lord himself, specially when Tulsidas asserts that he is a 'humble servant of Lord Ram'. The Lord would definitely not tolerate that his servant is subjected to trouble by anyone.

<sup>2</sup>This verse shows the great virtues of humility and simplicity, of modesty, humbleness and un-pretentiousness that Tulsidas possessed. He was a blessed soul and a chosen one, for otherwise the very thought of narrating the story of Lord Ram would not have occurred to him. Besides this, he was a scholar who had thoroughly studied Sanskrit language as well as the scriptures. Yet he says that he is incompetent and unskilled to write the story of Ram Charit Manas. He does not brag of his abilities; he does not pretend to be a scholar or an author; he has no airs of superiority about himself. Instead, he prefers to be humble and simple. Lord Ram loves these qualities in his devotees, proving that Tulsidas was surely a devotee and servant of the Lord as he asserts himself to be.

Normally an author of such a wonderful and unique classic as Ram Charit Manas is, a book that is of singular beauty of composition, for it not only tells a devotional story in an inimitable style that nourishes the soul but also effortlessly incorporates in its narration great universal Truths of metaphysics and spiritualism woven intricately into the text, making it a book of stellar qualities unmatched in the realm of devotional literature in Hindu philosophy, would feel proud of his product and its authorship that brings immense fame and applause to him. But here we find Tulsidas expressing his fears that he finds himself incompetent to undertake such an enormous task as writing Ram Charit Manas and risks failure if he is not blessed by everyone and gains their good wishes to enable him to succeed. It is sufficient to show that this great saintly poet had no ego and pride in him, but was full of humility, modesty, humbleness and simplicity. These are the virtues liked by Lord Ram in his devotees, for the true devotee is one who attributes all his successes to the Lord and takes no personal credit himself. The devotee's enterprise then becomes an enterprise of the Lord himself, with the devotee merely playing the role of an obedient servant; so the Lord then feels obliged to make it succeed, no matter what, as its success or failure would reflect on the Lord's own reputation.]

I wish to narrate the story of Lord Raghupati's (i.e. Lord Ram's) glories, holiness and divinity, but I don't have the required competence, confidence, intelligence and other mental abilities necessary to do it successfully, for the Lord's story is vast and fathomless (like the sky which is beyond measurement). (5)

I am at a lost and literally find myself at sea, for I don't have the resources or literary acumen to undertake this gigantic task, though my ambition is so high. (6)

[Note—Tulsidas has made himself clear here as to why he is seeking blessings and goodwill of everyone for his endeavour—for he says that he lacks the wherewithal needed to undertake such a great enterprise as writing the holy and divine story of Lord Ram in such a way that it is perfect and flawless, not only from the perspective of poetical literature and grammar of exemplary beauty and scholarly taste, but also from the angle of spiritualism, theology and metaphysics which he aims to incorporate in it, with great stress on devotion and love for Lord God, for he intends to make this story a fountainhead that would give abiding peace, beatitude and joy to the soul of its reader and listener, making its narrator and singer feel immensely blessed and blissful.

The task is extremely daunting and immensely huge, and it seems like he is trying to measure the sky or the ocean which have no end. He wonders how he would succeed in completing his mission successfully. Therefore, he needs blessings of one and all in order to succeed in this holy enterprise.

[Elaborating further, Tulsidas says—] Verily I say that I have a low intellect though my ambitions are very high. It is like the case of a person who cannot arrange even humble butter-milk to feed himself but dreams of acquiring sweet nectar of the best quality to drink. (7)

Therefore, I earnestly beg all noble-hearted persons to excuse me for my stubbornness for attempting to do something beyond my ability and competence, and I beg them to listen to my narrative in the same way as one would affectionately listen to a little child speaking and expressing his feelings excitedly in his own incoherent way<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 183 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it. Here, Bharat says that though he is sinful yet he is sure that his loving brother Lord Ram would excuse him for all his demeanours and shortcomings when he comes face to face before him and begs for forgiveness, for the Lord would listen to his pleas most affectionately and accept his wishes.]

haṁśihahiṁ kūra kuṭila kubicārī. jē para dūṣana bhūṣanadhārī. 10.

When a little child speaks with his childish lisp, the child's incoherent babblings are listened to by the child's loving parents affectionately, for they would always forgive or neglect the ramblings of the child even as they feel amused by the little one's prattle, and enjoy hearing it<sup>1</sup>. (9)

On the other hand, those who are wicked in their hearts and harbour malice for one and all, for they are jealous of the achievements of others; such evil persons thoroughly enjoy pricking holes and finding faults in any work done by others by putting a spotlight on their little failures and shortcomings. Such people would laugh at me, ridicule me, mock at me, and have a field day deriding me and my effort<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 136—where it is said that Lord Ram listened to the innocent talk of forest dwelling tribes who spoke in their uncultured way, not in the way a person of good upbringing would speak, when they came to meet the Lord and express their sincere affection for him; the Lord loved to hear them just like a loving father would affectionately listen to his child talking with a lisping tongue.

A loving parent would enjoy a child's tittle-tattle and smile at it, instead of feeling annoyed, no matter how inappropriate and irrelevant the child's little talk may be, so likewise my narration of Lord Ram's story, no matter how incompetently it is composed and naïvely narrated, would surely find acceptance with saintly souls for they would see the positive side of my noble efforts inasmuch as it is auspicious, for I am singing the glories of the Supreme Lord in a way I can, to the best of my abilities, even if it is not up to the mark, for howsoever faulty it may be and whatsoever shortcomings it may have, yet it still incorporates the holy name of Lord Ram, a single element which would suffice to neutralize all the drawbacks that my narrative may have.

Who does not like his own poetry and think that his composition is excellent, whether it is actually delightful and charming, or is insipid, tasteless and boring.

[To wit, everyone thinks that whatever he or she has written is an excellent piece of literature, irrespective of its real worth.] (11)

It is rare to find a noble person who will appreciate the writing of others, and feel glad to hear or read it.

[To wit, authors and poets ordinarily think that they are the best in their fields, and rarely would one find an author or a poet who would express sincere joy and approbation for a composition of another author or poet.] (12)

[Note—Tulsidas says that people are normally jealous of their peers; they think that they are the best in their fields of work. So therefore, it is much easier to find authors and poets who are critical of works of other authors and poets, finding more faults in them than any merit, laughing at such compositions and ridiculing the composer, but it is very difficult and even rare to find a good and noble soul who would cheer other authors and poets sincerely, feeling happy when he comes across a piece of writing by them that is worthy of praise and appreciation, even if such writing is from one's competitor or adversary.

In this context, refer to Tulsidas' book 'Dohawali', verse no. 355.]

sajjana sakṛta sindhu sama kō'ī. dēkhi pūra bidhu bāṛha'i jō'ī. 14.

Oh brothers!<sup>1</sup> This world has countless numbers of people who feel proud at their own achievements and get puffed up much like the numerous rivers and ponds that overflow their banks whenever water flows into them and makes them swell up. (13)

On the contrary, there are only a few noble and illustrious persons who feel elated when they see someone else rise and shine much like the ocean, which is a vast and fathomless reservoir of water that rises and overflows its shores once in a while when it sees the full moon<sup>2</sup>. (14)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The use of the word ‘Brother’ (bhāī) while making a statement is a polite way of address by which the speaker or the author wishes to draw the attention of his audience or reader to what he is about to say in an affectionate and courteous manner. This mode of address precludes any chance of causing an un-intended offence of any kind to anyone; it soothes emotions, creating goodwill, and an instant bonding between the speaker and his audience.

<sup>2</sup>The idea here is that ordinarily people are so shallow and narrow-minded in their thoughts that if they have some good quality in them, they would go around the town boasting of it, but when they see someone else exhibiting the same quality, or even a better one, they would do their best to pull him down by deriding him and ridiculing his achievements.

On the contrary, there are only a few noble persons who have a great and magnanimous heart, for they are not jealous of others’ achievements and virtues, as they not only feel glad when they discover some fine talent or good virtue in someone else but they would also encourage that person to further develop it.]

Tulsidas says—‘I have great and noble intentions of narrating the holy and divine story of Lord Ram, though I am very unlucky because I am incompetent to do so, and lack the knowledge for it. But whatever it is, I am sure that those who are saintly will find happiness and joy in it (i.e. in my narration of Lord Ram’s divine story), whereas those who are un-saintly (wicked, pervert and jealous) will ridicule it and laugh at it scornfully (i.e. they will come to grief and misery; they will become jealous of me as I will do something that is holy and auspicious which is not acceptable by them; they will be tormented because when people hear about the Lord’s divine story they will break their contact with such unholy people).’ (Doha no. 8)

[Note—Tulsidas clarifies in this Doha what he means when he has compared jealous people who are always envious of others, trying to ridicule the latter, without rhyme or reason, at the slightest pretext, with those who are noble souls with a good heart, for they feel glad when they see others showing some talent and producing some good work.

By doing this, Tulsidas has deftly deflected unwarranted criticism of his writing and narration of Ram Charit Manas by saying that only those who are exceptionally selfish and jealous of him would find fault in it, while those who have a noble heart would see the goodness in this book and its positive side as it contains the divine and holy story of Lord Ram, the manifested form of the Supreme Being, a book which is intended to pay respect to the Lord and sing his glories, a book aimed to provide spiritual bliss and beatitude to all its readers and devotees of the Lord, a book that brings the Lord closer to the ordinary man by narrating the Lord's story in a simple and local language well known to the masses, and not a book to exhibit Tulsidas' poetic skills and literary acumen, or for self-grandiosity and fame. Tulsidas says that his intention is pious, and not for acquiring name and fortune.]

hansahi baka dādura cātakahī. haṁsahim malina khala bimala batakahī. 2.

When evil-minded people laugh at me, when they ridicule and deride me, undermining my auspicious effort and noble intentions (to narrate the glories of Lord Ram in the form of his divine story called Ram Charit Manas)—well, it would be good for me<sup>1</sup>, for it is well known that crows always call the cuckoo hoarse out of jealousy and malice towards the latter. (1)

Similarly, herons have a habit of ridiculing the swan, and bats make fun of the sparrow hawk<sup>2</sup>.

It is because rogues and evil-minded creatures have a natural habit of deriding those of finer virtues and ridiculing their refined speech<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How will false and unwarranted criticism and ridicule by evil-minded people, who have a propensity of finding faults with others and are eternally malicious towards one and all, would benefit the narrator of Ram Charit Manas?

Well, the world knows well about the crooked nature and malicious habit of such people, that whenever someone does something good and auspicious they would instantly stand up to pull him down and deride his noble efforts. So, when such wicked people would laugh at Tulsidas' narration of Lord Ram's holy story in the form of Ram Charit Manas, pouring scorn at him and pricking holes in his composition, the world will instantly know that they are doing it merely because it is their nature to do so, for they are full of malice and jealousy.

If the composition was not up to the mark then these people would keep quiet for they know that it would not stand the test of scrutiny by the world and get rejected automatically. But when they discover that the world is all praise for the way Tulsidas has narrated Ram Charit Manas, it would stoke their envy and ignite their hidden fire of jealousy and malice, which would burst out in the open in the form of ridiculing him and finding a thousand and one faults with his composition.

Hence, in a way they would be indirectly benefiting and helping Tulsidas's noble efforts and promoting his good work because their laughter and ridiculing would draw the world's attention to his composition, the Ram Charit Manas, as more and more people would like to read and hear it directly to judge for themselves the worth of it and the truth in such criticisms, which would serve Tulsidas in good stead as it is this what he expects the world to do—to read and hear the divine story of Lord

Ram which purifies the mind, grants peace to the heart, and bliss and beatitude to the soul.

To wit, loud criticism and derisive laughter by wicked people with respect to Ram Charit Manas would indirectly serve to help spread the holy story of Lord Ram in this world, as more and more people would be inclined to read and hear it to find out why such a clamour is being made about it. This would help to spread the good word of the Lord in the world. And as anything that is good and divine is bound to leave its auspicious mark upon those who come in contact with it, so would the Ram Charit Manas bless those who read and hear it, even if it is done out of curiosity aroused by criticism of it by crooked people.

<sup>2</sup>The idea is that the world knows fully well that the cuckoo has a sweet voice as compared to the crow, the swan is a finer bird as compared to the heron (for the former drinks only pure water while the latter devours fish), and similarly the sparrow hawk is nobler bird than the bat (as the former drinks fresh rain water while the latter would eat its own excreta), and therefore the criticism of the former by the latter is only due to jealousy and malice and nothing else—so likewise criticism of Tulsidas' composition known as 'Ram Charit Manas' by wicked people is solely because they are jealous and envious of him, for they don't like the world to have access to spiritual wisdom as it would undermine their efforts to keep the world engaged in wicked activities like their own, because once the world comes to know about a source of eternal spiritual bliss and happiness as devised by Tulsidas, it would turn its back to such wicked people and shun them, realizing their evil nature and nefarious designs. This situation would make evil people feel isolated and neglected, which obviously they don't want.

<sup>3</sup>The spoken word is a reflection of the mind and its thoughts. What Tulsidas is about to speak pertains to the divine and the holy; it is a sublime talk regarding Lord Ram, for he wishes to narrate the auspicious story of the Lord in the form of Ram Charit Manas. Hence, all those who are critical of him must understand that they are themselves in the wrong, for Tulsidas is not narrating any story of a great king as the latter's paid poet or minstrel, but he is narrating the divine story of Lord Ram as his devotee and servant. He is not boasting of any qualification as a savant or learned scholar of poetry, but he will tell the story of the Lord in as simple a language as possible. So what is the problem?]

भाषा भनिति भोरि मति मोरी । हँसिबे जोग हँसैं नहिं खोरी ॥ ४ ॥

kabita rasika na rāma pada nēhū. tinha kaham̐ sukhada hāsa rasa ēhū. 3.
bhāṣā bhaniti bhōri mati mōrī. ham̐sibē jōga ham̐śēm nahim̐ khōrī. 4.

Those who do not enjoy poetry and also lack devotion for the holy feet of Lord Ram, for them my composition (i.e. Ram Charit Manas) would seem queer and become a source of fun and mirth, for they would derive jolly good satisfaction by ridiculing it and poking jokes at it<sup>1</sup>. (3)

I am writing in the local vernacular, the language of the laity and the common man (instead of in the language of the scholar), and my intellect is also not as high as is expected from a person undertaking such a singularly great enterprise, so therefore if anyone laughs at my effort then he or she may be excused and forgiven, for it is not their fault as I may indeed have fallen short of expectations<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, those who are devoted to Lord Ram will see at least one single merit in Tulsidas' work, which is that it sings the glories of Lord Ram and contains the holy name of the Lord. It is a sufficient qualification that would make a devotee feel charmed by the narration of Lord Ram's story known as 'Ram Charit Manas', irrespective of its other merits or demerits.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 10.

<sup>2</sup>These and other such instances clearly reveal Tulsidas' sense of immense modesty and humbleness like a true devotee of the Lord—for the final product of his that we are reading now as 'Ram Charit Manas' has no parallel in the world in the realm of devotional literature ever written in the vernacular, for it is a classical example of the story of the Ramayana told in such a way and in such simple manner that even an ordinary person, who is not versed at all in metaphysical and theological knowledge, can easily understand both the story of Lord Ram as well as the spiritual message it contains. This is a unique feat in its own right. Besides this, Tulsidas' composition is so refined and well written by observing all the laws of grammar and poetry that it has become a bench-mark for fine poetry and devotional literature that is unmatched for its beauty, magnificence and charm of narration. It captivates the heart and mesmerizes the mind; it hold the listener spell bound by its melody when sung properly, and it acts as a soothing balm for the tormented soul that is looking for a source of solace and succour in this world that surrounds it with unending miseries and worries.

Tulsidas clearly says that he is not writing for the scholar for his medium of composition is the vernacular language, the dialect of the laity and the common man. By writing in the local language Tulsidas has plainly set out his mission and what his intention is: he does not want, nor hopes, for any accolades from learned men for his composition, for the language he has chosen for the work is intended for the common man who does not have the scholarship or the acumen to judge literature, good or bad. So therefore, his main intent is to make the divine story of Lord Ram accessible to the common man so that even the ordinary folk can enjoy the nectar of spiritual bliss that would naturally come to him by hearing and reading the story of Lord Ram in the Ram Charit Manas.

Besides this, Tulsidas has said elsewhere that he is writing this story for his own satisfaction and joy, for he wishes to devote his time and mind in the thoughts of his beloved Lord Ram, and if in the course of this others too derive some benefit and enjoy the nectar of bliss and beatitude as it drips like honey from a full honey-comb, it will be an additional source of satisfaction for him.

Verily indeed and forsooth, those who have no devotion and affection for the holy feet of the Lord (Sri Ram), and those who do not have a wise mind (that would see the positive aspect of anything as it is inclined to invariably see the negative side of everything)—for such unfortunate people (whom I pity), this story of the Lord would appear stale, boring and tasteless. (5)

On the other hand, those who have devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Hari and Lord Har (i.e. Lord Vishnu and Lord Shiva respectively), and whose mind is not inclined to engage in fruitless debates and doubting—for such fortunate souls (I pay homage to them) this holy story would look sweet and charming. (6)

Realizing that it is adorned by one stellar virtue called ‘devotion for Lord Ram’ (which is superior to all other adornments put together), those who have a noble heart and wise intellect, those who are charitable and broad minded in their disposition and thoughts, would thoroughly enjoy hearing it, and will hold no qualms in cheering it and appreciating its beauty in laudatory terms. (7)

[Note—These three verses sum up what Tulsidas has said till now: put simply, the story of Ram Charit Manas would be a source of irritation for evil persons who have no devotion for the Lord God, but it would be a source of eternal joy and bliss for all those who are devoted to the Lord and have affection for him.]

I say truly that I am neither a poet nor a scholar who is good at oratory or an expert at writing compositions. Verily and in all sooth, I declare that I lack all kinds of expertise and skills in any field of art or craft; I do not pretend to be learned or wise either, for I have no worthwhile qualities that would entitle me to be called a poet or narrator<sup>1</sup>. (8)

Poetry, for that matter any kind of composition, is governed by countless numbers of laws and rules concerning that particular type of poetry or prose. Such as for example, the number of letters or syllables in a line or stanza, their various meanings and fine nuances, different types of poetical adornments and embellishments, various sorts of verses and their arrangements using different types of speech, (9)---

--- Many kinds of interpretations that can be made of their meanings, hidden and obvious, various types of emotions and sentiments that are expressed in these verses, and so on and so forth—for all kinds of compositions have their own fault lines and points of excellence which are multifarious. (10)

I firmly declare and write it down in black and white on paper (to affirm the truth of my assertion) that I am not skilled in any of these fine arts of poetic composition<sup>2</sup>. (11)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 8.

<sup>2</sup>In all these verses, the central idea is that Tulsidas says that he is not at all boasting of his poetical skills nor of his intellect and knowledge, and so there is no cause why anyone should be jealous of him. He is narrating the divine story of Lord Ram in a manner he is able to do it, not to showcase his talent or get any kind of praise, but to give peace to his soul and purify his speech. So why anyone should be annoyed with him; or why should anyone try pricking faults in his composition: for there is no reason for it?

In case he has made some inadvertent errors, or some unintended flaw has crept in his narration, well, it is surely excusable, for he has already declared that he is not a scholar or an expert of any kind.]

Though my poetical composition is lacking in all kinds of qualities that good poetry ought to have, yet it has one exceptional glory about it that has made it famous the world over, a quality that would be discerned by those who have a wise mind and judicious intellect, for such people would then hear my composition with due respect (and revel in its spiritual charm). (Doha no. 9)

[Note—And what is that ‘unique quality in Tulsidas’ composition’? He answers this question in the next verse that follows herein below.]

चौ०. एहि महँ रघुपति नाम उदारा । अति पावन पुरान श्रुति सारा ॥ १ ॥

मंगल भवन अमंगल हारी । उमा सहित जेहि जपत पुरारी ॥ २ ॥

maṅgala bhavana amaṅgala hārī. umā sahita jēhi japata purārī. 2.

Verily indeed, in this composition of mine (known as Ram Charit Manas) there is present the holy name of Lord Ram, a name that is a benefactor for all, extremely pure, holy and divine, and the spiritual essence of all the Vedas and other scriptures<sup>1</sup>.
(1)

The Lord's holy name is a treasury of auspiciousness that grants all kinds of grace and blessings, and it is a destroyer of all misfortunes and their attendant miseries.

It is a name that is constantly repeated by Lord Shiva and his consort goddess Uma as a spiritual formula used during Japa (which means repetition of a mystical formula that grants eternal bliss and beatitude to them who use it during meditation, as well as contemplation on the Divine). (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The scriptures speak of metaphysical truths and show the way to spiritual bliss and beatitude; they pave the path for the deliverance, salvation and emancipation of the creature. Towards this end they speak of different paths that would enable the creature to reach his spiritual goal, and he has to select the path best suited to his individual needs, temperaments and mental abilities.

For success in any endeavour, some guide and help is needed, some kind of success-formula is necessary, some well-established process ought to be followed. The scriptures prescribe different Mantras or spiritual formulas that one can use to achieve success in reaching his spiritual goal of liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation. Amongst the many such Mantras, Lord Ram's holy name "Ram/Rāma" is regarded as the King; it is called the 'Tarak Mantra'—i.e. a single spiritual formula that entitles the creature to attain deliverance from the cycle of transmigration and its attendant miseries and torments. By employing this single Mantra, i.e. by relying solely on Lord Ram's holy name, one can attain eternal peace, bliss, beatitude and felicity for his soul. This irrefutable fact has been incontrovertibly reiterated in (a) Ram Rahasya Upanishad, and (b) Ram Tapini Upanishad, which are the twelfth and the thirteenth Upanishads respectively of the Atharva Veda.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28; Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 46; Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 108; Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 197; (b) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 194 along with Chaupai line nos. 5 and 8 that precede it, as well as Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it; (c) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 42; (d) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 129; Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 130.

effect on him by the divine intercession of Lord Ram's holy name which protects those who say it.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 and 8 that precede Doha no. 19; Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 46; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.]

bidhubadanī saba bhāmṭi samvārī. sōha na basana binā bara nārī. 4.

No matter how beautiful, charming and well-composed a poetry may be, one that has been penned by an expert poet who is well-versed in all the fine points of writing poetry and is skilled in his art, yet if that composition does not incorporate the holy name of Lord Ram in it then it lacks worth and becomes insipid and dull<sup>1</sup>. (3)

It is like the case of a woman who does not look good, dignified and cultured if she is not properly dressed modestly although she may have a face as beautiful as the full moon<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas says that the one single factor that lends glory to any composition, no matter who has written it, is the inclusion of the holy name of Lord Ram in its text. To wit, Lord Ram's holy name is the soul of any composition; just like a body is worthless without its soul so is any poetry useless without including Lord Ram's name in it.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 23 where the same idea is reiterated.

It is like the case of a dish that would taste dull and boring if no salt is added to it, inspite of the fact that it has been prepared by an expert cook, contains the best of ingredients, has an appetizing aroma and an enticing look that tickle the senses, and is garnished and presented in the best way possible.

saba guna rahita kukabi kṛta bānī. rāma nāma jasa aṅkita jānī. 5.
sādara kahahim sunahim budha tāhī. madhukara sarisa santa gunagrāhī. 6.

Even if the composition (i.e. Ram Charit Manas) lacks quality and fineness, and even if it has been composed by a poet who lacks competence and skill required for such a great and scholarly enterprise<sup>1</sup>, yet by taking into account that it has Lord Ram's holy and divine Name in it --- (5),

--- Those who are wise and saintly would hear and narrate it with due respect because saints are habituated to see and extract goodness from anything just like the honey bee which would first extract sweet nectar from the flower and then produce equally sweet honey from it<sup>2</sup>. (6)

Such wise and honourable saints would neglect and ignore all other faults in the composition, in the manner the divine story of Lord Ram has been written from the perspective of literature and scholarship, for it matters not at all to them; what matters to them is the nectar of spiritual bliss and beatitude that fills this composition known as Ram Charit Manas like honey filling the honey-comb. Even as the honey-collector collects the honey and discards the comb, these saintly souls extract the nectar of spiritualism that is soaked in this composition of Tulsidas, and overlook every other thing.

When enlightened and sagacious saints read or hear it, they will discover that it contains the holy name of Lord Ram and preaches the virtues of Bhakti (complete devotion, submission, affection and faith) for the Lord, and this single point in Ram Charit Manas would be cited by them as being a priceless gem that gives glory to the whole composition. Devoid of Lord Ram's holy name, any poetry would be like a crown or a diadem, albeit it may be made of gold, but without its central diamond.

They will be least bothered as to who has written it or how it has been written; they would be concerned only with the fact that Ram Charit Manas has the holy name of Lord Ram in it, and this single aspect is enough for them to thoroughly enjoy it and narrate it to others to share the spiritual joy and spread the divine glory of Lord Ram.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 10-11 that precede Doha no. 15; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 129; Chanda line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 130.]

Though this composition of mine (i.e. the Ram Charit Manas) lacks in poetic qualities, and there may be other faults and shortcomings, tangible and intangible, yet one thing is certainly obvious, and it is that it reveals the majesty and glory of Lord Ram and his divinity. (7)

This has given my heart and mind ('Mana') a lot of comfort and encouragement, motivating me to go ahead with its composition—for I thought 'who has not acquired honour, respect and goodwill by being associated with someone or something that is noble, honourable and auspicious?'<sup>1</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Verily, I thought to myself: "Since my composition is dedicated to the merciful and gracious Lord Ram, the Supreme Lord, whose grace makes the sun shine and the moon look beautiful, so therefore my poetry, that sings nothing but the glory of the Lord and honours him, will be blessed with the Lord's grace, and granted beauty and perfection that it may otherwise have lacked. So what is the worry and the fear?" This thought immediately lifted my sagging spirits and filled me with enthusiasm.

Some of the random verses that glorify Lord Ram's majesty are the following: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 292; (b) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 3.]

For instance, even smoke abandons its natural tendency to smell bad and make people feel uneasy by its choking presence if it is produced by aloe-wood whose sweet fragrance would overcome the smoke's natural pungency<sup>1</sup>. (9)

Although my words and composition are clumsy and not up to the mark, yet it narrates the holy story of Lord Ram that would provide auspiciousness and spiritual welfare for the world, and hence my effort is commendable and worthy of praise<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Smoke arising by burning any kind of thing would always seem unpleasant, but when it is produced by burning aloe-wood it becomes pleasant. The credit for this metamorphosis in the smoke is attributable to the sweet fragrance of the oil present in the aloe-wood which vaporizes and mixes with the smoke, making the latter lose its bad and unpleasant character.

<sup>2</sup>Similarly, Tulsidas says that notwithstanding the many demerits and shortcomings from which his composition known as Ram Charit Manas may suffer, but there is one stellar merit in it—and it is that it is dedicated to Lord Ram and is employed in singing the glory and divinity of the Lord. This single quality in his composition would be sufficient to make it entitled to praise and honour much better than poem written by expert poets, and then recited by qualified bards or sung by competent minstrels.]

Tulsidas says that the holy and divine story of Lord Ram ('Raghupati') bestows all sorts of auspiciousness and blessings, and at the same time it eliminates all the impurities, faults and delusions associated with Kaliyuga. (Chanda line no. 1)

The course of my narrative is a little long and winding like the course of the holy river (Ganges) that twists and turns as it meanders through the plains<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

But it is sure that by being associated with the holiness of Lord Ram's divine story that it narrates, my composition would acquire the virtue of auspiciousness and good value; it would invariably appeal to the mind of the wise ones even as it captivates and enthralls their noble hearts. (Chanda line no. 3)

It is like the case of the ash of the funeral pyre that Lord Shiva rubs on his body. This ash would normally be loathed by everyone (as it originates from the funeral pyre), but when it is associated with Lord Shiva (as the Lord rubs it on his body) the same detested ash acquires auspiciousness<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas feels that the world would criticize him for writing such a long-drawn poem as Ram Charit Manas would eventually become. Additionally, it has many problems, one of which is repetition: many ideas have been repeated again and again. Then some of the incidents or events have been elaborately dealt with, while others narrated in a short and crisp manner. Some events do not seem to have any relation with divinity and holiness, for they are like many ordinary events taking place in a person's life in this world. To wit, all such small and big things stretch the narrative unnecessarily, but then, all are related to the story of Lord Ram, and hence cannot be left out.

Since his narrative is long and winding, Tulsidas has compared it with the holy river Ganges that flows with many turns and collects so many odd things as it winds its way along the land, but in spite of its many drawbacks the river is still considered eternally holy and purifying. Similarly, Ram Charit Manas would eternally possess its spiritual healing powers irrespective of its many faults and shortcomings.

<sup>2</sup>In this Chanda, Tulsidas uses the analogy of the ash rubbed on Lord Shiva's body. Lord Shiva is the most enlightened and self-realised of the Gods, for being the God who presides over 'death', Shiva has realized the futility of pursuing the pleasures of this mortal world. So the Lord practices renunciation and detachment, and remains engrossed in contemplation and meditation. Shiva rubs the ash from the burnt wood of funeral pyres to remind him of 'death'.

Normally this ash would be hated by everyone, but when it is applied on the body Lord Shiva, such as his 'Lingam', it turns into a holy ash.

So therefore, though Tulsidas' composition may lack quality as a poem, but since it narrates the holy and divine story of Lord Ram it becomes worthy of honour and praise.]

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, my poetical composition would be liked and appreciated by one and all by the virtue of its association with the divinity and the glory of Lord Ram (for it is totally devoted and dedicated to narrating the holy story of Lord Ram in a modest way, without pretensions of scholarship), just like the case of wood of ordinary trees acquiring the same fragrance and value if they grow alongside a special type of sandalwood tree with exceptionally pleasant scent that is known to grow on the Malayagiri Mountain. (Doha no. 10-a)

[Note—The sandalwood tree that grows on the Malayagiri Mountain is very famous and in high demand because it has a special quality of emanating a very sweet fragrance that surpasses that of other types of sandalwood growing elsewhere. The aromatic oil present in this sandalwood tree has a quality to easily vapourise when wind blows over it, and then it is carried by this wind to other trees in the vicinity where the oil molecules stick. This makes these non-sandalwood trees smell like the original sandalwood tree, giving the impression that the whole mountain is covered by the same kind of sandalwood trees, whereas it is not so in fact.

The effect of this association with sandalwood trees is that wood from ordinary trees acquire the same value as the sandalwood, and are therefore sold at the same rate, though independently they are of much inferior quality.

The saintly poet Tulsidas says that likewise his poetry known as Ram Charit Manas would be well received by everyone because of one single fact—that it narrates nothing else but the glory and divinity of Lord Ram who was a manifestation of the Supreme Being, though his composition may not have any kind of merit of its own.

To wit, he humbly requests all those who read it themselves, or hear it being narrated by others, that they must focus their attention on the subject matter of his composition, which is to praise Lord Ram and sing the Lord's holy name and glory, a single factor that should override all other considerations regarding its poetical worth, quality of composition and grammatical correctness, for nothing else would make the best of compositions worthy of any praise if they do not incorporate the holy name of Lord Ram in their text or are not dedicated to singing the glory and the divinity of the Lord. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 10.}

There are countless renowned and famous poets and authors in this world who have no match, but the most fortunate ones are those who use their pens and skills to praise the Lord God and sing his divine glories. All shortcomings of their compositions are overcome and nullified by this one fine quality that they incorporate in their writing: and it is that they have dedicated their writing efforts to Lord God; it is the sweet and sublime fragrance that renders their otherwise dull, boring and mediocre composition into something that possesses a stellar quality, and an air of mysticism, divinity and holiness.]

It is said that milk from a black-skinned cow has exceptional nutritional value and is good for one's health, and therefore everyone wishes to drink it.

In the same manner, even if crude, rough and un-refined language is used to sing the glories and divinity of Lord Ram, it still becomes exceptionally beautiful and attractive for gentlemen who are wise and intelligent, for they perceive its hidden beauty, instead of being distracted by its external coarseness, because it praises the Supreme Being and sings the Lord's divinity and glories. Therefore, such wise men would cheerfully and willingly hear and sing such compositions, praise the latter and hold them in high esteem in spite of the fact that such compositions may lack all other fine qualities of good poetry. (Doha no. 10-b)

[Note—Tulsidas once again says that he understands that his composition known as 'Ram Charit Manas' uses simple, day-to-day vernacular language of the ordinary people, and not a classical tongue, and that it may be coarse and lacking many of the qualities of good composition, yet it sings the glory and divinity of Lord Ram, and this latter virtue that it possesses is sufficient to overcome all other shortcomings.

So therefore, all wise men would embrace it affectionately; they would welcome it warmly, and they would read and recite it with cheer in their hearts.

nṛpa kirīṭa tarunī tanu pāī. lahahim sakala sōbhā adhikāī. 2.

A gem, a ruby and a pearl lose their inherent importance, beauty and charm if they are present on the hood of a serpent, the top of a mountain or the crown of an elephant, but when removed from these places (which undermine their natural worth and beauty) and viewed independently, then they manifest their true magnificence and worth<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed and in all sooth, when these same gems, rubies and pearls are used to adorn a king's crown or the body of a noble lady, they get the attention they deserve, acquire fame, magnificence and worth, and their beauty and price multiplies manifold times<sup>2</sup>.* (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The beauty and charm of a gem, a ruby and a pearl do not catch the eye of the beholder and seem useless for him as long as they are borne by a serpent on its hood, a mountain on its top as one of the many unpolished gems present on it, or as an adornment for the crown of an elephant. To wit, everything is valued when it is in the right hand and in the right place. The same piece of gem or ruby or pearl that drew no attention while they adorned the hood of a serpent, the top of a mountain or the crown of an elephant would be admired and longed for when placed in the showcase of a jeweller's shop, duly displayed on a box lined with velvet, or when it adorns a fine lady of noble birth.

*In the context of what has been said by Tulsidas in the previous verses herein above, with respect to his composition of Lord Ram's holy story being treated by respect and praise when it is in the hands of wise men, and with contempt and ridicule when it lands in the hands of evil people who are inclined to be jealous of others and ever ready to find faults with anything they do, the meaning of these two verses become very obvious: it simply means that just like the case of these priceless pieces of gems, rubies and pearls losing their worth when placed at the wrong place, so likewise his poetry would too lose its glory and worth if it is handled by evil people. On the other hand, its inherent beauty, charm, magnificence and worth would shine through when it is in correct hands, such as that of saintly souls and holy men who are wise and sagacious, who love Lord God and rejoice in his holy name, who know how to examine the real worth of anything without harbouring any kind of prejudice for and against it.

This idea is further elaborated in the set of verses that follow herein below.]

तैसेहिं सुकबि कबित बुध कहहीं । उपजहिं अनत अनत छबि लहहीं ॥ ३ ॥
भगति हेतु बिधि भवन बिहाई । सुमिरत सारद आवति धाई ॥ ४ ॥

taisēhim sukabi kabita budha kahahīm. upajahim anata anata chabi lahahīm.

bhagati hētu bidhi bhavana bihā'ī. sumirata sārada āvati dhā'ī. 4.

In the same manner, wise people say that a good poet's composition may have been written by him in humble conditions, but when it finds a proper platform (such as illustrious readers and judicious connoisseurs of poetry) then its natural beauty, charm and magnificence shines through and gets its due appreciation<sup>1</sup>. (3)

When a devout poet starts penning a poem in honour of Lord God, with a lot of devotion in his pious heart, and with the honest intention of lauding the Lord's glories and majesty (and not for acquiring fame for himself or expecting any approbation)—then the patron goddess of knowledge and learning, i.e. goddess Saraswati, feels obliged as well as glad to help him so much that she immediately rushes down from her exalted abode in the heaven to lend her full grace and blessings to this poetry, helping the poet to overcome all blocks he may face in his writing process<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas was of a very humble, modest and pious man, and of an equally humble and modest origin; he has never once boasted about his learning or poetical acumen. What he of course says is that inspite of all drawbacks and handicaps, yet he has one noble vision in his mind, one earnest desire—which was to put to use whatever little knowledge and skills he had to a noble cause, of honouring and praising his beloved Lord Ram through the medium of his poetry, though he was aware he was incompetent to undertake such a great mission and carry it on to its fruition. He has explicitly asserted this fact in the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand: (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 8; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 8-11 that precede Doha no. 9.

<sup>2</sup>So in this verse he explains how he is sure he will do it successfully: when goddess Saraswati sees that Tulsidas wishes to write a poem in praise of the divinity, holiness and glories of Lord Ram, but finds himself unable to do it because he is not competent or learned enough for this job, and he is feeling completely at sea and utterly lost, she will then personally come to his aid and empower him with a divine vision and ability which shall enable him to accomplish this gigantic task, safely and without hindrance.

And since his poem known as 'Ram Charit Manas' has by now two glorious secret elements revealed in it—one, it has the holy name of Lord Ram in it and is meant to sing the glories of the Lord, and two, it is actually worded, composed and polished by none other but goddess Saraswati herself—surely then there is no question about its stellar quality with regard to the criterion of its matchless beauty, magnificence, charm and poetical fineness. And as a corollary therefore, those who criticize it unjustly for the sake of criticism, then they are doing so at their own peril.]

 कबि कोबिद अस हृदयँ बिचारी । गावहिं हरि जस कलि मल हारी ॥ ६ ॥

rāma carita sara binu anhavā'ēm̐. sō śrama jā'i na kōṭi upā'ēm̐. 5.
 kabi kōbida asa hr̥dayam̐ bicārī. gāvahiṁ hari jasa kali mala hārī. 6.
 kīnhēm̐ prākṛta jana guna gānā. sira dhuni girā lagata pachitānā. 7.

In fact, goddess Saraswati feels glad to have this opportunity to help a poet complete his composition praising Lord Ram's holiness and glories because she is so tired and weary of undertaking long journeys whenever she is invoked by erudite poets and writers all over the world to help them that she finds it is impossible to feel refreshed and relaxed no matter how hard she tries, for she discovers it is not possible to do so unless she takes a dip in the cool and fragrant waters of a pond symbolised by the glories of Lord Ram.

[So what happens then? Well, when a poet invites her to help him in an endeavour to write a poem in the honour of Lord Ram, such as the case of Tulsidas writing ‘Ram Charit Manas’, which is a symbolic holy lake filled with the nectar-like water embodying the divine story of Lord Ram, goddess Saraswati grabs this opportunity with both hands and goes out of her way to help the pious poet to complete his composition praising the glories of Lord Ram, as it also serves her own needs of building a symbolic pond of fresh and refreshing water that would give her comfort and peace for all times to come.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

Keeping this in mind, wise and learned poets sing the glories of Lord Hari (i.e. Lord God; here meaning Lord Ram) as it is able to destroy the negative effects of remaining engrossed in mundane activities of life in this gross mortal world during the present age known as Kaliyuga<sup>2</sup>. (6)

On the other hand, if a poet employs his skills to sing praises of mortal creatures or other secular subjects (such as for instance court poets who write poems in honour of their patron kings, or by poets who use their skills to compose poetry of all genres except spiritual topics and in honour of the Lord God)—then surely the patron deity of the faculty of speech and intellect (i.e. goddess Saraswati) would regret immensely and beat her head (for she would greatly lament for coming down to help this poet, instead of keeping away from him)<sup>3</sup>. (7)

The present age of Kaliyuga is a dark age, for the word ‘Kali’ itself means ‘dark’: it is the age of spiritual blankness, an age representing a deep void and an abyss that creates horror and intense fear in the heart of the creature. The only way out of this fathomless pit of miseries and torments is to catch hold of the rope of hope of salvation that is symbolized by the story of Lord Ram. This rope would gradually pull the creature up from the deep recesses of the abyss of never ending miseries and problems associated with mundane existence in this mortal world of grossness by showing him the light of day represented by spiritual peace, happiness and joy. The story of Lord Ram is like a lifeline of deliverance, salvation and emancipation for the trapped soul, and therefore the latter must grab it immediately.

<sup>3</sup>Tulsidas avers that in this short worldly life, a wise man is he who utilizes the little time and whatever skills he has to devote himself in the service of the Lord God, i.e. Lord Ram. To wit, using poetical skills to praise the world and its countless things, both material things as well as mortal creatures, is an exercise in futility, a waste of talent and time, and effort washed down the drain. So therefore, the patron deity of speech and learning, i.e. goddess Saraswati, regrets for helping this poet in his composition, for notwithstanding how learned or skilled a poet may be, yet it is not possible for him to write a single line without the blessing of this goddess.

Compared to this, goddess Saraswati feels happy and privileged if she gets a chance to help a poet pen a composition in honour of Lord Ram as stated in the previous verse.]

हृदय सिंधु मति सीप समाना । स्वाति सारदा कहहिं सुजाना ॥ ८ ॥
जौं बरसइ बर बारि बिचारू । होहिं कबित मुकुतामनि चारू ॥ ९ ॥

hr̥daya sindhu mati sīpa samānā. svāti sārādā kahahim̐ sujānā. 8.
jaum̐ barasa'i bara bāri bicārū. hōhim̐ kabita mukutāmani cārū. 9.

Wise men (sujān) aver that the poet's heart is like a sea, his mind and its ability to think is like the shell in which a pearl grows, and the patron goddess of speech, knowledge and erudition, goddess Saraswati, is like the asterism known as 'Swati' (i.e. the group of stars known as Arcturus; the 15th lunar asterism that is said to favour the formation of pearls). (8)

If it rains during the time this asterism lasts, it is believed that it favours the formation of pearls inside the shells in the sea. Likewise, if goddess Saraswati is benevolent upon the poet, she would grace him with her blessings, granting him the ability to write fine poetry in a natural way, without any artificiality or superfluity in it, which would make it as pristine, priceless and beautiful as the piece of natural pearl formed during the asterism of Swati. (9)

[Note—The Swati asterism is a rare event, and it is said that the rain drops that fall during it are like nectar falling from the heaven. The pearls that form during this period are blessed with extraordinary shine and beauty.

Similarly, if goddess Saraswati is kind on the poet and showers her blessings on him, then his composition would have no match in this world as far as its pristine beauty and charm are concerned.

Now, on which poet would Saraswati become gracious? This question has already been answered in the forgoing verses: surely she would grant her blessings upon a poet who writes poem in the honour of Lord Ram, with an honest intention to sing the Lord's glories, grace, holiness and divinity. As a natural corollary, such poetry would be a classical production of excellent value and stellar qualities; it would be a poem of pristine beauty, having unadulterated spiritual purity, and one that would enthrall the heart and mind of everyone without distinction or exception.]

पहिरहिं सज्जन बिमल उर सोभा अति अनुराग ॥ ११ ॥

dōhā.

juguti bēdhi puni pōhi'ahim̐ rāmacarita bara tāga.
pahirahim̐ sajjana bimala ura sōbhā ati anurāga. 11.

If these priceless pearls are carefully threaded together into a beautiful garland and worn by anyone on his chest, surely it would make an excellent piece of ornament for the wearer.

Likewise, when the verses composed by a poet in honour of Lord Ram are arranged together in a systematic manner in order to form a composition that narrates the holy story of Lord Ram, and it is sung or narrated by him piously, with his heart and emotions involved in the process, surely then he would be praised and honoured by all who listen to him. (Doha no. 11)

Similarly, a poem that is recited by a poet himself would have his natural emotional warmth injected into it. Since a poem is recited by the use of the vocal cords in the throat, and also since the poet usually remembers it by heart and pours out his inner feelings and sentiments when he recites it himself, being emotionally involved in its singing or recitation, it is symbolically like the case of the garland that is worn around the neck and allowed to hang on the chest of the wearer, making the wearer look charming and honourable by the virtue of wearing this particular garland.

When a learned poet sings his composition and becomes emotional while doing so, it is like his whole heart pouring out its inner feelings through the words of the poetry. Such charged would the entire atmosphere become that more often than not everyone is deeply affected, the narrator as well as his audience, for they become overwhelmed by the warmth of emotions and sentiments that effuse out of the poetry, much like the warmth of the sun gracing everyone under its shine.

In this analogy, every single episode or event in the story of Lord Ram is like the pearl of a garland of pearls; the proper arrangement of the sequence of events and the way the story is put forward is like threading the pearls into a garland; and the finished garland of pearls is the beautiful story of Lord Ram itself.

There are many kinds of pearls found in the ocean and the sea, but the ones that are formed during the Swati Nakshatra are of rare value; and hence a garland of these pearls too has rare value. Similarly, there is neither dearth of poets nor of poetry, but the one poem that narrates the holy story of Lord Ram stands out amongst the whole crowd of poetries, tall and handsome, for it is universally lauded and applauded for its pristine spiritual beauty and charm, as a fountainhead of eternal peace, bliss, happiness and joy.]

Those who are born during the dark age of Kaliyug (a terrible age of moral degradation and spiritual depravation) act and think like a crooked crow though they assume the garb of a swan<sup>1</sup>. (1)

These people lead a life that goes astray and against the principles of goodness, righteousness, auspiciousness and propriety as advised in the Vedas (scriptures). They are embodiments of pretension, corruption, falsehood, deceit and conceit. Verily indeed, they are a repository of all the shortcomings, faults and negativities associated with the age of Kaliyug<sup>2</sup>. (2)

These crooked and pretentious people call themselves devotees of Lord Ram, whereas in reality they are crooks and vile fellows who are servants or followers of vices such as greed, anger and worldly passions. In all sooth, such people are hypocrites, unscrupulous and pretentious to the core<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The people of this evil age are full of falsehood, pretensions, deceit and conceit; externally they pretend to be good and noble by what they wear and say, but internally they are crooked like a wicked crow. Their action and words are diametrically opposite.

A swan is a noble bird which is used as an example of purity as it is believed that it would drink milk and leave aside its adulterant water, while the crow is a detested bird that is abhorred by everyone as it is flesh eating bird that steals even rotten meat and rummages through garbage bins for stale and discarded bits of food.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 302 where a wicked person is compared to a crow.

<sup>3</sup>A true devotee of Lord Ram is one who is a holy and pious person, someone who is free from such negative qualities as greed, lust and anger. But there are crooked people who assume a false façade of piousness and holiness, pretending to be devotees of the Lord, with an intention to cheat the world and satisfy their own interests. Such false devotees of Lord Ram hide themselves behind a garb of holiness and piety, yet a close examination of their behaviour reveals their true face.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Doha no. 40.]

jauṁ apanē avaguna saba kaha'ūṁ. bāṛha'i kathā pāra nahim̐ laha'ūṁ. 5.
tātē mair̐ ati alapa bakhānē. thōrē mahum̐ jānihahim̐ sayānē. 6.

[In these verses, Tulsidas once again expresses his sense of utmost modesty and humbleness by saying that in no way he pretends to be a wise poet or a scholar who is skilled enough to write and narrate the story of Lord Ram; nor does he pretend to be a pious and saintly person because he wishes to write the story of Lord Ram. He has no intention to cheat anybody, nor mislead them to praise or honour him. In this context, refer to earlier Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8—to Doha no. 10.

That said, Tulsidas reiterates as follows:-]

Let me be counted as the first amongst such people as enumerated in the foregoing verses, people who are flag-bearers of pretension, falsehood and deceit. (4)

If I start listing my shortcomings, it will be a long list that would needlessly stretch the narrative. (5)

That is why I am being brief in outlining my faults. Those who are clever would get an idea from it. [To wit, those who are wise would see the hidden meaning behind what Tulsidas says, and what his real intention is<sup>1</sup>.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas makes a point here. He wants to keep his detractors at bay by self-criticism, thereby giving such wicked people no occasion to deprecate and ridicule him as a pretentious hypocrite and a false saint, one who wishes to hide his evilness behind the garb of being a holy person because he is narrating the divine story of Lord Ram and dedicating his poem to the Lord. Fie to such evil-minded persons driven by jealousy and malice. Once wicked persons hear that Tulsidas has publicly accepted that he is not a holy person but one like them, one who is full of faults and evil characters of Kaliyug, then surely his enemies would leave him at peace.

To wit, Tulsidas wishes to put to rest all sorts of gossip and tittle-tattle about himself. He therefore says: “I don’t want any praise or honour for being a pious or saintly person, nor do I want approbation for my composition that narrates the glories of Lord Ram. Let no one be jealous of me; let no one harbour prejudice against me; let no malice be heaped upon me. Let me be at peace with myself, and be allowed to sing the holy story of Lord Ram in a humble way that I can. It’s enough for me. If anyone thinks I am a pretentious person who falsely claims to be an expert poet and a holy man, than what is the great deal about it, for I myself welcome such insinuations as a means of insulating me from further scorn and scrutiny: because once the world knows I am a false poet and a crooked fellow, it will shun me and leave me alone to do what pleases me, thereby letting me continue to narrate the holy story of Lord Ram, at ease and with peace.”

This self-deprecating statement from him would pre-empt any attempt by his detractors to criticize him and find fault with his composition. It would deter back-biters to deride him behind his back and call him pretentious and false—because he himself says he is one such, so there is nothing new left to say against him by his enemies.

The following verses clarify this strategy of Tulsidas in express terms.]

समुझि बिबिधि बिधि बिनती मोरी । कोउ न कथा सुनि देइहि खोरी ॥ ७ ॥
एतेहु पर करिहहिं जे असंका । मोहि ते अधिक ते जड़ मति रंका ॥ ८ ॥ samujhi bibidhi bidhi binatī mōrī. kō'u na kathā suni dē'ihī khōrī. 7.

ētēhu para karihahīṁ jē asaṅkā. mōhi tē adhika tē jaṛa mati raṅkā. 8.

After understanding the import of my humble assertions and prayers (that I have made in the foregoing verses) and realising what I mean to say, no person would blame me for leaving shortcomings in my composition when they hear the story of Lord Ram that I have composed<sup>1</sup>. (7)

In spite of all these humble submissions by me, if still someone raises objections with regard to my composition and find faults in it, woe betide him, as then he is more stupid and of a poor intellect than I am<sup>2</sup>! (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is because I have already said that I am not competent to write any poem, that I am an ordinary person like the rest of the world, that I have a lot of faults in me, and that I am writing Lord Ram's story just to satisfy myself and not to get any fame or approbation. So therefore, it is understood that my poem has many poetical shortcomings. Yet on the other hand, since it is a holy narrative of the divine glory of Lord Ram, what can I do if goddess Saraswati herself decides to bless it by her grace, out of her own free will, and not at my request, thereby making it beautiful and matchless. Why should I be blamed for it?

<sup>2</sup>I have abundantly apologized for my limitations and shortcomings, as well as that I am an ordinary man with no poetical skills worth the name. Yet if someone still finds faults with my poem, what can I do about it? Such men are bigger hypocrites and pretentious judges of the worth or un-worth of a poem than I thought them to be; surely they are driven by malice and jealousy, and nothing else. Such men are bankrupt of mind and scruples—for, when a man has already apologized for his shortcomings and has clearly affirmed he does not seek laurels for his work, what is the cause and the logic of hauling him over the coal and roasting him, for no rhyme or reason?

Besides this factor, one must realize that I am writing about the glories and divinity of Lord Ram, the Supreme Being, and this single factor should override all other considerations while deciding on the merit of my poem. Still if I am criticized and my poem derided by my enemies and detractors, then surely they are most unfortunate and cursed.]

kaham̃ raghupati kē carita apārā. kaham̃ mati mōri nirata sansārā. 10.

[I have repeatedly asserted that—] I am neither a poet nor a clever and wise man<sup>1</sup>. I am singing the divine glories of Lord Ram in accordance with my intellect and understanding. (9)

Verily and without gainsay, on the one hand the divine and glorious story of Lord Ram has no end, as it is profound and endless, transcending time and age<sup>2</sup>, and on the other hand there is my mind and intellect which have a limited scope and reach as they are tied to this mortal world of countless material objects that create attachment to them<sup>3</sup>.

Say then, how is it ever possible for my limited intellect to be able to measure the depth and expanse of the holy story of Lord Ram in order to narrate it exhaustively and completely<sup>4</sup>? [To wit, it is not possible for me to do it, and neither am I claiming to do so.] (10)

<sup>2</sup>This is because the Lord is a manifestation of Brahm, the cosmic Lord of creation and a personified form of supreme Consciousness which is all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent and immanent in this creation, an entity that has an eternal existence, for it was present before this world came into being, and will exist after it ends.

<sup>3</sup>The true form of Lord Ram is Brahm, the Supreme Being representing the cosmic Consciousness. As such, the glories of the Lord are as expansive, vast, endless and measureless as the open sky itself. On the other hand, Tulsidas is a human being, someone who is bound to this mortal world, with natural limitations that are inherent to such existence. Say then, how can something with a limited reach measure something that has no limits? It is like the case of a bird flying in the sky; it flies high in accordance to its abilities, but it cannot claim to have measured the length and width of the endless sky. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 91.

Say, the powerful force of the wind that can even blow away mighty mountains, how can the humble cotton ever think of resisting the might of such a wind and stand on its way?

[To wit, it is impossible for the light-weight cotton to resist being blown away by a powerful gust of wind which in its fiercest form has the ability to uproot giant trees and cause massive landslides on mountains, giving the impression that the mountain is moving itself.] (11)

In a similar way, taking into consideration the vastness and profundity of Lord Ram's glories, I feel very hesitant and my mind is sore affright at the thought of attempting to narrate the Lord's divine story<sup>1</sup>. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas says the task he is about to undertake is extremely daunting and it is frightening the wits out of him. Lord Ram and his glories are endless and profound,

while Tulsidas' intellect and abilities are very limited. It is like cotton trying to match its strength against the power of the wind. With one whiff the wind would blow the cotton to god only knows where; so this analogy shows the apprehension of Tulsidas as he fears getting lost and losing the bearing of his mind when faced by the mammoth structure representing Lord Ram's expansive story which he is trying to bound in the words of his poem—a task that makes him sore affright, and puts him out of his wits.

But then why is he doing so; why is he attempting the impossible by his own admission? Well, the answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 361 where Tulsidas says: "I am singing the divine glories of Lord Ram to purify my speech and to honour my birth in the community of poets for having chosen to sing the glories of Lord Ram, though I am well aware that the Lord's glories are like an endless ocean that cannot be measured."]

Verily indeed, how can I sing the glories and the holy story of Lord Ram in entirety when they are so extremely profound that even the goddess of knowledge and speech known as Sarada (Saraswati), the thousand hooded celestial serpent known as Seshnath with his thousand tongues, the Great God known as Lord Mahesh (i.e. Lord Shiva—who is the wisest and the most enlightened of all the gods), the creator of the world and the laws that govern its functioning, known as Bidhi (i.e. Lord Brahma), the Aagams and Nigams (i.e. the ancient scriptures such as the Vedas) as well as the Purans (mythological histories)—all of them continue to sing the Lord's glories endlessly yet find no end to it.

As a last resort they yield, saying 'Neti-neti', meaning 'what we have said is not all, and much is still left to be said, for what we have said in an attempt to describe the Lord is only like scratching the surface of anything that seems to have no end'<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 12)

tahām' bēda asa kārana rākhā. bhajana prabhā'u bhām'ti bahu bhāṣā. 2.

Everyone in this world (including the great ones listed in Doha no. 12 herein above) are well acquainted with the profundity of Lord Ram's glories and the fact that they cannot be enumerated in their entirety, yet there is rarely anyone who has not attempted (and found joy) to try and sing these glories as much and as best as one can. (1)

The Vedas have put forward a reason for this eagerness shown by one and all to sing the Lord's glories inspite of everyone being aware of their own limitations, and the reason is this: there are many ways by which one can offer worship to Lord Ram and pray to him, and all of them bless the worshipper and devotee of the Lord in a variety of ways.

[So therefore, singing the Lord's glories and narrating his divine story is a sort of offering worship and paying obeisance to the Lord, and honouring him by his devotees. This is why everyone willingly does so, inspite of being aware of their own limitations as well as the profundity of the Lord's glories and divinity which cannot be measured and enumerated completely.] (2)

[Note—Tulsidas has laid the foundation for his endeavour to sing the divine story of Lord Ram in the form of a poetical composition known as Ram Charit Manas. He says that it is a form of worship and prayer that he is offering to the Lord, and it is not meant to acquire fame or name as a poet.

Even well known gods and goddesses as well as the scriptures listed in Doha no. 12 do the same, because they wish to worship Lord Ram and pray to him in this simple and easy way.

Verily indeed, a tongue that is not employed to sing the glories of Lord Ram is like the tongue of a frog that knows only to croak endlessly without making any sense—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 113.]

The Lord God who is one and non-dual, who is free from all desires and wants (i.e. he is self-contented and fulfilled), who is formless and without attributes, who has no specific name, who takes no birth as he is eternal, who is an embodiment of eternal bliss and happiness, who is the ultimate destination of every creature in this creation, -
 -- (3)

--- Who is all pervading and omnipresent, who has revealed himself in the form of the entire creation, visible as well as invisible (i.e. the whole universe, from the subtlest to the grossest, is a manifestation of the same Lord God), and who is the Supreme Being and the Lord of the whole creation.<sup>1</sup>

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, it is the same Lord of the universe who had revealed himself by assuming a visible form and doing many deeds in this manifestation<sup>2</sup>.* (4)

[When and why does the Supreme Being, who has no forms and is invisible, assumes a visible form? This question is answered in this verse.] It is only for the sake of his devotees that the Supreme Being manifests himself. The Lord is most gracious, kind, merciful, munificent, benevolent and magnanimous, and when his devotees bow before him and pray to him, the Lord obliges them by fulfilling their wishes<sup>3</sup>. (5)

<sup>2</sup>In these verses it is clarified that Lord Ram, to whom this composition known as Ram Charit Manas is being dedicated, is not an ordinary human being as his physical form may mislead one to believe, but the Supreme Being himself in a human body. This is an irrefutable fact endorsed even by Mandodari, the wife of the demon king Ravana, when she felt her husband is under great delusions regarding the reality of Lord Ram as he was stubborn in his refusal to make peace with the Lord and give Sita, the Lord's consort and an incarnation of goddess Laxmi, back to him to avoid a ruinous war that would decimate the demon clan. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 14—to Doha no. 15.}

In a similar way, Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu, too was confused about the reality of Lord Ram, doubting the Lord's divinity and supremacy, for which he was directed to sage Kaagbhusund's hermitage by Lord Shiva, where Garud heard the story of Lord Ram from the sage and questioned him at length about the Lord's truth. Finally Garud was convinced that Lord Ram was indeed the Supreme Being himself in a human form, a realization that not only settled his doubts but gave him immense mental peace as well as bliss that came to him naturally as a reward of listening to the holy story of Lord Ram being recited by Kaagbhusund. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 69; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 125-a.}

Even goddess Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva, had once got confused about the truth of Lord Ram; she had even defied Lord Shiva's advise not to doubt Lord Ram and had tested the Lord's mystical powers and divinity, for which she was punished by her husband who withdrew himself from her. Later on, when she took another birth and did severe penance to atone for her mistake, she was accepted by Lord Shiva as his consort once again. Then once again she approached Shiva with the same query, and then the Lord narrated the story of Lord Ram to her in great detail, a narration that came down to us in the form of this holy book known as 'Ram Charit Manas'. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 57; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Doha no. 115; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 52—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 53.}

*An important point to note here is this: these two verses summarise the unique virtues possessed by the Supreme Being. To wit, anybody who does not possess even one of these mystical abilities is not entitled to be called the Supreme Being.

<sup>3</sup>In Ram Charit Manas, some of the instances are cited where the Supreme Being had to assume a form and come down in this mortal world—apropos: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 122—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124.

In Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 187, we read that once Lord Vishnu had assured the gods and mother earth that he would assume a body and come down to earth as Lord Ram to eliminate the cruel demons who had been tormenting them for quite some time.

In Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 122 it is said that Lord Ram had manifested himself to enable his devotees to narrate the Lord's story as a means to find joy and happiness in this world while they live here, and enable their souls to attain liberation and deliverance from the cycle of birth and death at the time of leaving their mortal coils. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 217.

Another reason why the Lord takes birth is to restore Dharma (law and order) in this world whenever it is declining—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 121 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

In Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 39 we learn that the Lord manifests himself to protect humble creatures and uphold the sanctity of the Vedas whenever evil forces try to trounce them and trample them underfoot.]

He (Lord Ram) is the Lord who has extreme affection for, and is very merciful and kind towards his servants and followers (i.e. devotees), so much so that he has never become angry at his devotees upon whom he has shown his grace and compassion.

[To wit, Lord Ram is very kind and merciful towards his devotees, and he would never become angry at them under any situation.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

Lord Ram is the one who helps to restore what has been lost<sup>2</sup>; he is munificent and benevolent towards the lowly, the miserable and the underprivileged as he is a friend of the deprived and the poor; he has a simple, straightforward and unpretentious nature<sup>3</sup>; he is the able Lord and the almighty<sup>4</sup>; and he is the Lord of the race of illustrious kings in the line of Raghu of Ayodhya<sup>5</sup>. (7)

With full understanding of these facts, wise and illustrious poets, those who are intelligent, erudite and sagacious, find extreme satisfaction and joy in singing and narrating the divine story of Lord Ram as they use it as a means to purify their speech and intellect. [It is because they realize that when they sing the glories of Lord Ram they are actually honouring the Supreme Being, praying to him and worshipping him by this means. This makes them feel fortunate and honoured at being given the chance to do so.]<sup>6</sup> (8)

In all the verses cited herein above, one common thing is said: that Lord Ram is extremely gracious towards his devotees.

Refer also to Tulsidas' (i) Vinai Patrika, verse no. 249; and (ii) Dohawali, verse no. 158.

<sup>3</sup>The kind and graceful nature of the Lord is such that he treats even the most ordinary people with the greatest affection and respect, never letting them feel that he is superior to them: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 204 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that follow it; (ii) Doha no. 224 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 237; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 28; (b) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Doha no. 114 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it; (ii) Doha no. 136 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

<sup>6</sup>Tulsidas says that those who are wise and intelligent, those who enlightened and have a correct understanding of the different scriptures would know that when they are singing the glories of Lord Ram by way of narrating the Lord's holy story, they are actually using this means to pay their respects to and offer their worship to the Supreme Lord of the creation, and not to some king of a worldly kingdom. This latter view is held by those who are deluded and ignorant.

This is why wise poets would welcome Tulsidas' narration of Lord Ram's holy story in the form of 'Ram Charit Manas', while foolish and ignorant poets would laugh at him and deride him.]

तेहिं बल मैं रघुपति गुन गाथा । कहिहउँ नाइ राम पद माथा ॥ ९ ॥

मुनिन्ह प्रथम हरि कीरति गाई । तेहिं मग चलत सुगम मोहि भाई ॥ १० ॥

tēhim bala mair̥m raghupati guna gāthā. kahiha'um̃ nā'i rāma pada māthā. 9. muninha prathama hari kīrati gāī. tēhim maga calata sugama mōhi bhāī. 10.

Tulsidas says that these considerations have given him the strength and the courage to continue with his effort to sing the glories of Lord Ram, the Lord of the Raghus (kings of Ayodhya)<sup>1</sup>. So now he would begin his narration after first bowing his head most reverentially at the holy feet of the Lord to pay his obeisance to him. (9)

Listen my Brothers (bhāī)! Great and wise sages have already sung the divine glories of Lord Ram since time immemorial; so I find it easy and convenient to tread on the same path<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In verse no. 7 herein above, Tulsidas has clarified that the king of the Raghu line of illustrious rulers of Ayodhya, who is known as 'Lord Ram', to whom his poem is dedicated, is a personified form of the Supreme Being, and not an ordinary human king of some mighty kingdom. So therefore, no one should be misled by this word 'Raghupati', meaning 'the Lord of king Raghu's family', or 'the Lord who belongs to the line of kings descending from the ancient king Raghu of the kingdom of Ayodhya' when Tulsidas refers to the Supreme Being with this term.

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas says that he is not doing something new, nor is he revealing some secret not hitherto known or professing a spiritual path having any novelty in it. He is simply doing what great sages and saints have been doing down the ages, for he wants to sing the glories of Lord Ram to purify his own mind, heart and speech, as well as to worship his beloved Lord by this simple means.

In Chaupai no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 14 herein below, as well as Chaupai no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3 earlier, Tulsidas names some of the great learned poets and illustrious sages of the past who had most reverentially narrated the glories of the Lord God. He specifically names sage Veda Vyas, who wrote the story of Lord Ram in his 'Adhyatma Ramayan', and the sage Valmiki, who is better known as the 'Aadi Kavi', for he is deemed to be the first learned sage who was also a poet as he was the first one to have composed the story of Lord Ram in the form of a poem and compiled as a book, called the 'Valmiki's Ramayana', which is believed to be the first such narration of its kind. Then he also names sage Narad and sage Agastya.

If there is a mighty river of enormous depth and turbulent currents, one which is otherwise difficult to cross, but some great and magnanimous king builds a bridge across it to help his subjects, then this same river can be easily crossed by even a humble ant<sup>1</sup>.* (Doha no. 13)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the previous verse no. 10, Tulsidas says that he is following the path and the tradition set by ancient sages and poets before him, who have already sung the glories of Lord Ram. This has made his path easy and convenient. It is like being able to easily get across a great river by using a bridge instead of trying to swim across its furious currents, or even using a boat that heaves, tosses and twists in the wild currents, creating immense fear of getting drowned.

*The reader must have noted by now that Tulsidas, by his own explicit admission, seems to be very apologetic as well as apprehensive of inviting scorn, ridicule and rejection by his peers while preparing to start writing Ram Charit Manas, inspite of the fact that he was doing nothing wrong in penning a poem in honour of Lord Ram. So, what is the reason for this?

Well, the Sanskrit scholars and Brahmin pundits of his time in Kashi (i.e. Varanasi, the ancient city known as the center of Sanskrit scholarship) were very jealous of him and his rising fame amongst the masses; when they learned that he was planning to write the story of Lord Ram in the vernacular language which would be loved by the common man, who would lap up his narrative immediately and embrace it very affectionately for one simple reason that it was in the native tongue and meant for the common man, as opposed to the Sanskrit versions of the story of Ramayana, chiefly the Valmiki's version that was the common form of Lord Ram's story narrated at the time, but unfortunately the common man could not so easily read and enjoy it directly himself as Sanskrit was not the common man's language, but the language of the court, of the scholar, the high and the learned.

So these pundits and scholars of Kashi feared that if they allow Tulsidas to go ahead with his project, their position as the only teachers and preachers of the story of Lord Ram would suffer, and consequently their superior position in the society and demand amongst the masses would be severely undermined, which would obviously adversely affect their source of revenue. Driven by such selfish objectives and filled with jealousy and malice for Tulsidas, it is said that they tried their best to dissuade this great saint from writing the divine story of Lord Ram in the vernacular, first by persuasion, then by different kinds of covert and overt threats, oral and physical, when he defied them and refused to be cowed down by showing his determination to go ahead with his mission irrespective all objections and hurdles thrown in his way.

This is why he refers to evil persons and pays his respect to them as well, obviously to keep at least the majority of them in good humour, and let him live in peace and do his work—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 4 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-11 that precede it.]

In the aforesaid manner, I gather courage and strength of mind and heart to start narrating the beautiful, holy and divine story of Lord Ram, the Lord of the Raghus<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Great, wise, enlightened and illustrious sages, such as Veda Vyas and the ancient poet Valmiki, as well as many others, have sung the glories of Lord Ram with great reverence<sup>2</sup>. (2)

I most reverentially bow my head at their holy feet and pray to them to bless me so that my wishes (of successfully narrating the holy story of Lord Ram and singing the Lord's divine glories) are fulfilled. (3)

Verily and most sincerely I pay my respects and bow before all the poets and bards and minstrels of the present age of Kaliyug who have sung the legion of glories of Lord Ram in one or the other way. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas was apprehensive of whether or not he would be successful in narrating the divine story of Lord Ram in a proper way, for one, he feared being hooted by his peers, and secondly, he thought he did not have the needed competence for writing something on such a profound topic as narrating the story of Lord Ram that would do justice to the Lord's glories, holiness and divinity that are as measureless as the ocean and the sky, and beyond comprehension.

In this regard, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 8; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 8-11 that precede Doha no. 9; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 12.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3 where sages Valmiki, Narad and Agastya are named.

As regards sage Agastya, even Lord Shiva had once listened to the story of Ram Charit Manas being narrated by him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 48.

Lord Shiva had narrated it to his consort, goddess Uma, as well as to Kaagbhhusund—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 30; and Doha no. 111.]

I also pay my homage to those wise and learned poets who have written such profound glories of the Lord in the ancient language known as 'Prakrit'<sup>1</sup>. (5)

My respects are given to all such poets of the past ages, of the present age, as well as those who will come in the future ages.

I bow before all of them sincerely, without any deceit or pretension in me, for I am absolutely honest in my submissions when I express my deep respects to all of them. (6)

Please be gracious upon me and bless me with the grant of a boon that my poem (which is dedicated to Lord Ram) would find its due respect in the hallowed community of saints and pious people<sup>2</sup>. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In earlier times, there were two main languages in which poem and prose were scripted by poets and scholars respectively: one was Sanskrit and the other was Prakrit. The Prakrit language was for the less educated and was usually looked down upon as a non-scholarly language, while Sanskrit was used in scriptures and was the medium employed by scholars and court poets. The word 'Prakrit' is derived from 'Prakriti' meaning 'Nature'. Hence, Prakrit is believed to be a language that was spoken by the ancient man in the earlier days of evolution of civilization, and hence it is said to pre-date the more evolved form of it that came to be known as Sanskrit. Sanskrit was the language of the Pundits, while Prakrit was derided as a language of spirits and ghosts—because when civilization developed and more refined form of language evolved, known as Sanskrit and later on the main vernacular tongues, this ancient language known as 'Prakrit' began to fade away and lose its importance for lesser and lesser persons could speak or understand it; it started becoming outdated and gradually went into oblivion. Hence, if there was some person who could still read and speak it, but was not understood by his listeners, he was laughed at for speaking in a 'ghostly language'. Similar was the fate of ancient writing written in this language—for no one could understand it, and hence it was called the 'language of the spirits'.

It is believed that Prakrit language was the prevalent langue-franca in the Indian sub-continent till around 300 B.C., and at that time it was known as 'Pali' in royal courts. The books of the two main religions having their origin in ancient India, Jainism and Buddhism, are written in the Pali language. As Vedic religion gained momentum, Sanskrit became the court language and patronized by kings.

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas has made an important observation here: he says he expects respect for his poem amongst ‘saints and pious people’, clearly meaning he does not expect any such reception from the wicked and the ugly people of this world who would be jealous of him and harbour malice towards him. Saints and pious people would see the positive side of his composition—that it narrates the holy story of Lord Ram and extols the Lord’s glories, that it professes love and devotion for Lord Ram as a means to attain peace and happiness in this world that is otherwise full of miseries, that it would help the ordinary man to attain deliverance, emancipation and salvation for himself by remembering Lord Ram and singing the Lord’s divine glories, that it would give an easy way by which a tormented soul can find bliss and beatitude for itself—which are some of the virtues of Ram Charit Manas that would be enough for saints and pious people to honour it. This idea is made clear earlier too—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 11.]

I need blessings of wise and saintly poets and illustrious souls because any composition that is not accepted as being of any good by such people who know how to appreciate it and value its worth (and if it lands in wrong hands), then all efforts (time and energy) spent in composing it goes in vain. (8)

Indeed, any sort of fame, any kind of power and authority, as well as any poem or composition is considered to be good and worthy of respect in this world if it does good to others selflessly, without any self-serving motive, just like the holy river Ganges that blesses the world with its life-sustaining water, irrespective of the land over which it flows and the creatures who live by its banks and come to seek water in it for their daily needs<sup>1</sup>. (9)

[Note—Here, Tulsidas means that he is writing this story of Lord Ram in the local language, the vernacular known as Avadhi, rather than the scholarly Sanskrit, because his aim is to make the holy lake symbolized by the divine story of Lord Ram accessible to the common man so that everyone can take a dip into it by way of reading, singing and narrating this story and derive spiritual joy and bliss as a consequence, just like the case of the holy river Ganges which makes its life-sustaining water available to one and all without any kind of distinction.

The river Ganges, which is deemed to be holy and pure as it is believed to have descended from the heavens where it is called the ‘river of the gods’, flows through dirty plains and traverses through all sorts of soil as it weaves its serpentine way across the land, never worried that the dirt and the garbage all along will ever corrupt it. It purifies the holy man as well as the sinner who come to bathe in it; it cleanses a washerman’s clothes as well as it cleans the soul of the seeker of liberation and deliverance. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 15.

Likewise, the divine story of Lord Ram ought to be entitled to provide spiritual bliss and beatitude to both the high and the lowly, yet it is difficult to make this happen if it not made accessible to the common man in his local language. This is why Tulsidas has chosen to write in the vernacular, and he has no self-serving motives behind it, such as to gain fame and applause as a great poet. Since his objective is noble and pious, and since he is writing this poem known as Ram Charit Manas as a means to sing the divine glories of Lord Ram, to honour the Lord Ram and pay respects to him, hence saintly persons must welcome him and support his efforts.

Therefore, he begs saintly souls and right-minded poets to understand the importance of his work and appreciate his efforts by blessing him. To wit, Tulsidas implies that he is pleading with good people to support him against the onslaught of his detractors and enemies who would go out of their way to deride and ridicule Ram Charit Manas.]

तुम्हरी कृपाँ सुलभ सोड मोरे । सिअनि सुहावनि टाट पटोरे ॥ ११ ॥

rāma sukīrati bhaniti bhadēsā. asamanjasa asa mōhi amḍēsā. 10.
tumharī kṛpām̐ sulabha sō'u mōrē. si'ani suhāvani ṭāṭa paṭōrē. 11.

[In these two verses, Tulsidas gives a reason for his earnest request to saints and pious people to bless and support him. This is in addition to the ideas expressed in the note to the previous set of verses.]

Lord Ram's glories are exceptionally majestic, sublime in their beauty, and eternally divine<sup>1</sup>, while my abilities to write about them and to speak of them are sorely limited and inapt. This apparent mismatch between them, this obvious dichotomy betwixt the objective and the means to achieve it, creates immense consternation and fear in my mind as to whether or not I shall be able to do justice to the holiness of the Lord's story in my narrative because of my incompetence and lack of skills.

This has filled me with doubt and I am totally at my wits for I lack confidence regarding my ability to successfully achieve my aim<sup>2</sup> (of narrating the holy story of Lord Ram in such a way that its pristine beauty, its magnificence, and its divinity and holiness are properly and correctly depicted, without omitting any important point, and ensure that justice is done to it). (10)

But however, no matter what my shortcomings are, everything can be taken care of and sorted out by your (i.e. saints and holy people mentioned in verse nos. 4-6) grace and blessings just like the case of rough cloth that acquires value if it has been stitched using a silk thread<sup>3</sup>. (11)

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 8 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 9—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 10; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 13.

Similarly, when Tulsidas' poem narrating the divine story of Lord Ram is accepted by saintly souls who will judge it not for its mastery of the language or beauty of its style of composition but for the fact that it has Lord Ram's name in it and sings the Lord's glories, then others too would welcome it. Those who would be watching from the side to see what kind of reaction it gets from the fraternity of honourable poets and saintly persons, when they find that they have blessed Tulsidas and welcomed his composition, they would quietly move away and leave him at peace. Otherwise, if unscrupulous people discover that honorable poets and saints have rejected Tulsidas' composition, it will add fuel to their already burning fire of jealousy, hatred and malice, and they would pounce upon him like hungry wolves tearing down at their helpless victim.]

दो०. सरल कबित कीरति बिमल सोइ आदरहिं सुजान ।

Verily indeed, a poem that is in simple language, and which narrates a story that is sublime and holy in its message, is welcomed by wise, sagacious and intelligent people.

Nay, even those who are wicked and inclined to be naturally inimical towards the poet who had composed it would find no cause to discover fault with such a composition, and so they too would discard their natural animosity towards the poet by sincerely appreciating his poem. (Doha no. 14-a)

सो न होइ बिनु बिमल मति मोहि मति बल अति थोर ।

But the problem is that such an excellent kind of poem needs an equally refined mind and a highly evolved intellect for its composition, and unfortunately I don't have it.

This is why I am earnestly beseeching you (saints and pious poets) to please be kind upon me, and bless me with your favour and benevolence (so that whatever sort of poem I may eventually be able to write, whether or not it is up to the mark, yet you will bless it and appreciate it in public, even if it is just for the sake to honour Lord Ram and respect the Lord's majesty, because my poem has the Lord's holy name 'Ram' imbedded in it, and it is also dedicated exclusively to narrate the divine story of the Lord and nothing else)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 14-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas says that all other factors that are normally employed by expert poets to judge the quality of a poem may weigh against him in his composition, but one factor is in his favour—and it is that his poem has Lord Ram's holy name in it, and it sings the divine story of Lord Ram and pays homage to his glories. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 9—to Refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 10.

Tulsidas says that the presence of Lord Ram's holy name and glory in his poem would naturally attract applause from saints, while non-saints too would praise it because they won't be able to do otherwise for the same reason.]

Wise poets and learned men, who are like swans living in the holy waters of a lake symbolized by the divine story of Lord Ram which gives them immense peace and bliss<sup>1</sup>, would treat me affectionately and kindly like one would treat a child when they hear my polite request and come to know of my noble wishes<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 14-c)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just like the swan that loves to dwell in a lake that has clean water and shuns ordinary lakes with dirty water, saintly poets and holy men find immense peace when they remain submerged in the thoughts of Lord Ram, meditating and contemplating upon the Lord by means of reading, listening to and reciting the holy story of Lord Ram. This immensely pure and holy story is like a symbolic lake in which such pious souls live.

The glories of Ram Charit Manas have been enumerated in Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32; and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 35—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 38 where it has been compared to a fine fresh-water lake.

सो०. बंदउँ मुनि पद कंजु रामायन जेहिं निरमयउ ।

सखर सुकोमल मंजु दोष रहित दूषन सहित ॥ १४ ( घ ) ॥

sōraṭhā.

banda'um̐ muni pada kan̐ju rāmāyana jēhiṁ niramaya'u.
sakhara sukōmala man̐ju dōṣa rahita dūṣana sahita. 14 (d).

Once again, I pay my respects and worship the holy lotus-like feet of the sage (or sages) who have composed the holy story of Lord Ram that is known universally as the 'Ramayana'<sup>1</sup>.

The story of the Ramayana is inherently beautiful and charming, pleasing for the mind and comforting for the heart, inspite of it having some 'Khar' qualities in it which seem unpleasant and unsavoury at face value (which is a reference to the inclusion of the episode of demon 'Khar', a cousin of the demon king Ravana, from whom this fault derives its name).

Likewise, the Ramayana is immaculate and without any faults present in it that may corrupt or pollute its inherent purity and fineness inspite of it having some instances that give a superficial impression of impurity (such as the presence of the demon 'Dushan' who gives his name to this fault, and other similar instances that make it appear that this story lacks holiness and divinity in it)<sup>2</sup>. (Sortha no. 14-d)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas has not specifically mentioned any sage here by name, but in all probability he refers both to sage Valmiki and sage Veda Vyas. This is because both these sages were exceptionally enlightened and both have composed the Ramayana; the Ramayana written by them has formed the foundation upon which Tulsidas has build his own story. It is believed that Tulsidas has drawn the story from Valmiki's Ramayana, and the metaphysical philosophy from Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan.

<sup>2</sup>Here Tulsidas is playing on the words 'Khar' and 'Dushan'. The word 'Khar' refers to something that lacks smoothness, is rough, coarse, dry and lacking in fine quality; the word 'Dushan' refers to something that has many faults and shortcomings in it; something that is corrupted and polluted, making it unpleasant, uncomfortable and thorny. These two words are also the names of two demon brothers who were as brave and invincible as Ravana, the king of Lanka, and equally cruel and ruthless. They were killed in a fierce battle with Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 18—Doha no. 20-a; and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 23.

The idea is that though the story of the Ramayana often times appear to be a tale of a great prince and not of the Supreme Being as it includes many instances of events in the life of Lord Ram that seem most humdrum and worldly, having no or little bearing with Lord Ram's divinity and holiness, or convey any spiritual and metaphysical message that could apparently benefit the reader, yet all such things are but inconsequential diversions and they do not rob the Ramayana of its sublime beauty.

Instances of some such events that give the otherwise holy story of Lord Ram the contours of worldliness and stand as obstructions in the smoothness and spiritual beauty of the story of the Ramayana are many, giving the impression that it is a story of a prince of Ayodhya who was sent to forest due to some family feud, such as the bloody battles fought by Lord Ram and extensively described in it, and the narration of the cruelty perpetrated by the demons, and many other events that give the general impression that it is merely a tale of some ancient prince who got entangled in family dispute and wrangling over the throne due to which he was ousted by his father and exiled to the forest where his wife was stolen by demons whom he fought to retrieve his lost wife, being a fable of fantasy and mythology and fertile imagination. But these prickly thorns do not rob or affect the natural spiritual beauty and the inherent charm of the story of Ramayana, nor does it in any way tamper with its spiritual message and the metaphysical principles that it preaches for the general good of mankind.

This is why it is found attractive by wise, enlightened, erudite and sagacious sages and saints as they are able to see below the surface by diving deep into it and finding pearls of wisdom embedded throughout its text, enabling them to discard the useless and accept the worthy things in it. This is also why they are compared to a 'swan' because it is said that a swan would drink pure milk and leave alone its adulterants, and also because it can pick up pearls and discard other gems even if they are all mixed up in a bowl.

Another interpretation of the use of the words 'Khar' and 'Dushan' is that even as Lord Ram had physically eliminated the two demons Khar and Dushan in the story of the Ramayana, all the apparent faults and shortcomings in this story, as well as those that pertain to its composition, are taken care of by the simple fact that it has the holy name of the Lord incorporated in it, because the Ramayana is dedicated to Lord Ram and honouring him, that it praises the Lord's glories and extols his virtues, that it narrates the divinity and holiness of the Supreme Being in the human form of Lord Ram, that it provides an easy gateway to spiritual bliss, joy, happiness and peace for the devotees of the Lord, that it shows such devotees the easy and simple path of Bhakti (meaning, inter alia, devotion, submission, service, love, affection, worship, and all such spiritual practices that brings the devotee closer to his Lord God) which can hand-hold them towards their spiritual goal of attaining liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation.

To wit, all drawbacks and shortcomings that may be cited by critics vis-à-vis the technical aspects of composition of this poem or its contents that seem to pertain to the gross, mortal and mundane world are taken care of when wise and learned poets take into consideration its one stellar beauty and one singularly unique quality—which is that the Ramayana is dedicated to Lord Ram, the manifested form of the Lord God, and it is devoted to the singing of the Lord's glories, divinity and holiness, and nothing else at all.

So therefore, even if it seems to lack any succulence, flavour and beauty with respect to its poetical quality from the perspective of poems related to this gross world, it is more than compensated, and rather better positioned and raised to a high pedestal, making it the most praise worthy poem ever composed, by the sublimity, succulence and beauty of its spiritual message as well as the holiness of its subject matter.]

[Tulsidas says—] I also pay my respects to the four Vedas (primary scriptures) which act like a sturdy ship to help a person go across the vast ocean represented by existence in this gross mortal world<sup>1</sup>. The Vedas never tire of singing the extensive glories of Lord Ram, the exalted Lord of the Raghus (because they find immense pleasure in it). (Sortha no. 14-e)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Vedas are repository of wisdom and knowledge. For a creature who is trapped in the whirlpool of transmigration, there is no better source of guidance than the Vedas as they prescribe many methods by which a creature can find deliverance from this endless churning of his soul in this whirlpool. The creature can select the method best suited to his needs based on his temperament and abilities to follow the chosen path.

One such easy method prescribed in the Vedas is to have devotion, love and affection for Lord God, to serve him, to sing the Lord's glories and worship him, to submit oneself before him, and many other similar paths that are easy to follow.]

I also worship the dust of the holy feet of the creator Brahma, the Lord who created this vast world which is like an endless ocean (of transmigration), for it is from this symbolic ocean that he produced saints, who are like a moon (that provides comfort and solace to tormented souls by its soothing, cool and calm rays) and a source of Amrit (the nectar of bliss and joy), as well as the wicked people who are like the intoxicating wine and the scorching poison that too were produced from the same ocean. (Sortha no. 14-f)

[Note—According to the Purans, the celestial ocean was once churned by the gods and the demons. Among other things, it produced the moon, the nectar, wine and poison. In this verse, saintly persons are likened to the moon and the nectar as they give comfort to the world and create a positive effect by their presence. On the other hand, the wicked and evil persons are compared to the wine and the poison which only create suffering and cause misery all around wherever they are present.]

Once again, I bow before goddess Saraswati (Sarada), the patron goddess of knowledge, understanding, wisdom and speech<sup>1</sup>, and the holy river Ganges, known as the ‘river of the gods’<sup>2</sup>—for both of them are immaculate in their virtues and their glories are profound. (1)

It is because while one (i.e. the holy river Ganges) washes away sins by taking a bath (or dipping) in its holy waters and sipping it with due reverence, the other (goddess Saraswati) eliminates the darkness of ignorance and delusions when she reveals herself in the form of refined words of wisdom that are spoken and heard in this world (as she purifies the mind and the intellect of the speaker as well as the listener, so that both of them are blessed with wisdom and enlightenment)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

The story of ‘the river of the gods, i.e. river Ganges, and how it descended from heaven to earth, was narrated by sage Vishwamitra to Lord Ram while going to Janakpur from his hermitage. We shall also narrate it when we come to that episode in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 212.

<sup>3</sup>Tulsidas pays his homage to both Saraswati and Ganges before starting to narrate the story of Lord Ram in his epic poem known as ‘Ram Charit Manas’ to invoke their blessings and seek their patronage, because (a) Saraswati would bless him with a purified mind and intellect that are fine tuned to meet his needs, as these instruments of the mind and the intellect are absolutely essential for the work he is about to undertake, which is of writing the holy story of Lord Ram with its profound spiritual and metaphysical message, a task that is not an easy job by any count, and (b) Ganges would clean his body and keep him refreshed and energized for this enormously huge task.

Blessings of Saraswati and Ganges are needed because when the mind and body are fresh and free from worldly problems, such as worries and diseases, a man works with high spirit and immense enthusiasm; for otherwise he would be bogged down by countless forms of distractions that would sap his energy and undermine his zeal in any kind of work in which he engages himself.

The subtle idea in this invocation is that though goddess Saraswati and holy river Ganges would help everyone who come to them, for Saraswati enables the mind to work and the tongue to speak, and river Ganges would clean anything put in its waters for washing, but such functions are merely their mundane worldly obligations that they fulfill as a matter of routine, without taking any personal interest in them. To wit, Saraswati enables a person to speak, write and think on all sorts of worldly matters, and water of the Ganges washes dirty clothes of the washer-man as well as household utensils of people living along its banks. But such humdrum and mundane activities serve no worthwhile purpose for the long term spiritual good of the world.

The real worth of Saraswati is proved when a seeker approaches the goddess and asks her to bless him with a purified mind and the intellect so that he can acquire refined wisdom and enlightenment that would enable him to see the Truth and Reality by overcoming the profound darkness of ignorance and delusions that had hitherto cloaked him. With the newly acquired wisdom and enlightenment, this wise seeker would then speak good words and give wise advice to other less fortunate creatures by showing them the light of truth and wisdom, that would in turn remove the darkness of ignorance and delusions from their path so that they themselves can see the reality and understand the truth, which would in turn enable them to walk steadily forward to attain the spiritual goal of their lives.

Similarly, the real spiritual benefit of river Ganges is when one takes a bath in it and sips its water with the faith that it has a mystical ability to clean his inner being from all sorts of faults, which are invisible forms of sins that may have tainted his Atma, or soul. This conviction has a profound impact on his psyche, for now he feels free of the hidden burden on his conscience so much so that he acquires a sprint in his steps as he steps out of the water a changed and cleaned man. But this will work only if he vows not to do any wrong deed again, and promise to lead a pious life. Otherwise it's back to square one again the next day.

To wit, Tulsidas invokes the blessings of Saraswati and Ganges to enable him with a refined mind and a wise intellect on the one hand, and a healthy body and soul on the other hand respectively.]

sēvaka svāmi sakhā siya pī kē. hita nirupadhi saba bidhi tulasī kē. 4.

I bow before Lord Mahesh and his consort goddess Bhavani (i.e. Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati) who are like a Guru (teacher, guide and preceptor) as well as like a father and a mother for me<sup>1</sup>.

Verily indeed I prostrate myself before the holy couple (i.e. Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati) for they are a friend of the distressed and the lowly, and most gracious granter of wishes of the devotee. (3)

Forsooth and without gainsay, Lord Shiva is a loyal devotee and a friend of Lord Ram, the dear husband of Sita (siya pī kē). Nay, not only that, Lord Shiva is revered and worshipped by Lord Ram as his preferred Lord and Deity<sup>2</sup>.

Verily indeed, the Lord (Shiva) is always most favourably inclined to his servant Tulsidas of whose good the Lord always thinks and takes care of, for the Lord is his benefactor in every way<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sholka line no. 3 that precedes Sortha no. 1. Here we have already read that Tulsidas has paid his respects to Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani at the very beginning of the book.

Lord Shiva and Bhavani are also honoured as the Father and Mother of this world in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103.

Lord Shiva is revered as the Guru of this creation in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 111.

Meanwhile, Tulsidas owes his special gratitude to them because the story of Lord Ram which he is about to narrate, the divine story known as ‘Ram Charit Manas’, was originally conceived by Lord Shiva and narrated first to his consort Uma or Parvati, the other names of Bhavani—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.

A Guru is a wise and enlightened person who shows the right path to a seeker of Truth. So, Tulsidas treats the holy couple, Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati, as his Guru as they have shown light to the story of Lord Ram in a way that would benefit the world from a spiritual angle, and this light also helped Tulsidas to see for himself what kind of story of Lord Ram he is expected to tell the world. There were many variations of the Ramayana extant at that time, but Tulsidas chose to narrate the version of the Ramayana that Lord Shiva told Parvati. Since it was a conversation between Lord Shiva and goddess Parvati, Tulsidas uses the term ‘Guru’ to mean both.

In a way, Ram Charit Manas is a revelation of a divine story of Lord Ram by way of a question asked by Parvati and answered by Lord Shiva much on the pattern of the Upanishads wherein a disciple asks his learned Guru some profound metaphysical question to which the teacher replies in detail, and this reply becomes the Upanishad. From this perspective, the narrative of Tulsidas would be no less than a Upanishad on the spiritual philosophy behind the story of Lord Ram, especially because it was conceived and revealed by no other than Lord Shiva who is honoured by the epithet of ‘Maha-Deva’, meaning the Great God renowned for his wisdom, enlightenment, self-realisation and spiritual achievements.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram worships Lord Shiva, and Lord Shiva also worships Lord Ram. That is why when Lord Ram established the Lingam of Shiva, the Lord’s icon, on the shores of the ocean before stepping on the bridge to go to Lanka, he had addressed Lord Shiva as ‘Rameshwar’, having a dual meaning: for it means ‘The Lord whom Ram worships’ as well as ‘The Lord who worships Ram’. At that time, Lord Ram had made it clear that if anyone wishes to attain him and have devotion for him, then he must first worship Lord Shiva and seek his blessings. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 3.

Later on, while addressing the citizens of Ayodhya, Lord Ram has once again reiterated this principle in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 45—that without having devotion for Lord Shiva and worshipping him, one cannot fully honour Lord Ram and attain him.

Refer also to the following verses that show Lord Shiva treats Lord Ram as his Lord God: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 50; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51; (iii) Chaupai line nos.

1-5 that precede Doha no. 77; (iv) Doha no. 116; (v) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 119.

The following verses show the mutual respect that Lord Ram and Lord Shiva have for each other: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precedes Doha no. 104.

Lord Ram had worshipped Lord Shiva on the banks of river Ganges while on his way to the forest in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 103.

<sup>3</sup>Tulsidas has already honoured Lord Shiva by addressing him as his Father and Guru; a father and guru are surely expected to be very favourably inclined towards their ward, a son and a disciple respectively. Further, Tulsidas is himself a great devotee of Lord Ram, and he is about to narrate the divine story of his beloved Lord, so therefore it is natural that Lord Shiva would shower his blessings on him, more so because Tulsidas gives due credit to Shiva as the creator of this story and says that he is narrating the same story which Lord Shiva had told Uma. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 31.

So now Tulsidas fulfills the mandate of Lord Ram by saying that he holds Lord Shiva in great reverence, honours him as his father and guru, and to Lord Shiva he always would remain obliged for his grace and kindness for authorizing him to tell the divine story of Lord Ram that the Lord had told his consort Bhavani in some ancient time.]

anamila ākhara aratha na jāpū. pragaṭa prabhā'u mahēsa pratāpū. 6.

Seeing the miserable spiritual condition of the creatures of the world during the age of Kaliyug (when they find no hope of salvation and emancipation as true spiritual knowledge eludes them, and the path to deliverance has been darkened by delusions and ignorance as well as the prevalence of countless false doctrines and religious philosophies hawked by as many preachers), Lord Har (Shiva) and his divine consort Girija (Parvati or Uma or Bhavani) devised a simple Mantra (a spiritual formula or device) for their well-being and welfare by stringing a series of words and phrases into a motley series of network of verses which may not have any apparently coherent meaning and beauty a poem ought to possess, nor can they be used to do Japa (repetition of a holy Mantra for meditation purposes)—yet taken in their entirety, these words reveal the mystical power of Lord Shiva as they would enable the humble creature to derive spiritual bliss, peace, joy and happiness by reading and listening to it. (5-6)

[Note—Tulsidas clearly refers to Ram Charit Manas here. He is pre-empting any viral criticism of his composition by experts of poetry by saying that though it may not stand scrutiny in terms of passing muster of any poetical scale of judgment with regard to beauty, meaning and perfection of grammar in a composition, yet it must not be forgotten that this composition is revealed by Lord Shiva himself for the benefit of mankind, and it is meant for the common man who may not have much knowledge of poetry or its fine qualities, nor is he bothered about them either, for he is so miserable and fatigued by his daily toil in this mundane world that he has no time for such things, as his only immediate concern is to find an easy way out of his torments so that he can find peace and rest for himself and his soul.

This purpose is taken care of and well served by Ram Charit Manas, notwithstanding its other shortcomings and faults, for it has Lord Ram's holy name in it and it narrates the divine story of Lord Ram in a simple language understood by the common man as it is in the vernacular.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 10; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 27; and (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Doha no. 103 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 130. In all these verses, the idea expressed in the present verses is reiterated.

What is a “sābara mantra”? It refers to a group of letters, syllables or words that have no meaning, are esoteric in nature, and are usually employed in occult practices and secret forms of worship. Tulsidas here means that for some his composition may seem ridiculous and professing some occult form of worship. But it is not at all so, for it advocates devotion for Lord Ram and praises the latter's holy name and glory as done by Lord Shiva himself. Hence, it is a holy composition of immense spiritual value, and not something to be looked down upon as being a dark form of some secret religious text.

Tulsidas says that the words used in his narrative “can't be used in Japa”; why? It is because a Mantra that one would use for doing Japa ought to be short, crisp and straightforward, and not a long winding narrative as this story of Lord Ram is.

Yet it has the secret key to this Mantra: and what is it? It professes that the holy name of Lord Ram, which it incorporates intricately in its text, is that supreme Mantra used for doing Japa, for Lord Ram's holy name is the famed ‘Tarak Mantra’ which grants deliverance to the soul of a creature. Refer: (a) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 10 herein above; and (b) Ram Rahasya and Ram Tapini Upanishads which elaborately expound on this principle.]

That Lord Shiva (“umēsa”; the Lord of Uma), who is kind upon me and is my benefactor, would therefore grace my composition so that it becomes a fountainhead of spiritual bliss and joy, as well as acquire basic natural beauty and charm. (7)

So therefore now, by seeking Lord Shiva and his divine consort's grace and benevolence, and invoking their blessings, I would endeavour to start narrating the holy story of Lord Ram with a cheerful mind and an enthusiastic spirit. (8)

[Note—Tulsidas has called Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani has his Parents and Guru in Chaupai line no. 3 herein above. So now he once again offers his respects to them as he would do to his worldly parent and guru before starting any enterprise, for it is by their blessings that one succeeds in one's efforts.]

By the grace of Lord Shiva, my words would shine with such beauty and charm as the moon shines in the night in the company of stars, making the otherwise dark and foreboding night look exceptionally charming and peaceful<sup>1</sup>. (9)

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, those who would narrate and listen to this divine, holy and auspicious story of Lord Ram carefully, with due affection and paying attention to its details, who would be alert enough to understand its sublime meaning and comprehend its subtle message (both metaphysical as well as spiritual)<sup>2</sup> (10),---

---Such persons would surely develop affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram; they would be freed from the many sins and faults inherent in Kaliyug, and would become eligible to get the reward of auspiciousness and spiritual merit (that would come to them automatically)<sup>3</sup>.* (11)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this metaphor, Lord Shiva's grace is like the rays of the full moon, the grace of other gods is like the many stars that cover the sky in the night, and the peace and bliss that one derives in such a tranquil atmosphere of the night while enjoying the soothing rays of the moon is like the peace and bliss one would get by reading and listening to the story of Ram Charit Manas in the words of Lord Shiva repeated by Tulsidas.

The 'moon' is selected for this comparison instead of the 'sun' because thought the sun is definitely brighter as compared to the moon, yet its rays are not as soothing and comforting as those of the moon, for at noon the sun scorches, but the moon never does it even when it is right overhead in the sky.

*Verse no. 10-11 can be read in another way also as follows: “Those who hear this (glorious, divine, sacred and holy) story of Lord Ram attentively, and who narrate or recite it wisely and intelligently, with great affection, devotion, belief and faith (in their heart and mind) (10)—such persons would surely be able to free themselves from all the terrible sins and their attendant horrifying consequences that are a common feature in the evil era of Kaliyug, would be able to purge all impurities from their inner-self, and would be naturally spiritually blessed with the development of steady devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram (11).”]

[Tulsidas has now emphasized that he is sure that Lord Shiva and his divine consort known as Gauri are pleased with him when he says—]

I say with great conviction that if I am right that Lord Shiva and his divine consort goddess Gauri is pleased with me, then let them bless me and make my poem acquire the qualities and virtues I have mentioned herein above come true! (Doha no. 15)

[Note—And what are the qualities and virtues that Tulsidas refer to? In this context, refer to Chaupai line nos. 9-11 that precede this Doha wherein he says that his poem would give spiritual bliss to the reader and the listener much like the soothing rays of the moon does to a tormented soul suffering from some grave emotional stress, free them from the miseries of life in Kaliyug, and pave the way for them to develop devotion and affection at the holy feet of Lord Ram, which in turn would give them spiritual merit and auspiciousness, and finally grant them beatitude and deliverance—for this composition of his has the holy name of Lord Ram in it, and the Lord's holy name is the panacea for all spiritual miseries that torment a creature in this mundane world. Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 10.]

Now, I offer my respects to the holy city of Ayodhya (where Lord Ram was born)<sup>1</sup> as well as to the holy river Saryu (which flows on the northern fringes of the city)<sup>2</sup> as both are very purifying and wash away the sins of Kaliyug (because of their holy aura and spiritual atmosphere)<sup>3</sup>. (1)

Next, I bow before the residents of Ayodhya, the males as well as the females, who are very fortunate as Lord Ram's affection for them is not of a small degree (i.e. the Lord's affection and grace for them is immense and beyond imagination)<sup>4</sup>. (2)

In sage Valmiki's Ramayana, the glories of Ayodhya and river Saryu are mentioned in Baal Kand, Canto 1, verse no. 24.

Their virtues and glories are also extolled in Skanda Puran, Vaishnav Khand, Ayodhya Mahatamya, Canto 12, verse nos. 27-32—which say: “The spiritual reward obtained by living in the pilgrim city of Kashi (Varanasi, the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva) for one thousand Manwantars (an exceptionally long period of time) is obtained by merely having a Darshan (reverential viewing) of river Saryu even once with due reverence and faith. Similarly, the reward of living in Mathura (the birth place of Lord Krishna) for one Kalpa is obtained by having a Darshan of river Saryu. The spiritual reward got by bathing in river Ganges for sixty thousand years is obtained by living in Ayodhya for half a Pal (roughly half an hour; meaning a very short period of time).

In this Puran's Ayodhya Mahatamya, Canto 1, verse no. 62 it is said with regard to Ayodhya: “Ayodhya has a very sublime existence; it has no grossness associated with this mortal world because it is not built on earth but is borne atop the discus of Lord Vishnu.”

According to the ancient classic known as 'Rudryaamal', it is said in its Ayodhya Mahatamya, Canto 30, verse no. 54 that there are seven holy cities, viz. Ayodhya, Mathura, Mayapura, Kashi (Varanasi), Kanchi and Avantika. All of them can grant Moksha (deliverance) to the creature, but amongst them Ayodhya stands at number one.

It ought to be noted here that the residents of Ayodhya who are being referred to here were those who lived during the time of Lord Ram, for they were pious and holy souls, free from corruption, pretensions, deceit, conceit, trickery and falsehood, and were followers of the laws of Dharma, i.e. who followed the principles of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, ethics, and nobility in thoughts and conduct. The sort of people whom Lord Ram loved and their characters have been enumerated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Doha no. 22.

But that was the age of Tretayug when Lord Ram was born, and not Kaliyug, the age of corruption and moral degradation. So surely therefore, it can be said with certainty, without any prejudice of the least kind or malice towards anyone whatsoever, that surely Lord Ram would have had no love for the sort of people who live now in Kaliyug.]

pragaṭē'u jaham' raghupati sasi cārū. bisva sukhada khala kamala tusārū. 5.

Lord Ram's affection for the subjects of his kingdom was so immense that he had not only forgiven one of them (the washer-man) who had committed a grave error or sin by casting unwarranted aspersions on the immaculate character of Sita<sup>1</sup>, the Lord's consort, but had also given him peace by granting him a place to live in heaven along with other noble citizens at the time when the Lord departed from this world and ascended to his holy abode. (3)

I bow before mother Kaushalya who symbolizes the eastern horizon<sup>2</sup>. Her fame and good name has spread over the whole world (as the mother of Lord Ram). (4)

For she gave birth to Lord Ram who is like the beautiful full moon that gives peace, comfort, joy and happiness to the world at large, and also causes the lotus representing the evil and the wicked to shrivel up and close its petals as if bitten by frost<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This incidence is narrated in detail in sage Veda Vyas' epic narration of the story of Lord Ram in his book 'Adhyatma Ramayan', Uttar Kand, Canto 4, verse nos. 29-53.

It is also likewise narrated in Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttar Kand, Canto 9, verse nos. 42-67 that say that every single individual of Ayodhya had left his body and went to heaven with Lord Ram at the time of his departure from this mortal world. It obviously includes that washer-man who had accused Sita of infidelity by casting doubts on her character. Lord Ram had not punished him for this absurd and incredulous insinuation by ordering him to be dragged over burning coal and roasted alive, as would have been the normal course of things for a king to do in today's world, but the gracious and forgiving Lord had allowed peace to prevail upon the accuser's soul.

<sup>2</sup>Though in verse no. 5 she is honoured for being the mother of Lord Ram who is likened to the moon, as the Lord grants peace, tranquility, bliss and solace to everyone in this world much in the same way as the full moon that provides comfort and peace to those who are emotionally upset, yet it can also be said that Kaushalya is compared to the eastern direction because it is where the sun rises, for she gave birth to Lord Ram who is like a sun rising in the east to show light to the whole world and remove the fear of darkness of night symbolized by all the miseries associated with mundane life characterized by dominance of delusions and ignorance that horrify the living being.

<sup>3</sup>Here, mother Kaushalya is likened to the eastern direction or horizon where the moon rises as she gave birth to Lord Ram, who is compared to the full moon as the advent of the Lord in this world gave immense comfort to tormented creatures suffering from the many miseries and problems associated with life in this gross mortal world.

Further, the moon is said to make the lotus close its petals as the latter feels shy in the presence of the former. This natural phenomenon is used to mean that wicked, unscrupulous and evil people withdrew and went into hiding when they learnt that Lord Ram had taken birth on this earth to tackle people like them just as the lotus flower closes its petals, and begins to brood and look dismayed when the moon rises in the eastern horizon and gradually ascends in the sky.

‘Bitten by frost’ implies that evil people were sore affright and stumped when they learnt that Lord Ram had taken birth to tackle people like them. They were stunned and dumbfounded out of their wits as they did not know how to react or what to do to save themselves from the Lord’s wrath.]

jinhahi biraci baṛa bhaya'u bidhātā. mahimā avadhi rāma pitu mātā. 8.

Regarding (mānī) king Dasrath (of Ayodhya, who was the worldly father of Lord Ram) and his queens<sup>1</sup> as blessed ones and embodiments of all meritorious virtues (for the simple reason that Lord Vishnu, the Lord God, had chosen to manifest himself in their household as Lord Ram), (6) ---

--- I bow my head before them and pay my respects in all possible ways, by my deeds, thoughts and words (karama mana bānī)—i.e. I am sincere in offering my obeisance to them all. Please be gracious upon me and bless me as if I were your child<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Verily indeed, even the creator Biranchi (Brahma) felt honoured by creating them (or occasioning their birth) for they would eventually become parents of Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Dasrath, the king of Ayodhya, had three chief queens, Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi. Kaushalya became the mother of Lord Ram, Sumitra of Laxman, and Kaikeyi of Bharat and Shatrughan. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 188 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 190; (iii) Doha no. 197 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it.

In one of his previous lives, Dasrath was known as Kashyap, and his chief queen Kaushalya was Aditi, the parents of the Gods, and Lord Vishnu had become their sons in order to fulfill their wishes—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 123; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 187.

In another life, so goes the story, Dasrath was known as Swayambhu Manu, and Kaushalya was his wife Satrupa, the first human parents from whom the rest of the creatures took birth. They had done severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to please Lord Vishnu, and when the Lord appeared before them and requested them to seek what they wished, the couple expressed their desire to have the Lord as their son, at which Lord Vishnu blessed them that it would be so in due course of time. Their story is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Doha no. 152.

The good luck and great fortune of Dasrath and his queens have been lauded by sage Vasistha too in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 294. Sage Vasistha was the royal priest of Ayodhya and believed to be the son of the creator Brahma—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50.

<sup>2</sup>This is why Tulsidas holds Dasrath and his queens in great reverence so much so that he treats them as his own parents too like they were parents of Lord Ram, the beloved Lord of Tulsidas whose holy story he is about to narrate. Thus, Tulsidas requests king Dasrath and his queens to bless him and treat him as their son, which means they should shower their blessing upon him like a parent would naturally do upon his or her child, especially when Tulsidas is about to write about their other son Lord Ram whom they loved so dearly much.

It is a remarkable and a wonderful thing for Tulsidas to do, to call himself as a son of Dasrath and his queens, for now he has virtually established a close kinship with Lord Ram himself, because they were the parents of Lord Ram too!

Further, this also ensures that Lord Ram will take a personal interest in Tulsidas' narrative as now he belongs to his own family, which is verily very true for Lord Ram loves all his devotees as belonging to an extended family of which the Lord himself is the head.

bichurata dīnadayāla priya tanu tṛna iva pariharē'u. 16.

I bow my head reverentially before the king of Ayodhya (i.e. king Dasrath) who had immense and abiding affection for Lord Ram and worshipped the Lord's feet so much that when he was forced to be separated from the Lord, who is eternally merciful towards the lowly and the humble, he (Dasrath) could not bear the grief of this separation from his beloved Lord, and as a consequence he discarded his mortal body like it was a worthless piece of grass. (Sortha no. 16)

[Note—Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 154—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 156 where the last moments of Dasrath are described in a very poignant manner.

Later on, sage Vasistha had lavishly praised Dasrath in a meeting held after his cremation: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 172—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 174.

In his previous life when Dasrath was known as Manu, he had done severe Tapa (rigorous penance and austerity) along with his wife Satrupa, and when Lord Vishnu blessed them that he would come to their household as their son in order to fulfill their wishes, Manu had asked the Lord that let it be so that his love for the Lord should never diminish even when he would become his son, because Manu feared that delusions would cast their long shadow on his wisdom and intellect so much so that there were fair chances he would forget that his son Ram was not a human child but the Supreme Being who has revealed himself in that form just in order to honour his wishes. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 149—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 151.

It is this reason why Dasrath died in grief on being separated from Lord Ram—as this was what he had wanted at the time he expressed his wishes before Lord Vishnu.

At the time of his death, Dasrath kept on repeating the holy name of Lord Ram, i.e. 'Raam-Raam', and this ensured his exalted place in heaven, for it is said that great sages and hermits spend their entire life doing penances and austerities but rarely Lord Ram is remembered by them at the time of death. In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 31 where we shall read in due course that the vulture Jatau has made this famous assertion.

We also read in Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 10 that “sages and hermits spend their lifetime in making all sorts of efforts to attain spiritual bliss and feel blessed by having a last glimpse of Lord Ram before dying, but the Lord rarely comes to them”. This affirmation of faith was made by Baali, the king of Kishkindha at the time of his death. And truly he was blessed by Lord Ram himself who sent him to his own abode in the heaven—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 10 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.

Even the demons who died uttering the holy name of Lord Ram became eligible for praise—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 45; and (ii) Doha no. 76.]

[After honouring the parents of Lord Ram, Tulsidas now pays his respects to Janak, the father-in-law of the Lord, and the father of Sita, the Lord's consort. It ought to be understood that both the kings, Dasrath and Janak, were equally fortunate and blessed, as the former was the worldly father of Lord Ram while the latter was the Lord's father-in-law. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 310; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 320.]

I bow my head to king Janak<sup>1</sup> along with all his family members, his close kith and kin as well as his associates<sup>2</sup>, as he had deep affection and reverence for the holy feet of Lord Ram. (1)

He was acclaimed for his great attainments in the field of Yoga (meditation) while enjoying the pleasures and comforts of this world, known as Bhoga (jōga bhōga). While doing so, he had successfully kept his affection and devotion for the Supreme Being a closely guarded secret, but this came out in the open when he saw Lord Ram, for then he became so extremely overwhelmed with emotions that he couldn't contain his secret love for the Lord any longer<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Janak was renowned for his renunciation, dispassion and enlightenment; he was a self-realised soul and an ardent practitioner of Yoga. Yet he lived life like a king lives, taking care of his kingdom and living amidst material comforts that naturally came to him by the virtue of his being a king of a great kingdom known as Janakpur. But inspite of being surrounded by worldly pleasures and material comforts, Janak maintained a safe distance from them at the subtle level of his Atma, his inner-self. This stellar quality in him, and the high sense of spiritual wisdom and erudition that he naturally had gave him the honour of being called 'Videha', i.e. a person who is so highly self-realised and enlightened that he remains immersed in the thoughts of the 'Self', which is pure Consciousness and separate from the gross body and the equally gross world, thereby making him oblivious of the external gross material world, which, for all practical purposes, he is deemed to have no awareness of, and this includes his own physical body. So therefore, such persons live in a state of perpetual 'Samadhi', a state of transcendental state of existence of consciousness which is trance-like. Such persons go about the affairs of life like ordinary people, but internally, at the subtle level of their consciousness know as the Atma, they are aloof from everything happening around them in the gross physical world, for they keep their mind and heart completely un-involved in and detached from what their body does; how this body acts and establishes its numerous contacts and relations with things of the world are none of their concern.

He was steeped in the knowledge of Brahm, the cosmic pure Consciousness, and deep knowledge in the field of spiritualism, metaphysics and theology. He used to organize huge congregation of the greatest sages and wise men of his time where debates on profound principles of metaphysics were held and winners rewarded. One such occasion forms the major part of Brihadaranyka Upanishad of the Shukla Yajur Veda tradition, where the debate is elaborately described in its Canto 3 with its 9 Brahmans. At the conclusion of this grand debate sage Yagyawalkya was declared the winner, and then we read in the next Canto 4 that Janak accepted the sage's discipleship after engaging him in a personal session of questions and answers on metaphysical questions.

To wit, Janak was no ordinary king, but an enlightened and self-realised soul who was a 'king' for the outside world, but an 'ascetic par excellence' when one became aware of his reality and true identity.

<sup>2</sup>The queen of Janak was Sunayana*. He had two daughters, Sita and Urmila. He had a younger brother named Kushdwaj or Kushketu, who also had two daughters, Mandavi and Srutkirti#. His Guru was Satanand$.

It so happened, as we shall read by and by, that Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman were taken by sage Vishwamitra to Janakpur to attend the bow-breaking ceremony which Janak was organizing to select a groom for his daughter Sita. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210.}

When king Janak came to know that the exalted sage has come a-visiting his kingdom, he went to meet and welcome the sage, and at that time he saw Lord Ram. The first sight of the Lord swept Janak off his feet, and for some moments the king virtually lost his bearings, for he forgot who he was, and that he ought to maintain neutrality when meeting a prince completely unknown to him. To wit, such was the dynamic magnetic charm of Lord Ram that he pulled the Atma, the true inner-self of king Janak towards himself just as a strong magnet would naturally do to iron. During this brief interaction, Janak has himself declared that though he had always practiced renunciation, dispassion and detachment, yet for once he finds himself at a loss for he does not understand why he is so attracted by Lord Ram, for surely there must be something deeper and more sublime in this affection that had so suddenly sprouted for the Lord in his heart than what meets the eye.]

[Next in line of receiving Tulsidas' respect are the three brothers of Lord Ram, i.e. Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan.]

I bow at the feet of Bharat first<sup>1</sup> (before other brothers of Lord Ram), whose adherence to the vows of good conduct and righteousness are matchless and beyond description. (3)

His Mana (mind and heart) has so intense affection for the holy lotus-like feet of Lord Ram that it never desires to move away from them and wishes to always remain immersed in the thought of worshipping them<sup>2</sup> just like the case of the bee that hovers over the lotus flower and thinks of nothing else but the nectar that it contains. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to another of Tulsidas' classical books called 'Vinai Patrika' where a prayer is dedicated to honour Bharat; refer its verse no. 39.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 197 where it is said that Bharat was so named because he was responsible for taking care of the daily needs of the world with respect to provision of supplies that are necessary for its sustenance and existential requirements.

However, some of the verses of Ram Charit Manas that we can cite here are the following:

(a) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 178—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 185: where Bharat has expressly refused to accept the crown of Ayodhya, saying that it rightly belongs to Lord Ram, and he is merely an obedient servant of the Lord whose only good lies in serving his Lord and not in unjustly usurping what belongs to Lord Ram. This assertion of Bharat immediately endeared him to the masses who lavishly praised him for his love and devotion for Lord Ram as well as for his sense of propriety, probity, morality and good conduct.

(b) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 205 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it: where Bharat has been praised by the presiding deity of Prayag, the holy site of the confluence of three holy rivers Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati.

(c) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 207—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 210: where sage Bharadwaj has lavished liberal praises for Bharat.

(d) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 231—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 233: where Bharat's immaculate character and his undiluted devotion for Lord Ram has been extolled by the gods as well as by Lord Ram himself.

(e) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 288—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 289: where king Janak has lauded Bharat and his exemplarily good virtues.

(f) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 295: where goddess Saraswati, the patron goddess of wisdom and knowledge, has herself praised Bharat and refused to delude his mind when the gods wanted her to intervene and somehow make Bharat relent from his determination to take Lord Ram back to Ayodhya from the forest.

(g) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 304 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it: where Lord Ram has expressed his deep respect for Bharat's purity of character.

(h) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 303—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 304: where there was general approbation for Bharat and immense appreciation for his noble conduct by one and all who were present in the meeting held in the forest to discuss Lord Ram's return to Ayodhya.

(i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 324—to Sortha no. 326: where the immensity of Bharat's devotion for Lord Ram and the matchlessness of his glories have been sung in flourishing language.

(j) And finally, in Lanka Kand, Doha no. 116 we read that Lord Ram has acknowledged the suffering Bharat was undergoing as a result of his separation from his beloved Lord, for the Lord says that when he remembers Bharat even a moment seems like an age for him, and therefore he should now hasten back to Ayodhya so as to reach it within the stipulated time by which he was supposed to return, for if a day passed more than that, then Bharat would surely die in grief.]

I offer my obeisance at the lotus-like feet (pada jalajātā) of Laxman who has a calm temperament, is charming to behold, and gives joy to devotees<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Verily indeed and in all sooth, his (Laxman's) fame (and support) acted as a sturdy staff (or a shaft) that holds aloft high the flag of Lord Ram's glories<sup>2</sup>. (6)

He (Laxman) is none else but Lord Sheshnath, the thousand-hooded celestial Serpent who holds the world aloft on his hoods (and prevents it from sinking into the bottomless abyss of the cosmos)<sup>3</sup>. The Lord had manifested in this world in order to remove the fears that Mother Earth was subjected to due to the tyranny unleashed by the demon<sup>4</sup>. (7)

I (Tulsidas) earnestly pray that Laxman—who is the son of Sumitra, an embodiment of all excellent virtues and goodness, and an ocean of mercy and kindness—be always favourable and munificent towards me; let Laxman be always pleased with me and be benevolent upon me. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Laxman was the son of queen Sumitra. At the time of his naming ceremony, sage Vasistha had named him 'Laxman' as he would be a treasury of all good virtues, greatly loved by Lord Ram, and one who is a support of the world in his primary form as Lord Sheshnath, the thousand-hooded celestial serpent who is said to hold this world on his hoods as stated in verse no. 7 herein below.

Laxman's love, affection and devotion for Lord Ram were no less than that of Bharat. For instance, when Lord Ram was about to go to the forest, Laxman sacrificed everything to accompany him: this episode is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 76.

He became extremely agitated whenever he observed that Lord Ram is worried, as is proved on one occasion when news arrived in the forest that Bharat was coming with a large army to meet the Lord. Laxman apprehended that Bharat had some ill intentions when he saw Lord Ram become pensive on hearing the news of Bharat's arrival. Laxman became ready to confront Bharat and defeat the whole army, though it turned out that Lord Ram was worried due to another reason, which was how would he muster courage to refuse Bharat's request to return home, given the fact that Bharat loved him so much that his request just can't be turned down out of hand. When, however, Lord Ram explained things to Laxman and praised Bharat, Laxman relented. This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 226—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 233.

Meanwhile, Lord Ram's love for Laxman was deep and unbound. During the war at Lanka when Laxman was gravely wounded by Meghanad's arrow and fell unconscious, Lord Ram had wailed and lamented for him most sorrowfully: refer—am Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Sortha no. 61 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-18 that precede it.

On the one hand Lord Ram loved Laxman and Sita and protected them both just like the eyes are protected by their lids, while on the other hand Laxman served Lord Ram and Sita as diligently and whole-heartedly as a passionate person serves his body and gratifies its desires—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 142.

Laxman was very lovely to behold by his physical appearance just as Lord Ram was—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 221; (ii) Doha no. 228 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it and Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that follow it.

When it is said “he gives joy to devotees” it means to his devotees as well as those who are devoted to Lord Ram.

When Sita was abducted by Ravana and Lord Ram was full of distress and on a verge of emotional breakdown, it was Laxman who gave him moral support and encouragement, motivating the Lord not to give up but to make efforts to find her—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 30. Had it not been for Laxman's support in such distressing times, Lord Ram would probably have sunk in a deep pit of grief for his lost wife from where he would have found it hard to climb back.

We also read that during the Lord's forest journey, Laxman had kept guard when Lord Ram and Sita slept during the night—and remember, it was not for one or two days or weeks, but for fourteen long years that Laxman never slept to protect Lord Ram. In this connection, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 89 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

When Lord Ram went to lie down to rest, Laxman would softly massage the feet of the Lord to give his tired legs comfort: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 226; and (b) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 89.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Doha no. 197; (b) Lanka Kand, (i) Doha no. 54 and 82; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4 that precedes Doha no. 77.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 187 where Lord Vishnu assures the gods and mother earth that he would manifest himself on earth as Lord Ram to remove the cause of their miseries and torments by eliminating the demons who had been tyrannizing them. For this purpose, the Lord said he will be accompanied by all his associates to help him. To wit, Seshnath is Lord Vishnu's companion in the sense that both take care of the world, Seshnath by supporting it from below and Vishnu by protecting it from all other sides.]

ripusūdana pada kamala namāmī. sūra susīla bharata anugāmī. 9.
mahābīra binava'um' hanumānā. rāma jāsu jasa āpa bakhānā. 10.

I bow my head (namāmī) at the lotus-like feet (pada kamala) of 'Ripusuduan'<sup>1</sup>, i.e. Shatrughan (the youngest brother of Lord Ram) who is very brave and valorous, extremely courteous and amiable by his nature, and a follower and constant companion of Bharat (his elder brother)<sup>2</sup>. (9)

Next, I pray to Hanuman who is most valiant, strong, powerful and brave, and whose glories and virtues even Lord Ram has extolled in lavish terms<sup>3</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word 'Ripusudan' means one who vanquishes his enemies. To wit, Shatrughan, his other name, also implies the same thing: one who crushes his enemies and proves most formidable for them. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 197.

<sup>2</sup>Shatrughan was the younger brother of Bharat. He always remained by Bharat's side, and during the long fourteen years of Lord Ram's forest sojourn when Bharat had led a life of a recluse and did not participate actively in the affairs of the kingdom, it was Shatrughan who stepped in and took control of the administrative affairs of Ayodhya—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precedes Doha no. 323.

No enemy dared to attack the kingdom by taking advantage of the absence of Lord Ram and Bharat's refusal to take the crown, which left the throne vacant and created a power vacuum, because it was Shatrughan's formidable reputation as the vanquisher and crusher of all enemies that kept all evil eyes, that might have been preying and prying upon the wealthy kingdom of Ayodhya, at bay.

Shatrughan always followed Bharat as a true friend and companion; wherever Bharat went Shatrughan followed him like a shadow: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Doha no. 187, 268; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 318.

It ought to be noted that all the brothers of Lord Ram has been praised by Tulsidas equally. The reason is that all the four brothers were born at the same time, their childhood days, education, growth into manhood, and their marriage—all were together, and they always stood side-by-side on all occasions. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 10.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram had affectionately embraced Hanuman and had told him on two occasions that he would ever remain indebted to him for the selfless service that he had rendered to the Lord—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 32—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 33 when Hanuman returned from Lanka after his successful mission to locate Sita; and (b) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 62 when he had brought the medicinal herb that saved the life of Laxman in the battle-field of Lanka.

Indeed, there is no one more fortunate than Hanuman whose devotion for Lord Ram and submission at the Lord's holy feet were profound, complete and exemplary so much so that even the Lord himself had praised him repeatedly for these virtues: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 50.

Angad had also praised Hanuman for his great fortune that he was able to selflessly serve Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 19.

Sita, the consort of Lord Ram, had affectionately addressed Hanuman as her dear son while he has called her his mother: for instance, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 13; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 14, amongst many other such verses.

Similarly, Lord Ram has too addressed Hanuman very affectionately by calling the latter his son: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 32.

In Tulsidas' classic known as 'Kavitawali Ramayan', Lord Ram had told Laxman to behold the spectacle unfolding on the battle-field of Lanka where a ferocious war was underway, where one could see Hanuman single-handedly leading the assault and trouncing the powerful demon army: apropos—Kavitawali, Lanka Kand, verse no. 40.

Hanuman's glories are praised in Tulsidas' book of prayers called 'Vinai Patrika', verse nos. 25-36.

Hanuman was Lord Ram's favourite messenger. The Lord had deputed him on many occasions to carry his message, such as when Hanuman was given the ring to be carried to Sita with Lord Ram's message#1, when he was sent to bring the herb to revive Laxman in the battle-field#2, when he was sent by the Lord to inform Sita that he has won the war and Ravaan was killed#3, when he was deputed to Ayodhya to inform Bharat about the Lord's safe return from the forest#4.

{#1Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 23.

#2Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 55 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.

#3Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 107.

#4Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 121.}

In Ram Charit Manas, Hanuman's courage, dare-devilry, valiance, strength and bravery have been repeatedly emphasized while narrating the many episodes of the war, for whenever someone was needed in times of crisis it was invariably Hanuman who was remembered, from the first wave of assault on Lanka till the end of the war. For instance, refer to Ram Charit Manas, (a) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 43 during the first wave of attack on the fort of Lanka; and (b) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 84 where even the mighty Ravana, the demon king, had praised the strength of arms and valour of Hanuman.

Hanuman had a colossus frame, like a huge mountain: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 30.

When he roared, the females of the demon race were so terrified that they aborted: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28.]

I bow my head reverentially before the son of the wind god, i.e. Hanuman, who was like a fierce fire for the forest symbolized by evil forces and wicked creatures<sup>1</sup>, who was extremely wise, prudent and intelligent<sup>2</sup>, and in whose heart-like home dwells Lord Ram holding a bow and arrow in his hands<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 17)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just as a fire can easily destroy a forest, Hanuman can also as easily overcome and eliminate all creatures who are wild, sinful, evil and wicked.

<sup>2</sup>Hanuman is exceptionally wise, prudent and intelligent, and he ranks first amongst enlightened souls. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Sholka line nos. 1-12 that precede Doha no. 1 in the very beginning of this Canto.

He was blessed by Sita to possess excellent virtues—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 17.

Hanuman's glories are lauded in Vinai Patrika, verse nos. 25-36.

<sup>3</sup>Hanuman had enshrined the image of Lord Ram in his heart; the Lord is depicted as holding a bow in one hand and an arrow in the other. These arms have a symbolic meaning, for they imply that the Lord is ready to protect his devotee at all times.]

banda'um̐ saba kē carana suhā'ē. adhama sarīra rāma jinha pā'ē. 2.

[Now, Tulsidas pays his homage to those who had served Lord Ram though they were most humble creatures. Why he does so is also explained by him in verse nos. 2-4.]

The Lord of the Kapis and the Bears (i.e. of the monkey and bear races, referring to Sugriv and Jamvant respectively), as well as the King of the demon race (here referring to both Ravana*, the king of the demon race, and his younger brother Vibhishan, who succeeded Ravana upon the throne of Lanka), along with Angad (the prince of the Kapis) and all the rest of members of the monkey and bear races<sup>1</sup>, (1) ---

--- I bow at the feet of them all as they were indeed worthy of immense respect by the virtue of the fact that inspite of having a lowly body they still had attained nearness with Lord Ram (by being able to serve the Lord personally from close quarters, and for this service the Lord had called them his friends, which is an exceptionally rare honour bestowed on them, for even great sages and ascetics who spend their lifetimes doing various religious practices fail to attain this exalted stature)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>All of them, including the ones specifically named here, such as Sugriv, Jamvant, Angad, Vibhishan etc., had served Lord Ram during the Lord's difficult days after his wife Sita was abducted by Ravana. The Lord had publicly acknowledged their service by calling all of them his dear friends—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 5-8 that precede Doha no. 8.

Refer also to Tulsidas' Book of Prayers, called Vinai Patrika, verse no. 166 (9).

<sup>2</sup>It must be remembered that Lord Ram was least concerned with the sort of physical body the creature had, for the Lord looked deeper into their heart and perceived what they thought and felt at the subtle level of their inner-self. The Lord, being the Supreme Being, knew that the gross outer body is not the true 'self' or 'identity' of the living being, but that it was his Atma, the soul, which was pure consciousness and the creature's truthful self and identity.

The Lord has unequivocally declared that the only relation he accepts is that of devotion for him—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 35; (ii) Doha no. 36 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-9 that precede it; and (b) Uttar Kand, (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 46; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 8-10 that precede Doha no. 86; and (v) Doha no. 87.

So therefore, let alone the monkeys, bears or demons, the Lord had shown his affection, grace and benediction upon everyone who came in touch with him. This fact is affirmed in the next verse nos. 4-5.

*Ravana, the king of the demon race and the elder brother of Vibhishan, is also included in the list of worthy souls who deserve respect in the sense outlined in the above discussion, for it cannot be denied that he too was accepted by Lord Ram when he died, because at the time of Ravana's death his soul had exited his demon-body in the form of a dazzling shaft of light and went directly to enter the body of Lord Ram—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 103. Had Ravana's 'true self', i.e. his Atma, his soul, been impure there was no question for Lord Ram accepting it and giving it final rest within his own holy body, for it must be remembered that Lord Ram was a personified form of Supreme Being known as the Parmatma, the Supreme Atma representing pure cosmic Consciousness. Hence, this merger of Ravana's Atma with the supreme cosmic Atma represented by Lord Ram obviously meant Ravana's 'Moksha', which is the final deliverance of the creature's soul when it attains emancipation and salvation by dissolving its independent identity by merging with the cosmic Soul known as pure Consciousness to become one with it.

Although Ravana has been reviled and despised as a villain throughout history for being a wicked demon who was extremely pervert and sinful, yet it cannot be denied that he was an enlightened soul who had become a demon by his body not due to his own fault but because in his previous life when he was a great king named Pratapbhaanu, he had fell in a trap laid by a king who was his enemy, who maneuvered things in such a cunning way that the unsuspecting Pratapbhaanu was cursed to become a demon by Brahmins. This entire story we shall be reading by-and-by in our book Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 152—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 176.

The point to note here is this that inspite of his misfortune, Ravana was nevertheless an enlightened soul and a great devotee of Lord Shiva, and that he had willingly created animosity with Lord Ram with the express intention of making sure that his soul, that was trapped in the evil body of a demon, could find its final freedom and deliverance: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 23.

Lord Ram had established an abiding friendship with Sugriv, the prince and later on the king of the monkey race, although he was not some great sage or enlightened soul but an ordinary creature born in the monkey race—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 4 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it.

Sugriv remained a close confidante of Lord Ram and one of his chief advisors from the very beginning of the search for Sita as well as during the war of Lanka: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, (a) Kishindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 21; (b) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 50; and (c) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 39.

Angad was Sugriv's nephew and one who had faithfully served Lord Ram, because his father, Baali, had entrusted Angad's future in the safe hands of Lord Ram at the time of his death: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chanda line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 10.

Angad had become very close to Lord Ram who took care of his safety and well-being, which even Angad had acknowledged: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 26.

Lord Ram had shown his immense trust in Angad when the latter was sent as an emissary to the court of Lanka to negotiate with Ravana and see if the ruinous war of Lanka could be avoided: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Sortha no. 17 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it.

Angad had so much faith in Lord Ram that he had staked Sita and the future of everything else by planting his legs in the court of Ravana and pledging that if anyone could move his legs then Lord Ram would deem to have lost Sita and return back: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 34.

Finally, when the Lord bid farewell to all his friends who had come with him from Lanka to attend his coronation ceremony in Ayodhya, he was particularly moved by Angad's devotion for him: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 18—to Doha no. 19.

Jamvant, meanwhile, was a the king of the bear race, and being the most senior member in the court of Kishkindha, he served as Lord Ram's senior advisor during the war of Lanka; he had also participated actively in the battles during the war: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 39 (a senior member of Lord Ram's war council); (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 55 (advise given to Lord Ram at the time of Laxman's injury during the war of Lanka); (iii) Doha no. 65 (confrontation with Kumbhakaran); (v) Chaupai line nos. 3-9 that precede Doha no. 74 (confrontation with Meghanad); and (vi) Chaupai line nos. 11-15 that precede Doha no. 98 (confrontation with Ravana).

Vibhishan too was a great devotee of Lord Ram from the very beginning, and later on he became a close friend and advisor of the Lord: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 177 (Vibhishan seeks devotion for Lord God when the creator Brahma came to grant him his wishes); (b) Sundar Kand, (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 6—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 8 (Hanuman's meeting with Vibhishan in Lanka); (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 50 (Vibhishan comes to submit himself before Lord Ram and is accepted by the Lord as his friend); (c) Lanka Kand, (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 106 (Vibhishan made the new king of Lanka by Lord Ram); (v) Line no. 1 of Doha no. 116-a (Lord Ram addresses Vibhishan as his 'son'), and (iv) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 117 (where, among other places, Lord Ram calls Vibhishan as his 'friend').

Lord Ram has expressly stated that whether a person is a male or a female or even a eunuch is of no matter for him, but if anyone worships him then that person is very dear to him—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 87. And—serving the Lord in any way is indeed a form of worship offered to him. So therefore, these Kapis and Bears as well as Vibhishan, the king of the demon race who succeeded his brother Ravana to the throne of Lanka, were worshipping Lord Ram when they served him at a time when the Lord was alone and needed help in finding Sita and rescuing her from the clutches of her abductor, the demon king Ravana.]

--- I (Tulsidas) pay my deep respects and give obeisance to all of them by bowing my head at the feet of all those who are devoted to Lord Ram and selflessly serve the Lord<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the only criterion for a creature to deserve any respect, according to Tulsidas, is the virtue of devotion and service to Lord Ram that the creature practices in his or her life. Even Lord Ram endorses this principle—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 87.

The whole word, both the animate world consisting of the animal kingdom and the plant kingdom, from the most exalted of sages to the most humble of creatures, from citizens of Ayodhya to the strangers traveling on the road, the birds of the sky to the water-dwelling creatures#, as well as the inanimate world consisting of the gross elements such as the earth, the rivers and streams, the mountains and hills, the trees and shrubs and plants of all denominations, the meadows and valleys$—to wit, all felt most fortunate, blessed and fulfilled by their contact with Lord Ram and the opportunity to have a divine sight of the Lord—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, (a) $Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 135—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 139; (b) #Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 4 (where we read that countless marine creatures came to the surface to have a sight of Lord Ram and his army as they crossed the mighty bridge across the ocean to Lanka).

Refer also to Tulsidas' Book of Prayers, called Vinai Patrika, verse no. 166 (10).

<sup>2</sup>To wit, Lord Ram has expressly stated that whether a person is a male or a female or even a eunuch is of no matter for him, but if anyone worships him then that person is very dear to him—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 87.

Lord Ram considers only one criterion to judge a creature, to see if that individual is eligible to receive the Lord's grace, benevolence and favour—and this criterion is 'devotion'. There are ample instances of verses that reiterate this principle; some of the examples are the following: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 78; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 85; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 8-10 that precede Doha no. 86; (iv) Doha no. 87 along with Chaupai line no. 7-8 that precede it.

The fact that even those with a lowly birth had been fortunate to be accepted by Lord Ram has many instances in the story of the Ramayana. Some specific references are the following:

The Lord had embraced and established friendship with Nishad and Kewat, both belonging to low castes of the boatmen tribe and those who had fishing as their main occupation—Ram Charit Manas, (a) Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 88; (ii) Doha no. 102 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it; (b) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 20.

Lord Ram had shown his affection to the forest-dwelling tribes known as Kol and Kiraat: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 135—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 137.

Lord Ram's grace and benevolence were showered even on a flesh-eating vulture whose name was called Jatau so much so that the Lord not only granted his soul emancipation and salvation but also performed last rites as he would have done for his own worldly father Dasrath—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 32.

Another example made famous by the Ram Charit Manas is that of the saintly crow named Kaagbhusund who was also blessed by Lord Ram: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 85.

We also have the example of the out-caste woman named Sabari whose fruit offerings were accepted by Lord Ram who enjoyed eating this refreshment to oblige her, and then the Lord also performed her last rites as if she was his mother: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, (i) Doha no. 34; (ii) Doha no. 36 along with Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede it.

The saintly crow Kaagbhusund has affirmed that the best way a creature can put his gross body to some positive use in this life, that would be helpful for the good of his soul, is to motivate it to have devotion for Lord Ram, who was the Supreme Being himself personified, for otherwise if a creature allows his body to remain engrossed in the affairs of this mundane, perishable world of material objects, seeking sense gratifications and yearning for worldly objects, then that life and body will be deemed to have been wasted, and no worthwhile gain made whatsoever: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 95—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 96; and (ii) Doha no. 114-a.]

--- Verily, I bow before them all by putting my head on the ground at their feet, with a prayer that they should treat me as their humble servant and grant me their blessing and patronage (so that I can succeed in my noble and holy efforts to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram without facing any hurdles). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Suka had a body of a parrot; he was the son of the legendary seer and sage Veda Vyas who had classified the Vedas and the Upanishads, as well as written the Purans.

Sage Suka, also known as 'Shukdeo', was highly respected and was born of the celestial maiden named Ghrataachi when she had taken the form of a parrot, called Shuka in Sanskrit, to produce Shukdeo. He had his education under the expert guidance of his father Veda Vyas (refer Maho-panishad of Sam Veda, Canto 2, verse nos. 1-20, and the entire Rudra Hridaya Upanishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition). He was fortunate enough to have as his wise Guru (moral preceptor and teacher) the legendary king Janak, the father of Sita of the Ramayan fame and the most self-realised and enlightened king of his time (refer Maho-panishad of Sam Veda, Canto 2, verse nos. 28-77) and Lord Shiva himself (refer Shuk Rahasya Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda which was preached by Lord Shiva to Shukdeo).

His self-restraint was so profound that the celestial Apsara, the dancing damsel of the court of Indra, the king of Gods, failed to trap him in her honey-trap of lust and passions. Shukdeo learnt the epic Bhagvata Mahapurana from his father and then narrated it to Parikshit at the culmination of the Dwapar Yug (the third era of the four-era celestial cycle of mythology) and the beginning of the present era called Kali Yug. In an incident narrated in Maho-panishad, Canto 2, verse nos. 21-27 it is described how sage Shukdeo had to wait for twenty-one days before king Janak granted him an audience to test his self control over anger, ego and self-pride of being a son of an enlightened father of the stature of sage Veda Vyas as well as his sincerity and steadfastness of purpose which are important virtues that must be present in a student of spiritualism and important criterion by which his eligibility as a disciple can be judged.

The Tejobindu Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda describes him as a truly Brahm-realised sage along with sage Sankaadi in its Canto 1, verse no. 47.

Shukdeo learnt the epic Bhagvata Mahapurana from his father and then narrated it to Parikshit at the culmination of the Dwapar Yug (the third era of the four-era celestial cycle of Hindu mythology) and the beginning of the present era called Kali Yug (which is the last of the four-Yug cycle).

The Sharva Upanishad of Atharva Veda, in its verse no. 22 stresses the greatness of Lord Shiva known as Maheshwar by saying that even such great sage as Shukdeo had praised and prayed to the Lord, implying that if Shukdeo had worshipped Shiva then the latter must surely be a great Lord.

<sup>2</sup>Sages Sankaadi: Sanatkumar and other celestial sages are collectively called Sankaadi Rishis. Sage Sanatkumar is considered as one of the four Manas Putras or the mental-born sons of the creator Brahma. The other three are Sanak, Sanat-sujaat and Sanandan. They are regarded in a perpetual state of boyhood.

Sanatkumar had taught the greatness of Vishnu to demon Vrittaasur, the enemy of Indra, the king of Gods. He also taught spiritual wisdom to sage Narad, the celestial sage.

Sanat-sujaat taught spiritual wisdom to Dhritrashtra who was the blind father of the Kauravas of the epic Mahabharat fame. Sanak is said to an eternal companion of Lord Vishnu. Sanandan is regarded as the ancient preacher of the Sankhya Shastra, even more ancient than Kapil.

Sanatkumar, along with sages Pippalaad and Angira, had approached sage Atharva to ask him about the highest form of meditation, the different aspects of OM and the culmination of spiritual journey by realising Brahm in the form of Shambhu, one of the names of Lord Shiva, in Atharva Veda's Atharva-shikha Upanishad.

It is narrated in the Brihajjabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, in its Brahman 7, verse no. 8, that he had gone to Lord Kalagnirudra, one of the forms of Lord Shiva and who had first revealed this Upanishad to one sage Bhusund (Brahmans 1-6) to learn about the metaphysical importance and spiritual value of the Rudraksha beads. [Rudraksha beads are the seeds of the tree Eleocarpus ganitrus.]

According to Kalagni Rudra Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, Sanatkumar was taught how to wear the Tripundra, the three lines marked on the forehead of all Hindus, by Lord Kalagnirudra himself.

The Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, in its verse no. 22 stresses the greatness of Lord Shiva known as Maheshwar by saying that even such great sages as Sankadi and Sanatsujat (i.e. sages Sanatkumar and others collectively called the Sankaadi Rishis) had praised and prayed to the Lord, implying that if these great sages had worshipped Shiva then the latter must surely be a great Lord.

<sup>3</sup>Sage Narad: The celestial sage Narad is said to be a manifestation of the Supreme Being's Mana (mind and its thoughts, intentions, hopes, desires and wishes, as well as the heart and its emotions and sentiments). The Supreme Being implements his wishes and expresses his intentions and wishes by making Narad his spokesperson. Purans list uncountable instances when Narad has approached people—both the good and righteous as well as the demonic and unrighteous ones—to tell them the path best suited to them, and the wise ones treated this advise as the Lord's wish while the unwise ones still benefited from it because Narad's intention was always to turn a living being away from his sinful ways and lead him towards the good.

Since he is a personified Mana, he is as fickle, unstable and transient as the Mana—never staying at one place for more than a fleeting moment, always roaming here and there in the entire creation, having nothing to stop his path as he could go anywhere he wished. And the remarkable thing is that he was never unwelcome anywhere—even the demons welcomed him with the same respect as did the Gods.

It is believed that he is born in each Kalpa to carry out the wishes of the Supreme Being. [1 Kalpa is equivalent to 4.32 billion human years.] He was a Gandharva (a semi-God who is a celestial musician) named Upbarhan in the previous Kalpa. He was physically very charming and an expert musician. Once he showed his amorous intentions towards Urvashi, a celestial dancer, in the presence of Brahma the creator where he was supposed to show exemplary restraint, and this overt show of lust resulted in his being cursed by Brahma that he would become fallen and take birth in the mortal world as a Shudra (a low caste). So, he was born from a maid servant of low caste working as a devoted servant of a learned Brahmin. Under the constant companion of this great Brahmin, Narad developed noble and auspicious virtues in him even though he was a mere child of five years. He was very modest, devoted, pious, noble hearted and diligent.

Since he had the Lord's genes in him, his inclinations were more inclined towards the Spirit than the worldly charms of material sense objects which he detested from childhood. As luck would have it, once some wondering mendicants came to spend the four-month period of the rainy season in the hermitage of this Brahmin. Narad served them with great devotion. Impressed by his service and having some inner vision of his high spiritual stature and the spark of divinity that was lying hidden in him waiting for an opportune moment to leap up and shine through, they blessed him, taught him meditation and contemplation, besides initiating the child into the path of the Lord.

Thus, the dormant fire of renunciation and spiritual awareness was immediately ignited in Narad's little heart and he wished to take to Sanyas (a renunciate's life marks by constant wandering as a mendicant in search of the supreme bliss and Truth), but he did not wish to hurt his mother's emotions. But the Lord had other plans for him, and soon his wish was fulfilled when his loving mother died of snake bite while milking a cow. Instead of grieving at such a loss in human terms, the child Narad felt happy as if the last fetter was broken and he was liberated from worldly obligations.

He immediately headed north towards the mighty Himalaya Mountains to do severe Tapa (penance and austerity) to attain access to the Supreme Being. The little one walked on and on, and finally he was so tired and exhausted that when he saw a cool lake he drank water, ate fruits that he found there, and sat under the shadow of a tree and became lost in meditation. Lord Vishnu revealed himself in his four-arm form in his heart, but Narad was so thrilled and excited with this divine vision that he wished to see the Lord in practical terms with his physical eyes rather than the subtle eyes while he was in deep meditation. But as soon as he opened the eyes, the Lord vanished. Most sorry and overwhelmed with this loss, the child began to cry bitterly.

Then a cosmic formless reverberating voice said—‘Oh son! Your penance is accepted, and I do love you. Though I bless you with an eternal life and that your memory of me would never be erased, but you would not be able to see me with physical eyes in this world. So go back to the world and carry out my divine mandate for me. Become my messenger and go preach the path of my devotion and holy name to this world so that other unfortunate creatures also can get liberation and deliverance from the fetters in which they have bound themselves with no one to show them an easy and practical way out of their predicaments. Go and preach my message to such people in every corner of the earth; go and preach my devotion and let them have faith in my holy name. Your salvation would come naturally and automatically to you as an unasked reward.’

Narad turned back with this divine mandate of the Lord to be carried out just like the great Apostles of Lord Jesus Christ had went, on the Lord’s instructions, to spread his message to the people on this earth. Henceforth, he wandered in the entire creation like a mendicant, with an Indian lute upon which he sang the Lord’s glories and his divine name, spreading the divine message of the Lord’s mercy, compassion, benevolence and love everywhere, attempting to turn everyone towards the Lord and away from this sinful and mortal world so that each individual creature could get his spiritual liberation and deliverance. Such are the ways of great and holy saints that instead of being selfish to seek his own liberation and deliverance from the Lord as the grant of a boon and letting the rest of the world go to hell, Narad chose to sacrifice his own life, liberation and deliverance at the altar of larger good of creation and to fulfill the wish of the Lord. Of course there is another twist to this tale—the Lord does not select everyone to carry on his own divine agenda, and a soul who the Lord designates for this purpose is indeed the most favoured and lucky one—because the Emperor chooses only those upon whom he has utmost confidence to carry out his personal task. It is just like Jesus choosing his disciples and ordaining them the task of spreading his glorious Gospel of love and salvation.

Therefore, Narad, the apostle of the Supreme Being, is the most loved disciple of the Lord, and it is evidenced by the fact that he is the only saint who has unrestricted access to the abode of the Trinity Gods (Lord Vishnu the sustainer and protector of creation, Brahma the creator and Shiva the concluder of this creation) besides every nook and corner of creation without hindrance and even without seeking any previous permission and appointment from anyone, be it a God or a Demon or anybody else. Narad’s visit was always for the host’s long term good, so he was always welcome and revered.

When the time came and the age of the physical body ended, he left the mortal coil like a serpent leaves its cuticle and went to heaven to sing the Lord’s holy and divine name in the presence of Brahma, the old patriarch of creation. At the end of the Kalpa, at the time of Doomsday, he merged and became one with Brahma, the creator.

When the new cycle of creation came into being, he was born again from the Mana (mind) of Brahma the creator after the Sankadi sages were born. That is why, in the present Kalpa, Narad is called the ‘Manas Putra’ of Brahma, i.e. the son born out of Brahma’s mental powers or his wishes. With this heritage and gene running in his blood, it is natural that he is highly respected and regarded as one of the greatest devotees of Lord Vishnu who is the Supreme Being personified. It is from the navel of Lord Vishnu that Brahma, the creator of the visible world, was born atop a divine Lotus that emerged from it while he was reclining on the bed made of the coiled body of the legendary serpent named Seshnath who floated on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk called Kshirsagar.

Narad preached renunciation of this material world and an extreme sense of faith in and complete devotion for Lord Hari (Narayan, Vishnu, the Supreme Being). But this was against the process of creation, because if everyone followed the path preached by Narad and renounced the material world then the process of propagation of the world and its inhabitant creatures along with its development would come to a naught. So, when Narad preached renunciation and detachment from this material world of sense objects that was mortal, transient and never a giver of peace and happiness to the ten thousand mental sons who were created by Daksha Prajapati (the first male from whom the rest of the human race was born and who was assigned the task by Brahma to propagate creation) in order to propagate this human race, Narad obviously annoyed him. These sons were preached by Narad and they all became mendicants, renouncing their attachment with this life and all charms of the material world along with the desire to enjoy it, gratify their sense organs and remain entangled in affairs of this world. Daksha Prajapati was exasperated and he created another set of ten thousand sons. But when Narad again played spoil-sport, Daksha cursed him that Narad would have to remain on the move always and he would not be able to stay at one place for more than two 'Gharis'. [1 Ghari = 24 minutes. In practice the term means a very short period of time; a fleeting moment as small as batting an eyelid.] As a result of this curse, Narad became an ever-wandering mendicant. But this suited the divine mandate of the Lord—for now Narad was forced to keep on the move and reach newer corners of the worldly and celestial realm to preach the Lord's message amongst the mortal creatures on earth and the Gods and Spirits in the heaven.

It is believed that Narad is immortal and is symbolic of the stupendous powers of a man's mind. The mind is ever-wandering like Narad, and the subtle message in the entire lore is that one should tame this restless mind and train it to turn away from this mortal engrossing material world and instead turn towards the Lord for finding permanent liberation and deliverance from this world. A wise mind would teach (preach) the aspirant about the futility of pursuing this artificial world, and instead seek ways of finding the Truth that gives eternity and brings to an end the endless litany of miseries and horrors, perplexities and confusions, restlessness and agitations that are invariably associated with un-truth, delusions and ignorance.

Narad was the most erudite and scholarly devotee of the Lord. No other sage or saint could match him in his scholarly acumen and profundity of wisdom (ref. Chandogya Upanishad, Canto 7, section 1, verse no. 2). Narad is also credited with the composition of the great Sutra (formula or key) called 'Narad Bhakti Sutra' which defines the eclectic principles and characteristics of the spiritual practice called Bhakti which is to have a profound and exemplary degree of devotion for and surrender to the Supreme Being. Narad himself epitomizes Bhakti at its most refined and developed form.

In Atharva Veda's Narad Parivrajak Upanishad, sage Narad has taught an assembly of sages the grand philosophy as well as the eclectic tenets of Sanyas, the life of total renunciation, detachment and dispassion, leading to one's spiritual liberation and deliverance.

The Atharva Veda's Hayagriva Upanishad has been revealed to sage Narad by Brahma the creator when the sage approached the latter with his quest for Brahm-Vidya, the knowledge of Brahm.

In Garud Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, the creator Brahma has taught Narad the esoteric knowledge known as the 'Garud Vidya' which describes the secret Mantras pertaining to Garud, the divine mount of Lord Vishnu, as well as the Mantras which can help to counter the evil effects of all types of poisons arising from snake bites.

It was sage Narad who had told Valmiki the story of the Lord Ram which the latter penned down in the form of the epic Ramayan by sage Valmiki.

In Tulsidas' epic Ram Charit Manas, Lord Ram had explained to Narad why the Lord had not allowed him to marry in great detail. In essence the Lord told him that once he had taken the vows of renunciation and detachment to lead a life of a wandering hermit or friar, it would have been very wrong to marry. At the same time, the Lord has outlined the characteristic virtues of saints in the same discourse. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 46.

Sage Narad was the greatest exponent of the spiritual practice of “Bhakti”, the path of devotion and love that leads to God-realisation. He is famous as the sage who had expounded on the eclectic spiritual philosophy of Bhakti in his book of aphorisms on this theme, called “Narad Bhakti Sutra”. It is believed that the principles of devotion and love for the Lord God that he has enunciated in this book were originally conceived by Lord Shiva, and Narad had been ordained by the Lord to spread this good message far and wide as the sage used to roam around in every corner of this creation.

Narad was a selfless saint, and therefore he was respected by all wherever he went. Even the demons praised him and welcomed him because they knew that he would always give them such advice as would be good for them. Everyone knew that Narad always taught of ways that would provide liberation and deliverance to the soul of all the creatures, and that his company will always do some good for even the greatest of sinners.

Sita, also known as Janki as she was the daughter of king Janak, is extremely dear to her husband Lord Ram<sup>1</sup> who is a treasury of mercy, kindness, compassion and grace. (7)

I bow my head with reverence at her two holy lotus-like feet, for it is by her grace that I will be blessed with a refined intellect and purified mind (that would remain calm and undistracted by her blessings, helping me to remain focused on my divine mission of narrating the holy story of Lord Ram, and becoming a practical tool that would enable me to complete my mission successfully)<sup>2</sup>. girā aratha jala bīci sama kahi'ata bhinna na bhinna.
banda'um̐ sītā rāma pada jinhahi parama priya khinna. 18.

Just like a spoken word and its meaning cannot be delineated from one another though they appear to be independent of each other (because a word may have many meanings, but it should always be understood in the context in which it is used by when one speaks), and the water cannot be separated from the wave formed by it though they are independent entities (because water has many forms, but a wave is invariably water and nothing but water), ---

---Similarly, Lord Ram and Sita appear to be two independent persons, but actually they are the same, being manifestations of the same Divinity that has revealed itself in two separate forms. Hence, I (Tulsidas) offer my worship and obeisance to the holy feet of both Lord Ram and Sita with the considered thought that they are one and the same Divinity. (Doha no. 18)

[Note—While Lord Ram represents Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness, Sita represents its Shakti, the cosmic energy and dynamism of Brahm. Brahm uses this Shakti to do what it wishes to do; and Shakti can't do anything without the express orders and support from Brahm. Hence, the two are indispensable to each other; they are inseparable from one another; they form two aspects of the same Divinity.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 97 where Sita has stated that her relationship with Lord Ram is like the moon and its rays; they can't be separated from one another.]

चौ०. बंदउँ नाम राम रघुबर को । हेतु कृसानु भानु हिमकर को ॥ १ ॥
बिधि हरि हरमय बेद प्रान सो । अगुन अनूपम गुन निधान सो ॥ २ ॥

banda'um̐ nāma rāma raghubara kō. hētu kṛsānu bhānu himakara kō. 1.
bidhi hari haramaya bēda prāna sō. aguna anūpama guna nidhāna sō. 2.

I pay my respects to Lord Ram's Holy Name 'RAM' of Lord Raghubar<sup>1</sup>. This name has three letters 'Ra+Aa+Ma' (ra+ā+ma). These letters respectively represent the three great Gods, viz. (i) the 1st letter 'Ra' stands for the Fire-God, (ii) the 2nd letter 'A' stands for the Sun God, and (iii) the 3rd letter 'Ma' stands for the Moon God<sup>2</sup>.

[The holy Name of the Lord is pronounced as ‘Rāma’ or ‘Raam’. It consists of three basic sounds: ‘Ra’ as in the English word ‘run’, ‘Aa’ as in the English word ‘father’, and ‘Ma’ as in the English word ‘mum’, ‘rum’.] (1)

The holy Name of Lord Ram represents the three Gods of the Trinity, viz. Brahma (the creator), Vishnu (the sustainer and protector) and Shiva (the concluder of creation) respectively.

It is the essence of the Vedas (i.e. it is literally the breath or the vital life of the Vedas—“bēda prāna”)<sup>3</sup>. It is without qualifications; it is peerless and an eternal source or fount of all auspiciousness and good virtues<sup>4</sup>. (2)

From the spiritual perspective this name means ‘the Lord of the creatures’, where the 1st part of the name, i.e. ‘Raghu’ stands for a living being, and the 2nd part, i.e. ‘Bara’ stands for the Lord or a husband.

So this verse essentially means ‘I pray to and offer my respects to the holy Name of Lord Ram who is the Lord of all living beings’.

To wit, just like the fire is able to burn all impurities and make gold pure, invocation of Lord Ram’s holy Name purifies the creature completely and makes his heart holy and pure. Again, just as the sun provides energy and life to all the creatures on earth and removes all darkness and the fear of ghosts by its mere presence in the sky, the holy Name of Lord Ram removes all darkness of delusions and ignorance that cloud the soul of a creature, thereby freeing him and granting him fearlessness from the horrors of birth and death in this mundane world of transmigration. And finally, just as the moon provides a soothing balm of its rays to the world scorched by the heat of the blazing sun, the Lord’s holy Name gives solace and succour and hope to the tormented soul of all creatures.

The different sounds of the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet stand for one or more Gods of the Hindu pantheon. A letter that relates to a particular God is called that God’s Beej Mantra, or a letter which acts like a secret formula that directly refers to the chosen God and encrypts his cosmic energy and mystical powers. When a worshipper wishes to seek help from a particular God, he would use a Beej Mantra specific to that God. By invoking a Beej Mantra the worshipper virtually invokes a God’s cosmic powers and energy for fulfillment of his desire. Repetition of a Beej Mantra builds up the energy that corresponds to the respective God, and it gathers more and more dynamism as time passes.

If more than one Beej Mantras are used then the worshipper is able to harness the combined energy of all the Gods to whom these Beej Mantras belong. It is like the case of employing more than one source of energy or power when a single source falls short of requirements. It’s like putting more than one electric motor into place to run a machine when any single motor falls short of the required horse-power that is needed. The combined cosmic energy of all these Beej Mantras and their respective Gods is thus focused on a single mission, and obviously the result would be more profound and the effect more stronger than using a single Beej Mantra—because this method puts the combined cosmic energy of more than one God into fulfillment of one mission.

In the case of Lord Ram, the three letters ‘Ra, Aa and Ma’ of the Lord’s holy Name combine the energy of the Fire God, the Sun God and the Moon God.

Further, it also combines the powers of the three great Gods of the Trinity, viz. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer and protector, and Shiva the concluder of creation. To wit, the holy Name of Lord Ram symbolizes the entire gamut of creation—its beginning, its development and expansion, and its conclusion. It infuses life (Brahma), it protects and sustains (Vishnu), and it provides liberation from the miseries and torments of life (Shiva).

<sup>4</sup>This verse clarifies that the Name which is being glorified is not simply a name of a great king, but it is a holy Name that has been endorsed by the Vedas, the most sacred of religious texts. The three letters of Lord Ram’s holy Name combine and roll into one the cosmic powers and the authority of the three supreme forces of creation, viz. the creator Brahma, the sustainer Vishnu and the concluder Shiva. The holy Name ‘Ram’ represents the entire spectrum of creation—its beginning, its expansion and its conclusion. And therefore it stands for ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being who represents the cosmic Consciousness.

The holy Name of Lord Ram is equivalent to the divine Mantra ‘OM’ that is universally regarded as the most sacred of all Mantras and is directly related to the cosmic Consciousness as it is the sound manifestation of the latter and stands for Brahm, the Supreme Being. This fundamental metaphysical fact has been elaborately detailed in Ram Uttar and Purva Tapini Upanishads that belongs to the Atharva Veda tradition. OM and RAM are synonymous with each other. A full English version of this Upanishad has already been published by this author.

Calling Lord Ram’s holy Name as being the ‘essence of the Vedas’ it is meant that just like a body is useless without life in it, the scriptures would lose their greatness and holiness, their importance and value, if Lord Ram’s holy Name is removed from them.

An important question arises here. The Supreme Being or the Lord of the Word has countless names. He is known by different names in different religions and faiths; all these names refer to the same Divinity. Then why is that Lord Ram’s name ‘Ram’ or ‘Rāma’ or ‘Raam’ is regarded as the best and the most holy among them all? It is like a case of it being ‘the first among equals’. It is said in Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, 254/22 that ‘Lord Ram is the one who resides in the heart of all living beings, and his name is the one that directly appeals to the heart which finds joy in remembering it. So therefore, though there are thousands of names of the Supreme Lord, the name ‘Ram’ is the best amongst them all.’

There is another aspect to it. All the Mantras or divine formulas that have been prescribed in the Vedas and other scriptures are specific to particular Gods to whom they belong, and when these Mantras are used for spiritual purposes, only the spiritual energy of their respective God or deity is invoked. But in the case of Lord Ram when his holy Name is remembered or invoked then the benefits that accrue encompass the entire spectrum of cosmic forces, i.e. the forces of creation, of sustenance and of conclusion. Nothing is left out, and so obviously the powers and authority that this holy Name grants to the person who invokes it are all-encompassing and wholesome in their nature. The benefits of Lord Ram's holy Name are all-round and comprehensive.

Like the pure 'cosmic Consciousness' that is self-illuminated and does not require any other source to provide light to it, the holy Name of Lord Ram is also self-illuminated and self-empowered.]

Lord Ganesh knows about the stupendous glory, the mystical powers and the supremacy of Lord Ram's holy Name over all other Mantras of all other Gods, and it is for this reason that he (Ganesh) is worshipped first in all religious ceremonies and is deemed to be the senior-most God<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A Mantra is a syllable, a letter, a word or a phrase that is used as a spiritual formula. In this case it is the holy Name of Lord Ram, viz. 'RAM' or 'Rāma' or 'Raam'.

<sup>2</sup>This fact has been endorsed in Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition. This Upanishad clearly states that Lord Ram's holy Name 'RAM' is called the "Tarak Mantra", which is a spiritual formula that can grant freedom, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to the soul of the creature by liberating him from the cycle of transmigration and helping him to go across over this vast ocean represented by this mundane world of birth and death.

<sup>3</sup>There are two stories narrated in the Purans (ancient mythological histories of the Hindus) that describe how Ganesh invoked Lord Ram's name to attain supremacy amongst all the Gods. The first version is in Shiva Puran (Shaiva Tantra), and the other is in Padma Puran.

The first story is as follows: Once there was a quarrel between Ganesh and his elder brother Kartikeya as to who should be regarded as senior. Lord Shiva sent them to Brahma, the creator, to decide the contentious matter. Another version says that once Brahma asked all the Gods who was to be deemed as being senior amongst them all and therefore eligible to be worshipped first during religious ceremonies. Each God said that it is him. So, in order to settle this dispute Brahma asked them (Ganesh and Kartikeya in the first version, and the Gods in the second version) to go around the universe and come back to him. The one who comes back first will win the trophy as well as the honour to be called the senior-most God and the right to be worshipped first. Kartikeya jumped on his peacock and so did all the other Gods who mounted their respective vehicles as they started out on their journey around the universe. Ganesh was confounded as he had a pot-belly and a mouse as his vehicle—so it was impossible for him to win the race. Though he embarked on the journey, he felt hopeless and dejected. Somewhere sage Narad met him, and he told Ganesh that the entire creation is a manifestation of Lord Ram, the Supreme Being, and therefore there is nothing that exists beyond the Lord's holy Name. Hence, the best recourse for him, Narad advised, would be to write the name of Lord Ram on the ground and go around it in a symbolic gesture of going around the entire spectrum of creation consisting of countless universes. After doing it, Ganesh should go to Brahma and narrate the entire episode to him. Meanwhile, wherever the other Gods, including Kartikeya, went, they found the foot-prints of a mouse ahead of them, indicating that Ganesh was ahead of them in the race around the many universes! When they finally came back to Brahma they found Ganesh already there. Brahma declared him the winner and explained the reason for his decision to all the Gods—that Ganesh was the wisest amongst them all as he had circumambulated the entire creation by going around the holy Name of Lord Ram, and so he is the winner.

A variation of this is found in Padma Puran, Srishti Kand where sage Vyas narrated an event in this connection to Sanjaya. Though this story is not related to the glory of Lord Ram's name, yet let us read it for the sake of interest. It says that when the two brothers Kartikeya and Ganesh were born to Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, all the Gods offered some wonderful rounded balls of sweets known as 'Modak' to her as a gift. These balls of sweet were made from Amrit, the juice of eternity and immortality. The two brothers quarreled to eat these sweet balls. Parvati explained that this was no ordinary sweet as it was made from Amrit, and therefore only he who was qualified to have it would get it. She said, "Look, only someone who is extremely wise, and has purified himself by doing exemplary meritorious deeds—only he is eligible to partake of this sweet." Hearing it, Kartikeya mounted his vehicle, the peacock, and went on a pilgrimage to all the holy places. But Ganesh had a fat belly and a mouse as his mount, which made it impossible for him to go anywhere. So he went around his parents, father Lord Shiva and mother Parvati, and sat down. When Kartikeya returned, panting and huffing because he was in a hurry to reach ahead of Ganesh, he found his younger brother seated comfortably. Then Lord Shiva and Parvati declared Ganesh as the winner and one who was eligible for the sweet made from Amrit. They explained that one's parents are the most honourable beings for any living being. Paying respect to one's parents is equivalent to thousands of meritorious deeds combined into one. So Ganesh would henceforth be the first to be worshipped in all religious ceremonies.]

The ancient poet (Valmiki) knows the great effect and the magical powers of the Holy Name of Lord Ram because he attained purity and greatness by chanting this Name in the reverse order<sup>1</sup>. (5)

On hearing from Lord Shiva that Ram's Name is equivalent to thousands of Names of other Gods and Goddesses, Bhavani (Lord Shiva's consort) decided to chant this Holy Name alongside Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. [To wit, when Shiva's consort became aware of the glories of Lord Ram's holy Name, she used it as a spiritual formula herself just like her husband Lord Shiva had always been doing.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3; and (ii) Sortha/Doha no. 14 (d); (b) Vinai Patrika, (i) verse no. 151, stanza no. 7; (ii) verse no. 156, stanza no. 2; (ii) verse no. 156, stanza no. 2.

In Adhyatma Ramayan, Ayodhya Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 64 and 80, Valmiki himself says: “Oh Lord Ram, I have attained the exalted state of being a sage equivalent in stature to celestial sages because of your holy Name. Say then, who can ever sufficiently praise the greatness of your holy Name?”; “The celestial sages known as Sapta-rishis had advised me to repeat your holy Name in the reverse order as MARA instead of in the right order as RAMA because I told them I wouldn't be able to do it in the correct way due to my overriding sins. And inspite of this reverse way of chanting your glorious name, I still found exaltedness and enlightenment.”

Sage Valmiki was a sage who lived during the time of Lord Ram. The Lord had visited his hermitage during his journey into the forest.

The story of Valmiki is as follows: Sage Valmiki is well known for his classical work known as the famous epic ‘Ramayana’, which is his magnum opus. He is also credited with penning Advhut Ramayan in which Sita had assumed the form of Maha Kali to kill the Ravana with a thousand heads.

Valmiki is said to be the son of sage Pracheta who is said to be the son of Varun, the Water God. He is also said to be one of the Prajaapatis—the ancient patriarchs of this world.

Before he became famous as ‘Valmiki’, he was known by the name of Ratnakar. In his early life he had been in the company of Bhils, ancient tribals, from his childhood days, and married into this race. So he adopted their life and means of livelihood, which was hunting. He used to waylaid travellers and rob them to sustain his family. Once the celestial sages known as Sapta-rishis met him and told him that no one would share his sins. The meeting of these sages was a turning point in Valmiki's life. He pleaded with them to tell him how to get over his path of sins and somehow find deliverance. The sages then advised him to meditate upon the holy Name of Lord Ram as it is the easiest way for him for it requires no knowledge of scriptures and needs no formalities, and at the same time it is easy and convenient for him to repeat it as a Mantra. Valmiki accepted this advice, and immediately sat down in a motionless state of Samadhi, focusing his mind on the holy Mantra ‘RAM’. This alone led him to his enlightenment and self-realisation.

According to Adhyatma Ramayan, Ayodhya Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 57-58 he was a Brahmin by birth but became a cruel robber who would even kill his victims if they failed to give all their possessions to him. He had adopted this means of livelihood because he was brought up by a band of robbers and highway vagabonds who would way lay travellers and rob them. Once the seven celestial sages known as the Sapta-Rishis went through the forest where he lived, and Valmiki accosted them. When asked by the sages why he robbed others, Valmiki replied that he did it to feed his family and other dependants. The sages advised him that they would not share the consequences of sins that he is committing for them. To test the correctness of this advice, Valmiki tied them to a tree and went to his house to ask his kith and kin if they would share any misfortune that might befall upon him. When they replied that they are only concerned with what loot he brings home, Valmiki's eyes of wisdom opened instantaneously. He rushed back to the sages, untied them and fell at their feet seeking forgiveness. He asked them to show him the path by which he can seek redemption and salvation for himself. The sages then advised him to do Japa (repetition) with Lord Ram's holy Name 'RAAM'. Valmiki said that he was so sinful that it is not possible for him to utter the Lord's holy Name. At this, the sages thought over the matter and told him to repeat the name in the reverse order—as 'MARAA'. When this word MARAA is repeated it becomes RAAM. This trick worked fine for Valmiki, and he immediately sat down to do Tapa (severe form of penance) and meditated on the name of the Lord in the reverse order. He became so immobile and lost in contemplation that a mound of anthill formed around his body. It so happened that when the sages returned to the same place during their return journey, they saw him in this condition. They poured consecrated water on him and revived him. It was then that they gave him a new name 'Valmiki', which means 'one who has emerged from an anthill'. This story is narrated in Adhyatma Ramayan, Ayodhya Kand, 6/57-58.

He established a hermitage on the banks of river Tamsa and lived there. Lord Ram went to meet him during his outward journey to the forest, and it was in the sage's hermitage that Sita lived and her two sons Lav and Kush were born when she was sent to exile by Ram during the final days of the Lord's days on earth as a prelude to his winding up his worldly 'Leela' or deeds and ascending to the heaven as Lord Vishnu.

One day Valmiki saw a hunter shoot down a male bird and heard the wailings of his companion, the female bird. He cursed the hunter in a verse that came out of his mouth in a poetic style called the Anushtup Chand (metre). Never before had Valmiki ever composed any verse, so he was astonished at this development. Then Brahma the creator appeared before him and ordered him to compose the epic Ramayan for which the basic story was provided to him by sage Narad.

The genesis of the story of Ramayan is this—Once the celestial sage Narad came to his hermitage (called an Ashram) on the behest of Brahma. Valmiki asked him if there was anyone living in this creation who embodied all the 16 Kalaas (qualities) that the Supreme Being is known to possess. Then Narad told him about Lord Ram. This is how the grand and magnificent story of the Ramayan was revealed.

This story is narrated in Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 254, verse nos. 11-24. Briefly it is as follows: Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, had been initiated and given Lord Vishnu's Mantra by her Guru (preceptor) sage Vamdeo (pronounced "Vaamdeo"). Once Lord Shiva sat down for his meals and invited Parvati to join him. Parvati replied that she was worshipping Lord Vishnu by using his thousand names, known as Vishnu Sahastra Naam, which takes a long time to complete. It was then that Lord Shiva advised her that she must understand that Lord Ram's single name 'Ram' (pronounced as 'Rāma' or 'Raam') was equivalent to the thousands of names of Vishnu, or for that matter any God. Parvati accepted Shiva's advice as she knew that he was the wisest and the most enlightened amongst the Gods. Since that time Parvati always accompanied Lord Shiva in repeating the holy Name of Lord Ram and used it as her spiritual formula.]

Lord Shiva was so happy at her decision (of chanting Lord Ram's holy Name and accepting it as her spiritual Mantra) that he made her the jewel among womenfolk as well as an inseparable part of his own self. (7)

Lord Shiva knows the great effect and the spiritual potency of the holy Name (of Lord Ram)<sup>1</sup> by the virtue (or the strength) of which the poison he drank became nectar for him<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva knows the mystical powers and spiritual value of Lord Ram's holy Name. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 25 which says that after studying all the scriptures and analyzing the countless ways they have been interpreted, Lord Shiva deduced that Lord Ram's holy Name is the best Mantra and the best spiritual formula for a living being. So he adopted it as his preferred Mantra which he invoked during meditation. This invocation granted him eternal peace and bliss, and elevated him to the pedestal of being a Great God, the 'Maha-Deva'.

<sup>2</sup>This story is narrated in Srimad Bhagvat Mahapuran, Skandha 8, Canto 5-7. In brief it is this: The Gods and the Demons decided to churn the ocean to produce Amrit, the liquid that would grant them eternity. But this was not a joke, for the ocean was extremely sour and bitter. During the fierce churning of the ocean, for which the celestial serpent was made a rope, Mt. Mandrachal the churning rod, and the Tortoise as the base on which this mighty mountain was rested, one of the first things that was produced was 'Halahal Poison', i.e. a poison that was so acidic, scalding, corroding and dangerous that if even one drop of it fell on the earth, all life on its surface would vanish. All were terrified, not knowing how to tackle it. All the Gods rushed to Lord Shiva as they knew he was the wisest amongst them all and would certainly know what to do with this poison. Besides this, Shiva is also the God of death, so he would find a way around this problem. So Shiva uttered the holy Name of Lord Ram and sipped the poison. The name of Lord Ram is so powerful that it neutralized the negative effects of the poison so much so that it didn't affect Shiva; only Shiva's neck turned blue due to this poison. Since that time Shiva came to be known as Neel-Kantha, the Lord with a blue-tinged throat.

This drinking of the poison by Shiva and his surviving due to the powerful antidote effects of Lord Ram's holy Name has also been mentioned in Tulsidas' books (i) Kavitawali, Uttar Kand, stanza no. 1 of verse no. 158; and (ii) Vinai Patrika, verse no. 156, stanza no. 2.]

Tulsidas says that devotion to Lord Ram's and his holy Name is like the rainy season, and devotees are like the paddy crop. The two syllables of the holy Name, i.e. 'Ra' and 'Ma', stand for the two months of Shravan and Bhadav which are very auspicious for the growth of paddy. (Doha no. 19)

[Note—Refer: Vinai Patrika, verse no. 221, stanza no. 4 also where a similar idea is expressed. Refer also to Kavitawali, Uttar Kand, verse no. 78, line nos. 3-4 where Tulsidas says that he has only Lord Ram's name as his sole source of succour and solace, and he relies on it exclusively.]

Paddy grows wonderfully during the two months of the rainy season known as Shravan and Bhadav in India. It is because during these two months rainfall is abundant, and it usually falls regularly, for prolonged periods of time and in a controlled manner such as in a drizzle or a light shower so as to properly water the fields. A heavy downpour is useless as the water runs off quickly, leaving the land dry and useless for the paddy crop to grow because it needs a wet soil and an abundance of water on the ground.

In this verse, Tulsidas compares a devotee to the paddy crop, and the two letters of Lord Ram's holy Name, viz. Ra and Ma, as the two months of the rainy season. Just like the paddy crop that finds an infusion of life during these two months of the rainy season, a devotee also finds extreme joy and happiness in the name of Lord Ram; a devotee feels energised and spiritually blessed when he invokes the holy Name of Lord Ram that injects freshness and cheer into his life.]

Both the letters (Raa and Ma) of Lord Ram's name are sweet and charming, and they are virtually like being the 'eyes' and the 'pran' (i.e. the soul and the essence) of all the letters of the alphabet, and at the same time they are the very life of all devotees<sup>1</sup>.

These two letters of the holy Name of the Lord are easy to remember, and they delight one and all. [To wit, whereas other Mantras are complicated and oftentimes difficult to remember and pronounce, the holy Name of Lord Ram consisting of the two letters 'Raa' and 'Ma' are very easy to recall and as easy to remember by even the most humble of persons. No special skills or knowledge of the language is required to say the holy Name of the Lord. Hence this divine Mantra is easily accessible to one and all. They are so sweet and pleasant to say and hear that they delight both the speaker as well as the hearer.]

These two letters that form the holy Name of Lord Ram (i.e. Raa and Ma) possess mystical powers and they are so glorious and spiritually empowered that they not only take care of the creature while he lives in this gross mundane world but also ensures his well-being after this world (i.e. after his death, by providing him with deliverance from the cycle of birth and death, and taking care of his salvation and emancipation of his soul). (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Doha no. 19 herein above we have read that the two letters of Lord Ram's holy Name are like the two months of the rainy season that are virtually the vital life-giving months for the paddy crop, because if the rains fail the paddy would die. These present verses are an elaboration of this idea.

The letters of the alphabet are nothing but sounds made by the tongue, or a mark of ink made on paper when written. They acquire meaning and life only when one makes some sense out of them. These seemingly ordinary letters of the alphabet, which ordinarily are practical devices for general communication in day-to-day life, assume great mystical powers, and acquire dynamism and spiritual energy when they are used as Mantras (spiritual formulas), prayers or hymns dedicated to God.

So here poet Tulsidas means that if one were to closely examine and analyse the underlying philosophy of this phenomenon, then one would come to the conclusion that the sound produced by the two letters of the holy Name of Lord Ram is the cosmic energy that subtly infuses dynamism and life into all the letters of the alphabet just like the case of the invisible life-giving breath that silently breathes life and dynamism into the body of all living beings. Sans this cosmic energy injected by the sound of the holy Name of Lord Ram, the letters of the alphabet would simply be lifeless entities marked on a piece of paper, or incomprehensible and un-intelligible words uttered by the tongue.

Tulsidas has extolled the glories of Lord Ram's name and his divine story in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32.

कहत सुनत सुमिरत सुठि नीके । राम लखन सम प्रिय तुलसी के ॥ ३ ॥
बरनत बरन प्रीति बिलगाती । ब्रह्म जीव सम सहज संघाती ॥ ४ ॥

kahata sunata sumirata suṭhi nīkē. rāma lakhana sama priya tulasī kē. 3.
baranata barana prīti bilagāṭī. brahma jīva sama sahaja samṅhātī. 4.

The two letters of the holy Name of Lord Ram are sweet, pleasant and delightful to speak, to hear and to remember; and they are as dear to Tulsidas as are Lord Ram and Laxman themselves are to him<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The two letters (Raa and Ma) lose their harmony and profound spiritual significance and value when pronounced separately just as Brahm (the Supreme Reality; the cosmic Soul) and Jiva (the individual creature; the individual soul) appear to be different entities but are essentially the same. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, these two letters ‘Raa’ and ‘Ma’ of the holy Name of Lord Ram represent Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman for Tulsidas, and so he reverses them as personified forms of the two brothers.

A similar idea that both Lord Ram and Laxman are equally dear to Tulsidas has been expressed in Vinai Patrika, verse no. 36, stanza no. 5.

There are other references in Ram Charit Manas where we see that both Lord Ram and Laxman are equally praised and revered. Some of these are: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 193; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 216; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 315; Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 248.

When the two brothers had gone out to visit the city of Janakpur, all the citizens were equally captivated by their charm. This is evident in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 225.

The same was the condition of the king of Janakpur when he had first seen the two brothers with sage Vishwamitra. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 216.

The glory of the two letters of the Lord’s name are extolled in Vinai Patrika, verse no. 67 too.

<sup>2</sup>Brahm is the Supreme Being who represents the cosmic Consciousness at the universal or the macro level of creation, while the Jiva is the living being who represents the same Consciousness at the individual or the micro level of creation.

According to metaphysical principles expounded in the Upanishads, there is no fundamental difference between the two, i.e. Jiva and Brahm are the same. When a living being becomes aware and convinced of this universal and irrefutable spiritual Truth, he is said to be ‘self-realised and enlightened’. Otherwise, when he thinks that the Jiva and Brahm are two separate entities, he is said to be deluded and ignorant.

To wit, the two letters ‘Raa’ and ‘Ma’ of the holy Name of Lord Ram (pronounced as ‘Rāma’ or ‘Raam’) are inseparable from one another, and they must always be remembered and invoked together to produce the desired spiritual effect. If they are separated from one another then they become ordinary letters of the alphabet.

We can take a simple example to understand this principle. A magnet has two poles—north and south. A magnet has no existence and loses its strength to either pull or repel iron if it loses this uniqueness of having two poles. During electrolysis we have a negative ion and a positive ion; there cannot be electrolysis without the presence of the two. Every human being breathes, and it consists of inhalation and exhalation. There is no life in the body if any one of these two processes stop. A flame produces light; no one can separate the flame from its light; both must co-exist. Where there is a sun there is warmth and light; they are inseparable from one another.

In the same way, the two letters Raa and Ma of the holy Name of Lord Ram cannot be separated from one another. They produce good spiritual effects only when invoked together.

This fact has been explicitly expressed in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 217; and (b) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 14.]

नर नारायन सरिस सुभ्राता । जग पालक बिसेषि जन त्राता ॥ ५ ॥

भगति सुतिय कल करन बिभूषन । जग हित हेतु बिमल बिधु पूषन ॥ ६ ॥ nara nārāyana sarisa subhrātā. jaga pālaka bisēṣi jana trātā. 5.

bhagati sutiya kala karana bibhūṣana. jaga hita hētu bimala bidhu pūṣana. 6.

Like the two divine brothers Lords Nara and Narayan<sup>1</sup>, these two auspicious letters of the holy Name of Lord Ram (i.e. Raa and Ma) take care of the entire creation.

In a general way, these two letters (that symbolize Lord Ram and Laxman) are the protectors and sustainers of the whole world, without any discrimination, but more specifically they are particular about the welfare of the devotees of the Lord and grant redemption to them, assuring them of freedom from torments and sufferings of all manner in this world. (5)

They are like beautiful ear-rings that act as adornments of a sweet maiden named ‘Bhakti’. [Here, the grand spiritual virtue of faith, devotion, love, affection and dedication for Lord God, and submission to him without any conceit and pretensions, has been personified. These virtues are called ‘Bhakti’].<sup>2</sup>

As for the world, they are like the spotless and untainted celestial bodies known as the Sun and the Moon<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story goes that Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being, took birth as two great sages known as ‘Nara’ and ‘Narayan’ from the womb of Murti, the daughter of Daksha Prajapati and the wife of Dharma. Nara and Narayan were personified form of the Lord himself, and so were images of calmness and peace like their Father. They were highly enlightened and self-realised from birth, and thus did not wish to get involved in the routine affairs of creation and the mundane world. So they renounced all attachments and went to the Himalayas to do deep meditation. It is believed that they are still meditating at a place called Badrikashram or Badrinath which is located in the upper reaches of the Himalayan range of mountains in the north of India, and is one of the four most sacred pilgrim places of the country.

According to a legend narrated in Jaimini Bharat, there was a demon known as Sahastra-kavachi. He got this name because he had once done severe penance and pleased the Sun-God. When asked to seek a boon or blessing of his desire, the demon got a boon that his body should be protected by thousands of shields or impregnable vests known as 'Kavach' so that no one can kill him. When told that all those who have taken birth must die and so he must ask for a boon that does not go against this inviolable rule of creation, the demon found a clever way to circumvent it. So he asked for a boon that only when someone fights with him for a thousand years would he be able to break only one of his shields or vests, but as soon as this happens the enemy would immediately die himself. Lords Nara and Narayan were born to kill this demon. One of the two brothers spent time in doing penances and meditation while the other fought with the demon for a thousand years and break one of his thousand body-vests, but as soon as it happened that brother died in accordance with the boon. Then the other brother who had been doing penance and meditation till now brought the first brother to life again by use of Mantras and transmitting the good result of his spiritual practices, and took up the battle himself while the revived brother engaged in doing severe penance and austerity to regain mystical powers. This cycle continued for ages till the time only one last shield was left. The cunning demon escaped the battle-field and took shelter in the blazing sun. Then the two brothers Nara and Narayan went to do penance and meditation together to acquire combined strength to overcome him and face the heat of the sun.

It is believed that during Dwapar age (when Lord Krishna was born), this demon took birth as Karna who is said to have been born with a Kavach (a thick layer of hard and impregnable tissue like the shell of a tortoise) around his body. He was killed by Arjun and Lord Krishna who are, according to this legend, incarnations of Nara and Narayan respectively. It ought to be noted here that the word 'Nara' means a Jiva, a living being, here representing Arjun, and the word 'Narayan' means Lord Vishnu, here representing Lord Krishna.

The formless and attributeless form of the Supreme Being is too abstract and difficult to understand, relate to, access and invoke for ordinary living beings. So here the Lord's manifested form as Nara and Narayan has been cited. The idea is that a devotee can overcome even the most stubborn of his sins and misdeeds if he takes recourse to the powerful name of Lord Ram, because its two letters would be able to eliminate his sins one by one just like Lord Nara and Narayan had destroyed one-shield-at-a-time of the demon Shastra-kavach.

Another reason for citing the story of the two brothers Nara and Narayan is that just like they were born from the same mother (Murti, the wife of Dharma), Lord Ram's holy Name has its origin in the tongue which acts like its mother—because a person uses the tongue to pronounce this holy Name. To wit, just like Murti produced Nara and Narayan, her two sons, the tongue produces the two letters Raa and Ma of the holy Name of Lord Ram.

And just like 'Dharma' being the worldly father of Nara and Narayan who actually were personified form of Lord Vishnu, the two letters of Lord Ram too represent all that is auspicious and righteous, or a personified form of 'Dharma' in this world, and at the same time they represent Lord Vishnu who had revealed himself in the physical form of Lord Ram.

<sup>3</sup>To wit, just like the sun and the moon adorn the sky and are like the two shining jewels that illuminate the world that would have been dark in the absence of these two celestial bodies, the two holy letters of the name of Lord Ram, i.e. Raa and Ma, shine and illuminate the entire spectrum of spiritualism for a wise man. Just like the sun and the moon that remove the darkness of the world below, the two letters of the Lord's holy name remove the darkness in a devotee's life. All other Mantras etc. are like the stars that dot the night sky, but even as the combined light of all the stars is unable to illuminate either the sky or the earth below, all the Mantras taken together wouldn't be able to grant spiritual peace, bliss and redemption to a person; they won't be able to grant liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to his soul.]

स्वाद तोष सम सुगति सुधा के । कमठ सेष सम धर बसुधा के ॥ ७ ॥
जन मन मंजु कंज मधुकर से । जीह जसोमति हरि हलधर से ॥ ८ ॥

svāda tōṣa sama sugati sudhā kē. kamaṭha sēṣa sama dhara basudhā kē. 7.
jana mana maṅju kaṅja madhukara sē. jīha jasōmati hari haladhara sē. 8.

These two divine letters taste like nectar and have the latter's qualities that grant contentedness, joy and bliss to all. [To wit, these two letters of the Lord's holy Name are as refreshing and rejuvenating as nectar, and they give immense bliss and joy to the soul of a creature as if he has actually drunk nectar.]

They symbolically support and protect life on this earth (i.e. they look after the welfare and well-being of all living beings in this world) just like the divine Tortoise did (when it supported life on earth by holding it on its back and preventing it from sinking into the nether world at the time of the churning of the ocean by the Gods and the Demons), and like the Serpent God (known as Sheshnath) who does so even today (by holding the earth on its hood)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

For the devotees' mind which is comparable to a lotus, the two letters of Lord Ram's holy Name are like the bees (that continuously hover above the lotus flower to drink its nectar)<sup>2</sup>.

For the tongue which is symbolically like mother Yashodha, these two letters are like Lord Krishna and his brother Balaram respectively (hari haladhara sē)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In some ancient time when the Gods and Demons had churned the ocean in search of Amrit, the liquid of immortality, they had used Mt. Mandrachal as the churning rod and the celestial serpent Seshnath as the rope. At that time Lord Vishnu had assumed the form of a Tortoise and supported the great mountain from below so that it did not drill through the earth and split it into two or push it under its weight to sink into the nether world.

In Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 234, verse nos. 17-18 we read that at the end of this churning the Gods had offered their prayers to honour Lord Tortoise and requested him to help Seshnath (the legendary Serpent) and other Diggajs (mythological mighty Elephants) to support the earth from below. It is believed that Seshnath holds the earth on his thousand hoods, and he is aided by the Elephants who support the earth at its corners, while the Great Tortoise supports the earth on its shell and helps the Seshnath and the Diggajs in their effort to carry the earth aloft. The Tortoise ensures that they do not get tired, and the earth does not slip and fall.

<sup>2</sup>The bees hum and buzz continuously over the lotus flower; some of them alight on the flower to drink its nectar. This metaphor implies that the tongue of a devotee continuously repeats the holy Name of Lord Ram so much so that the sound produced by this chanting creates a continuous humming sound around the devotee. It seems that the devotee's mind is like a bee that derives intense pleasure in remaining engrossed in drinking nectar from a flower because his mind finds similar pleasure in repeating the holy Name of Lord Ram and remain submerged in the bliss that is got by this repetition. The constant humming produced by repetition of the word "Raam" creates vibrations that sooth the devotee's mind and nerves so much so that he does not wish to think of anything else.

<sup>3</sup>The word 'Haldhar' also means 'a person who holds a plough' which he uses to plough his fields, the other word 'Hari' also means 'green', a reference to the lush green fields, and the word 'Jasomati' may mean 'a mind that is wise and one that gives fame to a person'. So in the context of this metaphor we can interpret this verse to mean that a wise person uses Lord Ram's holy Name to plough and ready his field symbolized by his life and his inner-self so that a good harvest of spiritual values are accumulated in it, which in turn would give him immense joy and happiness just like a farmer who rejoices when he sees his green field full of rich crop.

Just like the field that is made usable by the plough, repeating the Lord's holy Name prepares a man to make good use of his life and render it worthwhile and auspicious. Just like farmer who works with his plough first so that he can enjoy a good harvest later on, a wise person is one who uses the holy Name of Lord Ram to prepare his life and inner-self to welcome spiritualism and good virtues such as piety, holiness, saintliness etc. in order to enjoy spiritual bliss, peace, happiness and redemption later on in life.]

तुलसी रघुबर नाम के बरन बिराजत दोउ ॥ २० ॥

dōhā.

ēku chatru ēku mukuṭamani saba baranani para jō'u.
tulasī raghubara nāma kē barana birājata dō'u. 20.

Tulsidas says: 'Lo and Behold! The two letters of Lord Ram's holy Name (i.e. 'Raa' and 'Ma') crown all the other alphabets of the Sanskrit or the Hindi language—the former acts as 'umbrella' and the latter acts as a 'crown-jewel'. (Doha no. 20)

[Note—The 1st letter ‘Raa’ of the Lord’s name Raam or ‘Rāma’ consists of two parts—viz. the Sanskrit consonant ‘Ra’ and vowel sound of ‘Aa/ā’, which is the second vowel of the alphabet. The first letter ‘Ra’ and the vowel sound of ‘Aa’ are integral to the first half of the holy Name (Ra + ā).

When the letter ‘Ra’ or the vowel sound of ‘Aa’ are used in conjunction with any other consonant of the alphabet, then they are represented in the form of a ‘curved line’ placed on the top of the concerned letter. This curved line is called a ‘ref’ in Sanskrit grammar. It is shaped like an ‘umbrella’ that is placed above the letter concerned.

Similarly, the 2nd letter ‘Ma’ of the name of Lord Ram (‘Rā + ma’) is converted into a ‘dot’, known as an ‘anuswar’, that is placed on the top of another letter (a consonant) when ‘Ma’ is used in conjunction with it. The resultant sound is equivalent to the English letter M as in mum, hum). The effect is that it looks like it was a ‘crown jewel’ put on the top of the letter.

So in this verse, Tulsidas means that both the letters of Lord Ram’s holy Name are so glorious that one acts like an umbrella or a parasol held on the head of a king, and the other acts like the crown jewel worn on the head of the king. Just like the case of a king acquiring his dignity and stature by the virtue of the umbrella held over his head and the jewel that adorns his crown, the two letters of Lord Ram’s holy Name give glory to all other letters that form Beej Mantras for different Gods and Goddesses. Devoid of these two holy letters of Lord Ram’s name, all other letters that stand for various Beej Mantras lose their effectiveness and glory, and so does the beauty of the language itself as a whole.]

नाम रूप दुइ ईस उपाधी । अकथ अनादि सुसामुझि साधी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

samujhata sarisa nāma aru nāmī. prīti parasapara prabhu anugāmī. 1.
nāma rūpa du’i īsa upādhī. akatha anādi susāmujhi sādhi. 2.

The ‘Name’ and the person ‘Named’ (i.e. the person to whom the name refers to, in this case Lord Ram), though apparently appearing to be synonymous with each other because they refer to the same entity, are actually different from one another but very closely allied to each other just like the relationship that exists between a ‘master’ and a ‘loyal follower or servant’ of his. [To wit, first the Lord’s Name is pronounced, and then the Lord reveals himself before the worshipper or the devotee. Hence, the ‘Name’ has precedence over the ‘Named’.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

The ‘Name’ (nāma) and the ‘Form’ (rūpa) are the two attributes of the Lord God (du’i īsa upādhī)—both are so great that they are beyond the reach of words (i.e. words cannot describe their glory and majesty), and both of them are without a beginning or an end. This principle can only be understood by those who have the proper wisdom, and are enlightened enough to grasp it<sup>2</sup>. (2) while the Lord himself is like the ‘person’, literally an ‘obedient follower’ (anugāmī) who follows his Master.

It is easy to understand this philosophy. When anyone wishes to call a person or draw his attention, he calls out to the latter using his name, and then that person knows that he is being called and so he responds immediately. Hence, when a devotee or a worshipper remembers Lord Ram and wishes to invite the Lord or invoke his mercy and grace, he first remembers and invokes the Lord by his name, and then the Lord himself makes his presence felt and blesses the devotee or the worshipper. So therefore, the ‘Name’ (RAM) acquires precedence over the ‘Named’ (Lord Ram himself in a personified form).

There is another way of interpreting this verse. The ‘Name’ of the Lord, when pronounced, consists of a ‘sound’ that represents the invisible, cosmic and universal form of the Lord just like OM that represents the cosmic Consciousness which is invisible and all-pervading. This cosmic, all-pervading, subtle and invisible form of the Lord represented by the sound of the letters ‘RAM’ revealed itself in the physical grosser form of Lord Ram, a form which is like any other human being.

Even from the perspective of creation, first the invisible, all-encompassing, all-pervading and macrocosmic form of ‘Prakriti’ or Nature appeared, and then came into being its microcosmic visible form as individual entities that formed the infinite maze that constituted the vast grid of creation. Similarly, first comes the basic letters that form the name of an individual, the letters that combine to form a word (the ‘name’— nāma) that would identify that individual, and then comes the individual himself (the ‘named’— nāmī).

In this scenario, the ‘name’ of Lord Ram (nāma) is deemed to be senior or superior to the Lord’s ‘physical form’ (nāmī) because of a variety of reasons. For instance, the name of the Lord can be remembered and invoked at anytime by anyone, and it immediately grants relief to the worshipper or the devotee as it is a powerful spiritual Mantra which is a divine spiritual formula that possesses unique cosmic powers and dynamism that produce instantaneous results of astounding proportions when a person invokes it. On the other hand, the physical form of Lord Ram would have its own practical limitations by the virtue of it being a physical gross body (as compared to the ‘name’ which is extremely subtle by its very nature, because it is merely a ‘sound’ that exists in ether and covers the entire space that is available to it).

<sup>2</sup>This verse draws from the eclectic metaphysical philosophy of the Upanishads which says that the divine word OM is a sound representation of the vibrations produced by the cosmic Consciousness, and its manifested form is known as Brahm, the Supreme Being. To wit, Brahm is a personified form of OM representing supreme Consciousness at the macrocosmic and the subtlest level of creation. The entire creation is a revelation of this Brahm. To wit, when we deal with this Brahm at the microcosmic level of creation, we talk of the individual living being known as the Jiva and his individual Atma or soul which is the Jiva’s individual identity that is specific to him. This unique identity of the Jiva is represented in the form of the Jiva’s personal name. So therefore we say that the Name and the Form are the two aspects of the same entity. In the case of Lord Ram, his divine Name ‘RAM (Rāma or Raam)’ and his physical form by which we know and recognize him are the same thing because they refer to the same Lord.

And who is this ‘Lord’? He is not any ordinary prince or king or human being even though he was born in a human form. The fact is that he is the Supreme Lord of the World, a personified form of the invisible supreme Brahm and of the equally invisible and supreme cosmic Consciousness. This latter entity, i.e. the cosmic Consciousness, is indescribable and beyond comprehension; it is beyond the purview of the mind and the reach of the intellect. So it is said that the Name and the Form that refers to Lord Ram are beyond understanding; they are infinite and eternal like Brahm and supreme Consciousness. Only those who are wise are able to understand the significance of this principle. For the ignorant and the less initiated, Lord Ram is merely a great king who ruled over an ancient kingdom known by the name of Ayodhya. They don't know who the Lord actually was.]

को बड़ छोट कहत अपराधू । सुनि गुन भेदु समुझिहहिं साधू ॥ ३ ॥
देखिअहिं रूप नाम आधीना । रूप ग्यान नहिं नाम बिहीना ॥ ४ ॥

kō barā chōṭa kahata aparādhū. suni guna bhēdu samujhihahim sādhu. 3.
dēkhi'ahim rūpa nāma ādhinā. rūpa gyāna nahim nāma bihīnā. 4.

Both the 'name' and the 'form' of the Lord are of equal importance. So it would be improper and impudent to call any one of them as being greater or lesser in importance than the other. However, saints understand the subtle difference between the two (as has been explained in the preceding verses herein above) after hearing or taking into consideration their merits, virtues and glories<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Forms are visible manifestations of the entity that is known by a particular name, and hence the 'form' is dependent on the 'name'. Therefore, the 'name' acquires precedence over the 'form', because without the name of any person or thing one cannot know or visualise or think about that person's or thing's physical existence in a given form. To wit, without knowing the name it is not possible to identify and relate with a particular person<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, it is wrong to call one or the other as being superior or inferior. Only pious souls or Sadhus will understand this secret after hearing and understanding the essence of the metaphysical philosophy behind them as has been explained in the preceding verses.

<sup>2</sup>When we say a particular name, say that of our son, his picture immediately comes to our mind. Therefore, the 'image' or the 'physical form' of the son is directly dependent upon his 'name'. When we talk about a person by the name of 'Ram', his physical form, characters, virtues, nature and other attributes immediately come to our mind. When we mention 'Ram' we think of 'Ram', and not of anybody else who is not Ram.

Suppose we see a stranger and wish to establish an abiding relationship with him. We ask him his or her name. Otherwise it becomes absolutely impossible to relate to, or remember and establish contact with that person in the future. We can remember a stranger's face, but how can we identify him and tell others about him if they too wish to have contact with him if we don't know his name? And once the stranger's name is known, he becomes a familiar person to us in the future. So therefore it is deduced that 'name' takes precedence over 'form'.]

 सुमिरिअ नाम रूप बिनु देखें । आवत हृदयँ सनेह बिसेषें ॥ ६ ॥

rūpa bisēṣa nāma binu jānēm. karatala gata na parahim pahicānēm. 5.
 sumiri'a nāma rūpa binu dēkhēm. āvata hr̥dayam' sanēha bisēṣēm. 6.

A person cannot be identified and known without first knowing his name though he may be in front of our eyes. (5)

But if the name of a person is known and when we remember that name, then even without seeing that person physically as soon as that name is mentioned we can immediately identify the person and remember his characteristic and attributes. His picture flashes in the mind even though he is not physically present at the place. And if that person is someone who is near and dear to our heart, then the mere mention or remembrance of his name would immediately evokes affection and love for him. (6)

[Note—The idea expressed in these verses is simple and straightforward. It means that when a devotee invokes the holy 'name' of Lord Ram, then the Lord's divine glories and his majestic powers immediately come to the mind as do his story and the 'physical form' that has been described in the scriptures, even though the devotee has not personally seen the Lord in a physical form.

As soon as the name of Lord Ram is said, the listener draws a mental picture of the Lord that he has come to know of by the reading and hearing of the scriptures.

Hence, the mere remembrance or invocation of the holy Name of Lord Ram helps the devotee to feel the presence of the Lord near him. To wit, the 'name' of the Lord helps the devotee to establish a direct contact with the Lord himself. It is like a bridge between the Lord and the devotee; it is like a communication channel between the two of them!

Since in this case the 'name' belongs to Lord Ram who is very dear to the devotee, so as soon as the Lord's name is remembered or invoked, the devotee feels a surge of affectionate emotions for Lord Ram surging in his heart. The devotee is filled with joy and ecstasy by simply remembering the holy Name of Lord Ram even though the Lord is not actually present near him in a physical form.]

नाम रूप गति अकथ कहानी । समुझत सुखद न परति बखानी ॥ ७ ॥
 अगुन सगुन बिच नाम सुसाखी । उभय प्रबोधक चतुर दुभाषी ॥ ८ ॥

nāma rūpa gati akatha kahānī. samujhata sukhada na parati bakhānī. 7.
 aguna saguna bica nāma susākhī. ubhaya prabōdhaka catura dubhāṣī. 8.

The mystery of the greatness of story of the 'Name' and the 'Form' cannot be so easily told (as it is mystical and profound in nature). Though it is delightful and fascinating to understand their relationship, it is difficult to explain it. [To wit, the relationship between the 'name' and the 'form' of Lord Ram is a complex one, and it cannot be outlined by words so easily; it has to be understood by application of the mind, and it can be understood by intelligence and wisdom alone.] (7)

The 'Name' is an intermediary between the Supreme Being who is 'formless', all-pervading, invisible, cosmic, unqualified and attributeless, and the Lord's divine revelation in which has a 'Form' which is visible, has its own unique qualities and attributes.

The 'Name' of the Lord is like a clever interpreter who reveals the Truth of the visible 'Form' that the Lord had assumed in order to make his primarily sublime, subtle, invisible and attributeless cosmic form made accessible to his devotees so that they can easily relate themselves to him and feel closer to their beloved Lord. [To wit, The holy Name of the Lord, i.e. the word 'RAM' ('Rāma' or 'Raam'), is an intermediary between the Supreme Being and his divine revelation in the physical form as Lord Ram.] (8)

[Note—The complexities of the relationship between the Lord's holy Name and his divine form and their inter-dependence have been explained earlier in notes appended to Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that follow Doha no. 20 herein above.

To put in simple words, the holy 'Name' of Lord Ram is a bridge that helps to establish a link between the Lord's cosmic form as the Supreme Being and his visible 'form' that is easily known, accessible and understandable, the 'form' of the Lord as a human being known by the name of 'Ram'.

The holy Name of the Lord, i.e. the word 'RAM' ('Rāma' or 'Raam'), is an intermediary between the Supreme Being and his divine revelation in the physical form as Lord Ram.

Now, when it is said that "it has to be understood by application of the mind, and it can be understood by intelligence and wisdom alone" it is meant that only a wise man would know the Truth of who Lord Ram actually is. For the lesser wise souls, those who lack wisdom, enlightenment and knowledge of the essence and philosophy of the scriptures, Lord Ram is some great King of an ancient kingdom of Ayodhya. But for those who are wiser and knowledgeable, Lord Ram is a personified form of the Lord of the World, the manifested form of the Supreme Being.

So therefore, the 'name' of the Lord, i.e. the word 'RAM' ('Rāma' or 'Raam'), would immediately remind the wise of the Supreme Being himself. When they use the name 'Ram', they think of the 'Lord of the World', instead of some ancient great King or Emperor who ruled over some mighty kingdom or empire.

Thus, for a wise and enlightened person, the repetition of the 'name' of the Lord, i.e. the word RAM, becomes a spiritual exercise involving a sacred Mantra. To wit, wise and intelligent persons do Japa (repetition of some mystically empowered formula) when they repeat the seemingly ordinary word 'Ram', and this then becomes a means for attaining spiritual blessedness, bliss, peace, happiness, emancipation and salvation for them. For others who aren't wise and are foolish so, the same word 'Ram' remains merely the 'name' of some great person of this particular name who was a great King in some ancient time! The difference is so stark and obvious that even a blind won't miss it.]

तुलसी भीतर बाहेरहुँ जौं चाहसि उजिआर ॥ २१ ॥

dōhā.

rāma nāma manidīpa dharu jīha dēharīm dvāra.
tulasī bhītara bāhērahum̐ jaum̐ cāhasi ujī'āra. 21.

Tulsidas says that if you want 'light' both inside and outside of yourself (i.e. the virtues of spiritual awareness, self-realisation, enlightenment and knowledge of your own 'truthful self' known as the Atma or the soul which is pure consciousness on the one hand, and of the universal Truth about the essential nature of the Atma or the 'self' as being an image of the Parmatma or the cosmic Self which is nothing but the cosmic Consciousness that has revealed itself as the individual's Atma)— then you should keep the self-illuminated gem or a lamp symbolized by Lord Ram's holy Name on the doorway or the threshold of your mouth (i.e. your lips)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 21)

The holy Name of Lord Ram would clean the inner-self and shine light into the darkness of the heart and mind so that the spiritual gloom of ignorance and delusions are removed, and instead there is illumination of self-realisation that entitles the devotee to experience the bliss and joy that comes from deep within his own self, and which in turn makes his external life full of joy and happiness in this world. The devotee feels carefree and delightful that Lord Ram is always with him to take care of his spiritual and worldly needs, day in and day out, in thick and thin, in storm and sunshine, come what may. The devotee is rid of all his worries, distresses, and other kinds of torments.

Even as ghosts and phantoms run away when there is light, all sorts of delusions and horrors of life that would otherwise dominate the Spirit and keep it subdued take to their heels when a person invokes the holy Name of Lord Ram and chants it constantly with his tongue. Nay, not only that, even remembering the holy Name suffices to light up the inner-self and chase away darkness from the hidden chambers of the heart and the mind.

The 'mouth' is the only opening of the body by which a person communicates or interacts with the external world. It is also the opening by which he eats and drinks to sustain life inside his own self. So if this opening is well illuminated with the help of a lighted lantern symbolizing Lord Ram's holy Name that is kept aloft on the tongue, thieves, scoundrels and mischief-mongers symbolizing all sorts of worldly evils and sins and negative thoughts would dare not enter a person's inner-self and cause peril for him. Just like we need light to see what we eat and drink, and avoid things that would make us sick if eaten or drunk, the holy Name of Lord Ram stands as a guard to protect us against things that are demeaning, bad and foul for our soul.

The idea expressed in this Doha has been reiterated elsewhere also. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 120.

The following verses further elaborate on this theme.]

चौ०. नाम जीहँ जपि जागहिं जोगी । बिरति बिरंचि प्रपंच बियोगी ॥ १ ॥

ब्रह्मसुखहि अनुभवहिं अनूपा । अकथ अनामय नाम न रूपा ॥ २ ॥

nāma jīham̐ japi jāgahim̐ jōgī. birati birañci prapañca biyōgī. 1.
brahma sukhahi anubhavahim̐ anūpā. akatha anāmaya nāma na rūpā. 2.

Yogis (ascetics; mystics) who are full of dispassion and they possess the eclectic virtue of exemplary detachment and renunciation from this gross material world. They thereby enjoy happiness and profound bliss because they chant Lord Ram's holy Name with their tongue. In this way, they remain awake and delightful in a dark and foreboding night (symbolized by delusions that pervade this gross mundane world in which all other creatures are either restless in their dreams while they sleep, or remain restless and terrified because of the shadows of ghosts and phantoms that they see even if they are awake)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

They are always involved in contemplation and meditation upon the supreme Brahm, and experience the bliss of Brahm-realisation. This Brahm cannot be described in words, is incomparable, nameless and formless. Therefore, the bliss of Brahm-realisation also cannot be described in words, as it is not comparable to anything else that it can be understood. [To wit, it can be 'experienced and realised' at a subtle plane, but cannot be understood by logic at the grosser plane of the mundane world.]<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Ascetics and mystics remain aloof from the affairs of this gross world as they understand that all its charms are illusive and false. They focus on the 'Truth' instead, and they strive to find an eternal and truthful source of bliss, happiness and joy. This they find by chanting the holy Name of Lord Ram, and using it for meditation and contemplation. In this way, they attain a state of blissfulness and contentedness.

By saying that they are 'awake in this world' it is meant that they are aware of the perils of getting entangled in the web of delusions and their attendant miseries that are so characteristic of this gross transient world. They know that true happiness and peace would always elude them if they allow themselves to get involved in this world. So they keep a safe distance to avoid their boat being capsized.

Like an alert pilot who remains awake during the night while steering a ship across a rough sea, wise Yogis who chant Lord Ram's holy Name are able to steer the boat of their lives clear of all the crooked and perilous outcrops and sandbars and reefs and dense undergrowths that form the shoreline of this world in order to reach their spiritual destination safe and sound. To wit, they use the holy Name of Lord Ram as an illuminated boat that takes them across the high sea of this tumultuous world to their destination of freedom that grants emancipation and salvation to their soul. Such wise Yogis find eternal bliss and peace and happiness for themselves. The phantoms and ghosts of the night symbolized by this world do not terrify them.

These alert Yogis manage to steer their boat safely across the symbolic rough sea representing mundane life in this gross material world during a tempestuous night full of horrifying delusions, and of worldly temptations and torments? Well, they meditate upon Lord Ram by invoking his holy Name. This keeps them awake and well-oriented. It helps them keep their inner cool and overcome all anxiety about their fate. So their mind and heart are calm and rested and controlled, and by-and-by they easily reach their destination without any mishap.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 93 which say: "Everyone is fast asleep in the night made thick by the darkness of Maya symbolising worldly delusions, attachments and horrors. Only wise ascetics who are contemplative, have renounced all attachments with this world and think about the good of others are said to be awake in this night. Indeed, without gainsay and in all sooth, one must regard a creature as being awake in this world if he has completely distanced himself from all attachment with the material world. It is then that the light of self-realisation and wisdom dawns on the horizon of the creature's inner-self, and it is also only then that he begins to have abiding love, affection and devotion for the holy feet of Lord Ram."

We read a similar thing in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 56 which says: "Abandon the notion of mine and yours, of me and you, if you wish to wake up from sleep in the dark and foreboding night symbolized by the great delusions created by Moha (attachment, infatuation and longing)."

We read in Vinai Patrika, verse no. 140, stanza no. 2 that: "Worldly people remain entangled in a web of worldly ties and affairs, and they are so unfortunate that they never realize their folly as their mind never wakes up to the reality."

A similar idea is expressed in Kavita-wali, Uttar Kand, verse no. 31 which says: "In the night of youthfulness you have become enamoured of the pleasures of the senses (in the form of another person's woman). You do not get renunciation (or are not inspired) even after looking at the gate keepers of Yam (the God of Death and Hell) in the form of sorrows, diseases, separations and various losses that you witness happening all around you in this horrifying world. You have forgotten all the horrors of your previous life and those suffered by you in the past in this life itself due to attachments and delusions that surround you. Now it is dawn, so wake up and run away from all this great fear created by ignorance. The death and its attendant agonies in the shape of a sun have risen in the east represented by your old age. Oh you dud! You still don't wake up, how utterly stupid you are!"

<sup>2</sup>These wise Yogis invoke the holy Name of Lord Ram to attain the bliss of Brahm-realisation, which means 'self-realisation' because the true 'self' is known as the Atma or soul, and this Atma is a personified form of pure consciousness. This 'consciousness' that resides inside an individual is the same the cosmic Consciousness that pervades uniformly in this creation, and which is also manifested in the form of Brahm known as the Supreme Being. So therefore, realizing Brahm is equivalent to realizing one's own true 'self', and vice versa.

The Atma is a source of bliss and beatitude, and realizing this Atma makes the Yogi full of bliss and beatitude. And the medium by which it is made possible is the holy Name of Lord Ram. To wit, the name of the Lord acts as an intermediary between the Yogi and Brahm, and the Yogi attains blissfulness, beatitude and felicity right here in this life, and at the same time he is assured of deliverance, emancipation and salvation of his soul after death of the body.]

sādhaka nāma japahim laya lā'ēm'. hōhim sid'dha animādika pā'ēm'. 4.

Those who want to know (or discover) the Supreme Truth or the ultimate destination of the soul (gūr̥ḥa gati) are able to do so by chanting Lord Ram's divine and holy Name by their tongue. (3)

Spiritual seekers (sādhaka) who are sincere in their practice and are regularly absorbed in contemplation and meditation, achieve super-human mystical powers (hōhiṁ sid'dha animādika pā'ēm̐) simply by repeating the Lord's mystical name consistently, and with due concentration, devotion and faith (nāma japahiṁ laya lā'ēm̐). (4)

[Note—To wit, the holy Name of Lord Ram entitles the devotee to realize the Supreme Truth, as well as to attain mystical powers. The 'Supreme Truth' is about the true nature of the Atma, the pure conscious Soul. Lord Ram is a personified form of the cosmic Soul. So the Lord's holy Name enables the devotee to become enlightened enough to realize that his own Atma is a personified form of Lord Ram. It means that the Lord is not far away from him, but he resides in his own inner-being as the Atma.

Thus, all distance between the devotee and the Lord ends, and thus also ends the search for the Lord! And the name of the Lord repeated through the tongue while meditating becomes an instrument in this achievement.]

जपहिं नामु जन आरत भारी । मिटहिं कुसंकट होहिं सुखारी ॥ ५ ॥

राम भगत जग चारि प्रकारा । सुकृती चारिउ अनघ उदारा ॥ ६ ॥

japahiṁ nāmu jana ārata bhārī. miṭahiṁ kusaṅkaṭa hōhiṁ sukhārī. 5.
rāma bhagata jaga cāri prakārā. sukṛtī cārī'u anagha udārā. 6.

When even the most tormented, distressed and gravely suffering devotees do Japa with the holy Name of Lord Ram (i.e. when they mutter or invoke the Lord's name and constantly repeat it as a symbol of taking shelter behind its protective shield), then all their worst of calamities, miseries and troubles are eliminated, and they become happy and delighted. [To wit, greatly distressed devotees who chant Lord Ram's holy Name are relieved of all their distresses and torments. As a natural blessing of the Lord, they become happy and contented.] (5)

There are four kinds of devotees of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>, and all of them are deemed to be fortunate, blessed, virtuous, sinless and noble at heart. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four types of devotees are the following—(1) 'Aarta': There are two interpretation of this word. One refers to those who are extremely distressed and need immediate intervention of the Lord to help them overcome their sufferings. The other meaning refers to those devotees who are extremely eager to have an access to their Lord that they would go to any length to attain him. (2) 'Jigyasu': Those who are seekers of Truth, those who want to know and learn more about the Lord. (3) 'Artharthi': Those who worship the Lord so that their worldly desires are fulfilled as a blessing of the Lord. The word 'Artha' means wealth and prosperity. Hence, such devotees do not worship the Lord for any spiritual objective or because they love the Lord dearly, but because they hope that the Lord would fulfill their worldly desires to gain material welfare. And (4) ‘Gyani’: Those who are wise and have become realised and enlightened.

We observe here that there are four types of devotees who worship Lord Ram, and they have different reasons and motivations to do so. But all of them are said to be fortunate and blessed; all of them get merit for worshipping the Lord irrespective of why they worship him and why they invoke his holy Name. Why is it so?

The reason is this: On the one hand it is because of the graceful, kind, obliging and merciful nature of Lord Ram as he goes out of his way to extend his blessing even on those who may otherwise not deserve it simply because they have remembered the Lord and invoked his holy Name, and so it becomes obligatory on the part of the Lord that he must bless all those who worship him and remember his holy Name for whatever reason.

And on the other hand it is because the Lord’s holy Name is intrinsically purifying and so holy that no matter who invokes this name and remembers the Lord for whatever reason, the Lord ensures that his glorious name lives up to its reputation and does not fail to have its good, meritorious and positive effect on the person who utters it.

Lord Ram has said himself that: “Those who are sinful in their hearts and engrossed in sinful activities can never find interest in worshipping me and having devotion for me. Only those who have a pure and uncorrupt heart are able to come near me, for I do not like conceit, deceit, pretensions, falsehood and fraud”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 and 5 that precede Doha no. 44.

So therefore, notwithstanding for what reason a devotee worships Lord Ram, if he remembers the Lord and utters his holy Name then it is deemed that he is a noble soul as compared to others, and that his heart has a place for the Lord, and when the Lord dwells in the person’s heart then that person is deemed to be blessed and fortunate.

It is like the case of the sunshine—it benefits one and all; both the good and the evil men enjoy the same warmth and light of the sun irrespective of their personal character and nature. The sun does not differentiate between anyone.

Similarly, nectar would have its good effect and poison its bad upon all those who drink them. Neither nectar nor poison would differentiate between two persons based on whether one is good and the other is evil.]

cahū catura kahum̐ nāma adhārā. gyānī prabhuhi bisēṣi pi'ārā. 7.

cahum̐ juga cahum̐ śruti nāma prabhā'ū. kali bisēṣi nahim̐ āna upā'ū. 8.

All the four types of devotees are clever for they rely on Lord Ram's holy and all wish-fulfilling name. But out of these four, a ‘Gyani’ (the realised and enlightened one) is very dear to the Lord<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The glory and greatness of Lord Ram's holy and divine Name is well known and well established in all the four Yugs (eras of time)<sup>2</sup>, as well as in the four Vedas (Rig, Sam, Atharva and Yajur Veda).

In Kaliyug especially, there is no other means of salvation except taking recourse to the holy Name of Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 86, Lord Ram has said: “The entire creation and all its inhabitants were created by me, and I love all of them. Out of all the living beings, the humans are more dear to me. Amongst the humans, Brahmins (i.e. those who are learned and wise) are preferred by me. From amongst such Brahmins, I like those who are well versed in the Vedas and other scriptures. Out of them, I prefer those who actually follow the path shown by these scriptures and practice their teachings in their own lives, i.e. who lead a noble, pious and auspicious life, and not merely preach others. Out of such exalted souls, I prefer those who have renounced all attachment with this delusionary world and are wise and enlightened (“Gyani”). Out of ordinary Gyanis, I like those who “Vigyanis”, i.e. those who are exemplary in their conduct and highly spiritually elevated, enlightened and self-realised so much so that they can set an example for others to follow. And out of all such exalted, enlightened and self-realised souls, I love them who are my devotees, who love me unconditionally, and who realize that attaining me is the ultimate goal of all spiritual pursuits”.

<sup>2</sup>The cycle of creation and destruction have been divided into four segments, each called a ‘Yuga’. According to Hindu scriptures, there are four such Yugs in one cycle of creation and destruction. These four ‘Yugs’ or eras are the following: Satyug, Tretayug (when Lord Ram manifested on earth), Dwaparyug (the era of Lord Krishna), and Kaliyug (the present era in which we live).

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 102—to Doha no. 103. Now let us briefly read what it says:

“[Kaagbhusund, the saintly crow, told Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu—] Listen, oh the Enemy of Serpents (“byālāri”; Garud)! The age of Kali is virtually an abode of darkness symbolising sins, turpitude, evil and vices.

But inspite of all its shortcomings and drawbacks, all its degeneration, perversities and depravities, Kaliyug has one exceptional worthwhile quality (or kind of a ‘ray of hope at the end of the dark tunnel’)—and it is that during this age a creature is able to get freedom easily from the web of birth and death that is so characteristic of life in this mundane and mortal world. [How this is made possible is explained below in the verses that follow herein below.] (Doha no. 102-a)

The spiritual objectives of a creature, and the attainment of liberation and deliverance of his soul from the cycle of birth and death with its accompanying chain of endless horrors and miseries, that could be achieved by making a lot of strenuous efforts such as doing worship (of gods and elements of Nature visualised as deities that symbolised divine forces), various sacrifices and meditation etc. (pūjā makha aru jōga) during the (three) ages that preceded Kaliyug, viz. the Sata Yug, the Treta Yug, and the Dwapar Yug respectively—the same spiritual rewards and the same pristine pure and holy destination for the soul is attainable by the creature simply by relying on the holy Name of the Lord God (here referring to the holy and divine Name of Lord Ram, the revealed form of the Supreme Being). (102-b)

In the age known as ‘Sata Yug’ (which is the first of the four-yug cycle that constitutes one round of creation and destruction), more or less everyone was like an ascetic; they were wise, self-realised, enlightened and had spiritual wisdom.

During this period, a Jiva (a creature; a living being) could cross the vast and fathomless ocean-like world of transmigration (the endless cycle of birth and death) by meditating upon Lord Hari (the Supreme Being's cosmic all-pervading form). (Chaupai no. 1)

In the next era known as 'Treta Yug', men used to do various kinds of fire sacrifices and meritorious deeds. They attained liberation and deliverance (from the cycle of transmigration) by doing all such sacrifices and meritorious deeds selflessly and then offering whatever rewards that accrued due to such activities to the Lord God. [Since people did not wish to accept and enjoy any reward for their sacrifices they did, and offered all rewards of spiritual practices to the Lord God, their 'Parent', so when they died their soul did not have to re-enter the cycle of birth and death to enjoy the rewards that had been accumulated and become due to them by the virtue of their doing fire and other sacrifices during their previous life. Thus, at the time of death of the physical body, their soul got emancipation and salvation.] (Chaupai no. 2)

During the age of Dwapar (the third era), men could cross over the vast ocean-like world of birth and death by offering worship, reverence and homage to the holy feet of Lord Raghupati (Lord Ram). There was no other alternative way or option. (Chaupai no. 3)

Finally, during Kaliyug, it is simply by singing and narrating the divine glories of Lord Hari (Lord Ram) that men can find the end of (i.e. cross) the huge and seemingly endless ocean symbolising the cycle of birth and death. (Chaupai no. 4)

Indeed, in all sooth and without gainsay, in Kaliyug there is no (need for doing) Yoga (meditation), Yagya (fire and other sacrifices), and Gyan (having spiritual knowledge, being self-realised, acquiring wisdom and enlightenment).

The only source of spiritual succour and solace, the only basis by which one can derive joy and happiness is to sing hymns in praise of Lord Ram and his divinity, holiness and glories. (Chaupai no. 5)

Anyone who abandons all other hopes and stops relying on any other means to attain his spiritual objectives, and instead relies solely on worshipping Lord Ram and affectionately singing the Lord's hymns and glories --- (Chaupai no. 6)

--- Such a person is sure to cross this ocean-like world of birth and death; there is no doubt about it. [To wit, if a person relies only on worshipping Lord Ram and affectionately singing the hymns dedicated to the Lord that extol the Lord's glories, divinity and holiness, then it is sure that he will find liberation and deliverance for himself. He will not have to re-enter the cycle of birth and death.]

Forsooth and without gainsay, the astounding mystical powers that are inherent in Lord Ram's Name, and the spiritual significance of this holy, divine and sacred Name, is very evident and clearly manifested in the age of Kaliyug (more than any of the other three Yugs). (Chaupai no. 7)

There is one more wonderful and unique quality or glory of Kaliyug (that none of the other Yugs possessed)—and it is that during this age even if a person's mind and heart (i.e. his Mana) wishes to do some meritorious deed (though he may not be actually able to do it), he still gets the credit of it as if he has physically done that good deed. On the other hand, if a person merely thinks or wishes of doing some evil deed but actually does not do it, then the sin and taint (and therefore the punishment) associated with such bad or evil deed would not accrue to him. (Chaupai no. 8)

There is no other age as compared to Kaliyug if a person has faith in its rare virtues and capabilities (i.e. its ability to provide a person with the chance to attain his spiritual objectives most easily as has been enumerated in the foregoing verses herein above).

And one such rare ability or boon that Kaliyug possesses is this: A person can easily cross this vast and endless ocean-like world of transmigration known as 'Bhava' by simply singing (remembering, reciting and hearing) the divine glories and holy praises of Lord Ram. [To wit, by simply remembering the sacred story of Lord Ram that describes the Lord's glories and the deeds done by him during his sojourn in the mortal world, and understanding the hidden spiritual message that this story contains, a seeker can attain spiritual joy, happiness, blessedness and beatitude that would have required him to undertake many elaborate rituals and strenuous efforts in all other eras that preceded Kaliyug.] (Doha no. 103-a)

There are said to be four pillars or pedestals of Dharma—i.e. there are four ways in which one can gain spiritual merit. [These four ways are (i) Satya—truthfulness; (ii) Daya—mercy and compassion; (iii) Tapa—austerity and penance; and (iv) Daan—making charity and giving alms.]

In Kaliyug, the one pillar that is deemed to be the chief one is the act of doing 'Daan'—i.e. giving alms and making charity selflessly as a means of getting spiritual rewards or accumulating spiritual merit. No matter in which way one does 'Daan', it would always serve him in good stead, it would always be conducive for his spiritual good and welfare. (Doha no. 103-b)"

Refer also to Chaupai line no. 2 that follows Doha no. 22 herein below.]

Those who have tasted the juice of Lord Ram's devotion without hankering for any sort of desires are deemed to have made their mind into a fish which floats in the pond of nectar made of the lovable divine name of the Lord. (Doha no. 22)

[Note—To wit, the mind of such devotees thinks of nothing else except enjoying the nectar that drips by repeating the Lord's holy Name. The ecstasy and thrill that comes with such repetition completely overwhelms them so much so that their condition becomes one like that of a fish which would die as soon as it is removed from water.

Just like the fish which would exchange everything for water, a true devotee of Lord Ram would exchange every joy and happiness attainable in this world for the sake of devotion for Lord Ram—for he knows the latter's value and importance. He knows that nothing in this world would ever compare with the joy and happiness and bliss that come by having devotion for Lord Ram and repeating his holy Name with love and faith. He knows that the while the best and the most charming attractions of the world are transient in nature and do not give any worthwhile joy, the holy Name of the Lord and his remembrance is a source of abiding bliss and blessedness.]

mōnrēm mata baṛa nāmu duhū tēm. ki'ē jēhim juga nija basa nija bütēm. 2.

The Supreme Being has two aspects—one is attributeless and unqualified aspect, and the other is a qualified aspect that has known attributes. The former is called 'Nirguna', and the latter is known as 'Saguna'. Both these forms of the Lord are beyond words as they cannot be described; they are unreachable by the mind as they are sublime and divine by nature; and they are peerless and unique in the sense that they have no beginning nor an end<sup>1</sup>. (1)

In my (Tulsidas') view, Lord Ram's holy Name is greater and more powerful than both the above forms of the Supreme Being<sup>2</sup>. [To wit, the holy Name of Lord Ram is far superior to and more important for a devotee than both the Saguna and the Nirguna forms of the Lord as it is easily accessible and helps to establish a bridge between the devotee and the Supreme Being who is extremely difficult to find and attain. The holy Name of the Lord helps the devotee to avoid getting confused and entangled in the maze of scriptural philosophies about which form of the Lord, the Saguna or the Nirguna, are best for one's spiritual objectives.]

In the current era of Kaliyug it has established its authority and glory by the virtue of its spiritual and mystical powers as well as its fame as being the most effective instrument that can provide a creature with liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 91—to Doha no. 92. Here, the greatness and majesty of Lord Ram and his form have been described. It is said that the glory of the Lord's name, form and stories are so astounding, vast and great that there is no comparison with anything else; no one can ever fathom them, even the scriptures have failed in this attempt. The Lord's glory is as fathomless and immeasurable as the ocean. So therefore, Lord Ram is compared to his own self, so say the Vedas!

In Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 118 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it, Lord Shiva too reiterates this view that Lord Ram is a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, and he is eternal, and without a beginning or an end.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chanda line nos. 13-14 that precede Doha no. 113 where Indra, the king of Gods, has also expressed a similar idea while offering his prayers to Lord Ram. He says: "There are some who worship the Lord's invisible, all-pervading cosmic form known as Brahm, a form that has been praised and endorsed in the Vedas and other scriptures as the Lord's primary and truthful form. But howbeit, I find the Lord's visible manifestation as Lord Ram." ; —to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 6.

 ubhaya agama juga sugama nāma tēm̐. kahē'um̐ nāmu baṛa brahma rāma tēm̐. 5.

Elders should not take this assertion of mine as being a boastful sermon. What I (Tulsidas) am saying is out of my own conviction that comes out of my own personal experience and observation. I have firm faith in what I say, and my mind is convinced of its truth and authenticity. (3)

The two aspects of God (Nirguna and Saguna) are like to the two aspects of fire—one aspect of fire which is invisible and latent in wood (which is the Nirguna aspect standing for the invisible and cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as Brahm), and the other aspect that is visible to all of us (the Saguna aspect that stands for the Lord's manifestation on earth as Lord Ram). This is the real wisdom of which the wise men talk about. (4)

It is true that both the forms of the Lord (as Brahm, the Supreme Being, and Lord Ram, the former's manifested form) are difficult to access, but the holy Name of the Lord is easily accessible to one and all. And the best part is that the name helps one to have access to both the forms of the Lord.

That is why I (Tulsidas) say that the Lord's holy Name is greater and more important than either Brahm or Lord Ram himself<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The dilemma is that both Brahm and his manifested form are usually inaccessible to an ordinary seeker, whereas with this wisdom that the holy Name of the Lord is synonymous with the Lord, that the holy Name and the Lord are one, it is possible for everyone to have an easy access to the Lord. Hence Tulsidas asserts that the divine Name of the Lord is greater than the two aspects of God himself.

The formless aspect of the Lord is too abstract to be understood by an ordinary person and so the Lord goes out of his reach. The formed aspect of the Lord is limited to a specific era of time or place, and it is not possible for all to be physically present where the physical form of the Lord lives. But if one develops the wisdom that the holy Name of the Lord can be taken anywhere at any time and under any circumstance, and that the Name represents both the Nirguna Lord as well as the Saguna Lord, then the Lord becomes most easily accessible to him day and night.

When it is said that “the name helps to establish access to both the forms of the Lord, the Nirguna and the Saguna forms”, it is meant that the holy Name of the Lord can be used as a Mantra while meditating on Brahm and derive bliss and ecstasy of self-realisation as is done by ascetics (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 22 herein above), and it is used by devotees of all dispensations when they invoke Lord Ram by repeating his name to derive full benefit as if the Lord himself has come to bless them (refer: Chaupai line no. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 22 herein above).

Even a child can utter the word “RAM”. So it is extremely easy to use the holy Name of the Lord as a means to derive full spiritual benefits that are equivalent to having direct access to the Lord himself.

It has been said earlier that the name of the Lord acts as a bridge between the devotee and the Lord himself. Brahm had revealed himself in the form of Lord Ram ages ago in the era known as Tretayug, but even today a common man can feel the divine presence of the Lord just by remembering his holy Name with love, devotion and faith. Refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 21 herein above.

It may not be possible for someone who is very dear to our heart to be always be with us at all times of the day in our lives, but when we hear that person’s name his sweet memory immediately brings him close and makes his presence felt in a symbolic way. So is the case with Lord Ram—even though the Lord is not physically present today with us, but if we call out his holy Name with due devotion and faith then his divine presence can be felt and experienced.]

Brahm, the Supreme Being, is eternal, attributeless and unqualified; he is all-pervading, universal and without a parallel. He is the supreme and absolute Truth, the pure Consciousness, and the center from where ‘bliss’ originates. (6)

Even though such a divine and holy Lord lives in everyone's heart as his Atma or soul (which is pure consciousness and an image of the cosmic Consciousness that Brahm represents)—it is such an irony and a pity that the people of this world are still miserable, tormented and unhappy. [It is because they do not realise that the Lord who is a fount of bliss and beatitude resides in their own heart, and not outside somewhere.] (7)

If Lord Ram's divine Name is evaluated properly like a jeweller evaluates a gem, it would dawn upon the seeker that it is like a priceless piece of jewel which can act as a panacea for all his worldly miseries and torments. [Just like a priceless piece of gem can make a man instantly wealthy and help him overcome all his financial difficulties, the name of the Lord can help him overcome all his worldly and spiritual problems, and give him everlasting peace and happiness. But it can only happen when he realises its importance and value.] (8)

I (Tulsidas) solemnly affirm that, in all sooth and without gainsay, Lord Ram's holy Name is far superior to the Nirguna (invisible, attributeless, unqualified, all-pervading and cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as Brahm).

Now, I shall tell you how the 'name' is greater than the divine incarnation of Brahm as Lord Ram. (Doha no. 23)

[Note—In the verses that follow herein below, a comparison would be now made between the Nirguna aspect of the Supreme Being known as Brahm, and his Saguna counterpart known as Lord Ram. And then finally it would be explained how and why the 'name' of the Lord is superior to both of them.

चौ०. राम भगत हित नर तनु धारी । सहि संकट किए साधु सुखारी ॥ १ ॥

rāma bhagata hita nara tanu dhārī. sahi saṅkaṭa ki'ē sādhu sukhārī. 1.
nāmu saprēma japata anayāsā. bhagata hōhīm muda maṅgala bāsā. 2.

[In the verses that follow now, Tulsidas has emphasised the glory, the greatness and the spiritual importance of Lord Ram's name that is holy and divine by comparing it with that of Lord Ram's personal form and personal presence, and this comparison makes it obvious that while the physical form of Lord Ram has its own limitations and it benefited a limited numbers of devotees who lived during the period of the Lord's manifestation on earth, but the Lord's holy Name has an eternal presence as it transcends the limits of time and era, and has been providing protection, blessedness and spiritual rewards to countless devotees from time immemorial, and would continue to do so for eternity.

So whereas only a fortunate few could benefit from Lord Ram's personal presence during his incarnation, the Lord's holy Name is easily available to the living beings in all eras of time, the past, the presence and the future. As compared to the physical limitations of all sorts that the Supreme Being was subjected to in his form as Lord Ram by the virtue of his having to assume a body of a human being which inherently has many limitations, the holy Name of the Lord is free from all such inhibitions and limitations as it is in the form of a 'sound' that has no physical body that would impose any physical barriers or limitations upon it.

The holy Name of Lord Ram is like the cosmic sound of OM that is produced by the cosmic Consciousness that pervades and fills the entire space of creation; it can be pronounced at any time of the day and night by anyone and under any circumstance—and its spiritual rewards are there for all to have, without any discrimination. The holy Name of Lord Ram has been granting liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to all since time immemorial, is doing so now, and would continue to do so in the future as well.

To wit, in all sooth and without gainsay, while Lord Ram could bless only some fortunate ones who came in direct contact with him, the Lord's holy Name touches the lives and souls of all living being in all phases of time and creation.

So therefore one deduces that the spiritual value of Lord Ram's holy Name has far greater reach and far more importance than Lord Ram's physical form itself.]

The Supreme Being (who is without a form) had assumed a human form as Lord Ram for the sake and the good of his devotees, and he had to suffer a lot in order to make those who were pious and saintly happy<sup>1</sup>. (1)

On the other hand, when the devotees of the Lord repeat his holy Name with due love, faith, devotion and dedication, they unwittingly, even without being aware of it themselves, become an abode of abiding happiness and eternal joy because the Lord's glorious name is inherently and by its very nature a provider of blessedness, bliss, auspiciousness, beatitude and felicity of the best kind to one and all without any discrimination<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the cosmic form of the supreme Brahm. He had to assume the form of a human being and come down to earth when Mother Earth and the Gods prayed to him to do so to free the earth and protect its good inhabitants from the terror and horror unleashed by the demons who symbolised all hues of evil, sins, cruelty, tyranny, perversities et al one can ever imagine of.

This entire episode—why Lord Vishnu came down to earth in the form of Lord Ram—has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 176—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 189.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 13 where the saint-poet Tulsidas tells us that Lord Ram was actually a manifested and visible form of the Supreme Being who has a cosmic form that is invisible, all-pervading and all-encompassing; (ii) Doha no. 51 where Lord Shiva has endorsed this view himself while trying to convince his consort Sati about the glory and the divinity of Lord Ram; (b) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 72 where the saintly crow Kaagbhusund has reiterated the same point before Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu who had approached the former to remove some doubts about Lord Ram's divinity and glories that had befuddled his mind.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, though the Supreme Being had to suffer great hardships himself when he took a visible form as Lord Ram, the Lord's divine Name is so grand, mystically powerful and divine that all those who say it or even remember it are freed from all sorts of sufferings and miseries in this world. They become a virtual treasury of bliss and happiness of a pristine kind.

The fact that Lord Ram had to undergo sufferings like an ordinary human being is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 211.

It was necessary for the Lord to undergo suffering like an ordinary man in order to conform to the Laws of Creation which the Supreme Lord had himself laid down—that all living beings who have a gross body are subjected to sufferings of some kind, and it is how a person deals with these sufferings and takes them in his stride, how he maintains his balance of mind and heart, how he adheres to and upholds the laws of righteousness, probity and propriety in the face of the greatest of challenges, how he remains calm and unruffled during the greatest of adversities and lows of life, how dispassionate and detached he is from the grossness of the material world and its emotional upheavals, and how inspite of his personal miseries and torments he gives warmth and love to all around him are some of the factors that would distinguish him from the rest. We find in the life of Lord Ram that all these and countless other such noble and glorious virtues were exemplified by him.]

Lord Ram had redeemed a single woman (a reference to Ahilya, the wife of sage Gautam who had turned into a stone due to a curse)<sup>1</sup>, but his holy and divine Name (Ram, Rāma or Raam) corrected the fate and the spiritual destiny of millions of wicked souls<sup>2</sup>. (3)

For the good of sage Viswamitra, Lord Ram had slayed a demonic woman named Tadka, who was a daughter of Suketu Yaksha, along with her son's army<sup>3</sup>. (4)

But Lord Ram's holy Name destroys a devotee's vain hopes arising out of worldly delusions that cause him immense grief, that torment him endlessly, and create sorrows for him, just like the rays or the light of the Sun destroys the darkness of night<sup>4</sup>. (5)

She was a devout and chaste wife of sage Gautam. According to legend, once it so happened that Indra, the lustful king of Gods, fell prey to the beauty of Ahilya, and attempted to outrage her modesty by assuming the form of her husband while the sage had gone out to the river to attend to his daily chores. When the sage returned, Indra tried to escape from the hermitage, but the sage caught him red-handed. So outraged was the sage that he cursed both his chaste wife Ahilya as well as the culprit Indra. He cursed Ahilya that she would become a stone. But when he found out that Indra, the king of Gods, was the real culprit who had deceitfully cheated his wife of her loyalty towards her husband, and that Ahilya was not to be blamed, the sage cursed Indra vehemently. Gautam realised that Indra had been so overcome with a rage of passion that he forgot all senses of ethics, propriety and probity and had assumed the form of the sage to cheat Ahilya. So the sage had then blessed her that when Lord Vishnu incarnated on the earth as Sri Ram, he would visit her place and would touch her with the holy dust of his feet, at which she will be absolved of her sins and her curse, and will resume her original form and come back to heaven. The sage promised her that after her penances and repentance, when she will be purified by Sri Ram's holy feet, he will accept her back as his wife.

Meanwhile, the sage vehemently cursed Indra that his body would be full of holes representing eyes, as he was so lascivious and promiscuous that he could see nothing but a woman's vagina, a virtual 'hole' in the body, with his lustful eyes, which were also equal to a 'hole'. So, let him see whatever he wishes with his whole body, and let the world know about his deformed mentality when it watches him with thousands of holes on his body. As a result, Indra's body became ugly by being perforated with thousands of tiny holes resembling the scars of Chicken-pox.

The story of Ahilya's liberation from her horrifying curse is this: When Lord Ram, accompanied by his brother Laxman, was on his way to Janakpur with sage Vishwamitra to attend the bow-breaking ceremony where later on he would marry Janka's daughter Sita, the Lord saw a rock or a boulder, perhaps shaped like a lady, lying alone and forlorn in an abandoned hermitage. This aroused the Lord's curiosity. When he enquired about it, the sage told him the story of Ahilya and how she became a stone. The sage asked Lords Ram to be gracious upon her and free her from her torments by removing the curse by touching her with the dust of his holy feet. As soon as the Lord touched that rock with his foot, Ahilya was revived. She had tears rolling down her eyes, and with a bowed head and heart overflowing with gratitude and joy she offered her prayers and obeisance to Lord Ram. Then she went back to heaven to be reunited with her husband, sage Gautam.

This story of Ahilya's liberation is narrated by Goswami Tulsidas in—(a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 210—to Doha 211; (b) Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse nos. 57-60; (c) Janki Mangal, verse nos. 39-40; (d) Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, Baal Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 19-61; and (e) Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, from Sarga/Canto 48, verse nos. 14-33—to Sarga/Canto 49, verse nos. 1-21.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, the holy Name of Lord Ram is so pure and mystically powerful that it provides liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to countless creatures. The mere utterance of the holy Name of the Lord frees all the living beings from their wickedness, and if they regularly invoke it then their entire being becomes pure and holy as those of saints and pious people.

<sup>3</sup>When sage Vishwamitra was returning to his hermitage with Lord Ram and his brother Laxman, he was attacked by a demoness named Tadka. Lord Ram slayed her with a single arrow. This event is mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 209.

Then when the sage got engaged in his fire sacrifice, Lord Ram and Laxman stood guard. At that time, a huge army of demons led by Marich and Subahu, who were kin of Tadka, attacked. They were led by Marich and Subahu. In the battle that followed, Lord Ram and Laxman eliminated all the demons, but Marich was shot by a head-less arrow of Lord Ram that did not kill him but flung him to a remote island in the middle of the ocean. In this way, Lord Ram provided joy to sage Vishwamitra and other sages by helping them complete their fire sacrifice. This event is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 210.

<sup>4</sup>The darkness of the night is compared to the many fears that torment a creature in this world, and Lord Ram's holy Name is likened to the sunlight that instantly removes this darkness. To wit, Lord Ram's holy Name removes all the fears that cause immense and endless distress to a devotee, and it assures him of constant protection throughout his life.]

Lord Ram transformed only one inhospitable forest called Dandaka into one that was full of charm and beauty<sup>2</sup>, whereas his divine Name has purified the minds of numerous devotees and made them glorious and praiseworthy. (7)

The son (i.e. Lord Ram) who born in the line of glorious Kings of the Raghu Dynasty of the kingdom of Ayodhya (raghunandana) had crushed only a handful of demons<sup>3</sup>, but his powerful Name crushes all the sorrows, pains, miseries and torments during the era of Kali (which is rich in negativity and its accompanying pains and miseries). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 240—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 6.—to Doha no. 264.

Briefly, the story is this: The King of Janakpur was known as Janak, and he had a daughter named Sita. He had in his custody an ancient bow that was kept by Lord Shiva with his ancestors generations ago. That bow had become fragile and useless even for Lord Shiva, and was of no use for Janak either. But it was formidable and strong and heavy nonetheless as it belonged the Shiva. So in order to judge who is the strongest, the most powerful and courageous man in this world whom he could pick to be his daughter's groom, Janak decided that whosoever broke this bow would marry Sita. So he declared a 'Bow Breaking Ceremony' in which all the great princes, kings and warriors of that era were invited. Some came by invitation, and some came on their own to try their luck, as everyone had heard of Sita's matchless beauty and charm. In the competition that followed, no one could as much as move the great bow an inch, what to talk of lifting and breaking it. By-and-by, Lord Ram broke the bow and married Sita.

<sup>2</sup>During his stay in the forest, Lord Ram had spent some time in the most inhospitable part of it that was called Dandak. It was cursed by sage Sukracharya, and so it became barren. Lord Ram lived here on the banks of river Godavari at a place that was green and had large trees of five kinds, giving it the name of Panchavati—the 'garden of five trees'. Here, Lord Ram had met the old king of birds known as Jatayu, and he had blessed the many sages and hermits who lived here in seclusion to carry on with their spiritual objectives undisturbed by the hustle and bustle of the populated parts of the world. The Lord's presence in this otherwise barren part of the forest had transmuted it into a verdant and vibrant forest full of greenery and fruit bearing trees. The Lord's holy presence had also blessed the sages and hermits who dwelled there. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 14.

It was here in the Dandak forest that the demoness named Supernakha had tried to play fools with Lord Ram by assuming the form of a beautiful lady and lure him to marry her. At this pervert, sinful and unrighteous move of her, the Lord had got her nose and ears chopped off by Laxman. This event ultimately led to the abduction of Sita by the demon king Ravana, and the ruinous war of Lanka.

<sup>3</sup>When Supernakha was deformed, her cousin brothers Khar and Dushan had attacked Lord Ram with a huge army of demons to take revenge. The Lord had slayed them all then. Besides these demons there were many more who were slayed by the Lord personally. So this verse means that while it is true that Lord Ram had personally eliminated many demons representing evil, vile and sinful forces in the world, it is the Lord's holy Name that takes the trophy and the glory because it has been continuously eliminating countless such symbolic demons down the ages and providing delight and happiness to devotees by eliminating their fears and miseries in this world.]

Raghu-Nath (the Lord of king Raghu's dynasty; Lord Ram) gave immortality to only a few faithful devotees of his, such as Sabari (the old woman)<sup>1</sup> and Giddha (a vulture called Jatau)<sup>2</sup>, whereas the Lord's holy Name has delivered, liberated and provided salvation and emancipation to numerous lowly creatures who had no hope of ever getting delivered from their miserable lives—a fact that is well known and lauded even by the Vedas which sing (extol and repeatedly stress) the greatness and the glory of the holy Name of Lord Ram. (Doha no. 24)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram had provided liberation and deliverance to an old, low-caste lady named Sabari (or Shabari) who lived alone in the forest and was eagerly waiting for the Lord's arrival. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 34—to Doha no. 36.

Her story in brief is this: According to the story of Ramayana, Shabari was a woman belonging to a forest tribe called 'Shabari'. This tribe was classified as Shudras or lower caste, and sustained themselves by collecting and selling honey and fruits from the forest trees. Being of a low caste, she is said have been ostracized by others. She served a sage named Matanga very devotedly. The sage was a realised soul, and so pleased was he with her devotion and service that he blessed her at the time of leaving his body that she would find her emancipation and salvation when Lord Ram visits her while searching for Sita. Like her Guru, Shabari too left her mortal body after having the privilege of meeting and worshipping the Lord in person by lighting the pyre herself with her mystical powers. According to Adhyatma Ramayana of sage Veda Vyas, it was Lord Ram who had performed her last rites himself, a rare privilege that was even denied to his own worldly father Dasrath.

Shabari used to live in the hermitage where earlier sage Matanga lived. This hermitage was near Mount Rishyamook where Sugriv, the exiled younger brother of the king of monkeys Baali, lived with his close confidantes Hanuman, Jamvant, Naal and Neel etc. This place was about ten Yojans or eighty miles from Kishkindha, the capital of the forest kingdom of which Baali was the king.

There is a story about Lake Pampa on the banks of which she lived. The great sage Matang had his hermitage here. Shabari used to get up very early and clean the path around this lake before her Guru went there for his daily bath and other chores. It so happened that one day, the sages and seers who lived in that area saw her cleaning the path leading to the lake very early in the morning. Since she was of a low caste, they cursed and scolded her because they regarded her appearance as defiling the place. This misplaced notion of superiority and high stature immensely displeased the Lord. So as soon as those haughty and proud sages went and took a dip in that lake, its water turned turbid, polluted and infested by worms and filth. When Sri Ram had gone there during his forest exile, the sages and seers requested him to purify that lake. Sri Ram, being all-knowing, knew the secret behind that pollution, and in order to teach those sages a lesson of their lives, he asked them to request Sabari to take a dip in it. As soon as she did it, the water regained its former pristine purity, and the lake its former exceptional scenic beauty. This made the haughty sages and seers feel ashamed at their ignorance and behaviour.

Lord Sri Ram had visited her hermitage and enjoyed the fruits offered by her just like he would have enjoyed them if they were given to him by his mother. In the 'Ram-Sarawali of Surdas', verse no. 11, it is said that 'Sabari was a long time ardent devotee and a humble follower of Raghupati (Sri Ram). He accepted and ate fruits offered by her, preached her on the concept of complete devotion, and then liberated her by giving her residence in his own abode.'

It was Shabari who had advised Sri Ram to go towards the Rishyamook mountain and make friends with Sugriv, the monkey king, who in turn would help the Lord in finding out Sita and freeing her from the clutches of her captors.

<sup>2</sup>Jatau was the king of vultures. He was befriended by Lord Ram when the Lord was passing through the Dandak forest. Jatau was a friend of Dasrath, the worldly father of Lord Ram, and he had assured the Lord that he will stay in close proximity to them (Ram, Sita and Laxman) in the forest to keep a vigilant eye and give them protection to the best of his might—this is narrated in the Adhyatma Ramayan of sage Veda Vyas, Aranya Kand, Canto 4, verse nos. 1-7. This fact is also endorsed by Tulsidas in Geetawali, Aranya Kand, verse no. 12, stanza no. 2.

True to his word, Jatau had fought valiantly with the demon king Ravana when the latter was taking Sita on his chariot to Lanka after abducting her. He was mortally wounded as Ravana cut off his wings. So Jatau fell to the ground and waited for Lord Ram's arrival. By-and-by the Lord came there and was told by Jatau about Ravana taking Sita away. Jatau died in the arms of Lord Ram, a death no one's been fortunate ever to have. The Lord performed his last rites just as a son does for his own father. Thus, Jatau was granted liberation and deliverance by the Lord. These episodes are narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, (i) Doha no. 13; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 29—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 33.

The glorious way that Jatau died has been lauded and applauded by Tulsidas in Dohawali verse nos. 222-227. Refer also to Geetawali, Aranya Kand, verse nos. 12-16.

“Lord Ram lifted Jatau onto his lap and washed his wounds with the tears streaming from his (Ram’s) eyes”—this is said in Geetawali, Aranya Kand, verse no. 13, stanza no. 1, while Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 30 says that “the Lord moved his loving hand caressingly on his head”.

Jatau’s special death which made him a subject of jealousy and envy for all other exalted persons as narrated in the Doha above has one unique aspect—in spite of him being a vulture by birth and body, he was given an honour befitting a father by none else than the Supreme Being (Lord Ram) himself when the Lord performed his last rites himself—refer: (i) Geetawali, Aranya Kand, verse no. 16, stanza no. 4; verse no. 14, stanza no. 1; (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 32; (iii) Kavitaawali, Uttar Kand, verse no. 16, line no. 3; (iv) Doha no. 227 of Dohawali; (v) Vinai Patrika, verse no. 164, stanza no. 2; verse no. 138, stanza no. 3, line no. 1.

Vinai Patrika, verse no. 138, stanza no. 3, line no. 1 says that Lord Ram offered a ‘Pinda’, a ball of cereals that is offered to the soul of one’s departed parent, to Jatau after the bird left its physical body.]

As is well known to all, Lord Ram gave refuse to and restored the self-respect and dignity of only two persons by helping them to get back the kingdoms from which they were ousted by their respective elder brothers—one was Sugriva (the heir to the monkey kingdom, and brother of Baali)<sup>1</sup>, and the other was Vibhishan (the brother of Ravana, the king of the demons)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

On the other hand, the Lord’s divine and holy Name has given protection, succour and solace to numerous humble and poor souls from time immemorial. This glory is well known and well established in the world as well as in the Vedas<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sugriv, the monkey prince, had a well-formed and attractive neck, and hence got the name “sukaṇṭha”. We read in the story of the Ramayana that Sugriv, the monkey prince, was beaten, disinherited and thrown into exile by his elder brother Baali, the monkey king, due to some misunderstanding between the two. Sugriv was so terrified of Baali who was baying for his blood that he escaped to the summit of a mountain called Rishyamook along with his trusted aides, and lived a sorrowful life in hiding. When Lord Ram was wandering in the forest in search of Sita, his wife who was abducted by Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, he passed that way. By-and-by, the Lord and Sugriv struck a bond of friendship, and the Lord promised him to restore his lost dignity and right to the kingdom of Kishkindha, the monkey kingdom, from which he was disinherited. In return, Sugriv promised the Lord that he would do all he can to help the Lord find Sita and recover her, even if that meant a war with Sita’s abductor. To keep his part of the bargain, Lord Ram had slayed Baali and restored Sugriv to the throne of Kishkindha.

The full story of Baali and Sugriv is narrated in detail in (i) sage Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan, Uttarkand, Canto 3; (ii) Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand (Chapter), Sarga (Canto) 13, verse no. 140-152; and (iii) Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 1—to Doha no. 11.

The full story is this: Sugriv and Baali were two brothers, Baali being the elder of the two siblings. They were the rulers of the monkey race and had their capital at Kishkindha. Once, a demon named Dundhubhi came to challenge Baali for a duel. Baali killed him and flung his dead body on the mountain called Rishyamook. Blood of the demon sprayed in all the directions, and this blood defiled a hermitage of a sage who lived on this mountain. So he cursed that if Baali ever came in that place he would die. It was out of this fear that Baali never came near Mt. Rishyamook.

Earlier, the two brothers had very cordial relations. Once a demon named Maayaawi, the son of Maye, came to Kishkindha and challenged Baali. When Baali rushed towards him, the demon fled and hid inside a cave. Baali pursued him inside, but while entering the cave he told his younger brother Sugriv to guard the mouth of the cave and wait for him for at least a fortnight. Sugriv waited for one full month, but Baali did not come back. At the end of this period blood started seeping out of the mouth of the cave. Thinking that the demon has killed his brother and would come out to kill him also, Sugriv covered the mouth of the cave with a huge boulder and fled from there. When he returned to Kishkindha, the courtiers had no choice but to anoint him as the king in place of his brother whom they all thought was killed by the demon.

Meanwhile it so happened that the blood that had seeped out of the cave's mouth was that of the demon who was killed by Baali. When Baali came out, he did not find Sugriv, and to make matters worse he found the mouth of the cave closed by a heavy boulder. When he came back to Kishkindha he found Sugriv on the throne. Naturally of course he went mad with anger, and beat his brother mercilessly. Sugriv, though not at all at fault, tried his best to explain the situation to Baali, but the seed of misunderstanding and animosity was already sown, and seeing no way out, Sugriv fled with his life. Baali usurped the kingdom and the wife of Sugriv forcibly. Sugriv was so terrified of Baali who was baying for his blood that he escaped to the summit of a mountain called Rishyamook along with his trusted aides, and lived a forlorn and sorrowful life in hiding, because he knew that Baali would never come to harm him here because of the sage's earlier curse.

The story goes that on some previous occasion Baali had collected seven fruits of the coconut tree and kept them on the ground to take bath in the lake known as Pampaa. When he returned he found that a huge python was sitting on these seven fruits. This was tantamount to defiling the fruits and so Baali cursed the serpent that the seven fruits would pierce his body and grow into tall trees. When the mother of the serpent came to know of this curse, she also cursed Baali that anyone who would cut these seven coconut trees with a single arrow would be the one who would also kill him.

When Lord Ram was wandering in the forest in search of Sita, his wife who was abducted by Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, he passed that way. By-and-by, the Lord and Sugriv struck a bond of friendship, and the Lord promised him to restore his lost dignity and right to the kingdom of Kishkindha, the monkey kingdom, from which he was disinherited. In return, Sugriv promised the Lord that he would do all he can to help the Lord find Sita and recover her, even if that meant a war with Sita's abductor.

Sugriv knew about the secret of the seven coconut trees. As he wished to be sure that Lord Ram was indeed capable to restore him to the throne of Kishkindha by eliminating Baali, and that the things wouldn't go out of hands and make life further tormenting for him, Sugriv asked the Lord to fell these seven tall coconut trees with a single arrow. So when Lord Sri Ram felled the seven trees with an arrow, Sugriv knew that the Lord would indeed be able to kill his arch enemy Baali.

With Lord Sri Ram's patronage and support, Sugriv went and challenged his elder brother Baali for a duel. Baali was absolutely stunned, as he had never expected Sugriv to ever have enough courage and strength to challenge him like this. His wife Taaraa also tried to dissuade him by pointing out that Sugriv has the support of Lord Sri Ram who is the Supreme Being incarnate, but Baali was wiser because he decided that either way he was the winner. If he managed to eliminate Sugriv then he would get rid of this constant nuisance of a brother, and if he gets killed at the hands of Lord Sri Ram then also he will be lucky as his emancipation and salvation was absolutely sure. Where, he thought to himself, will he get such an opportunity again in life. In the first bout, Sugriv got bruised and beaten badly. He limped back to Sri Ram and complained bitterly. The Lord replied that he did not shoot Baali because the two brothers looked exactly alike and he could not distinguish between them. There was a hidden message in this statement—the Lord wished to convey to Sugriv that for him all the creatures are alike. But at the same time he had to keep the words he had given to Sugriv that he would eliminate his enemy Baali. So the Lord put a garland around his neck, purportedly to identify him but actually to finally warn Baali that the victory of Sugriv is decided, and if he wants to save himself then he must make a truce. This time around too, Baali beat Sugriv black and blue. The Lord was watching the proceedings from behind a tree. When the situation became worst and Sugriv was about to be knocked down, the Lord shot an arrow that hit Baali and he fell down.

It is said that Lord Sri Ram had to shoot Baali from hiding because the latter had a boon which said that half of the enemy's strength would pass on to Baali if the enemy is within his sight. Nevertheless, Baali felt privileged that the Lord of the world has himself killed him and given his soul the chance of finding liberation and deliverance from the fetters of the gross body of a monkey. At the time of death, Baali put his son Angad in the Lord's custody. This showed that Baali was extremely prudent and wise. By entrusting the conqueror Ram with the safety and security of his son Angad he ensured that Angad would be safe from any kind of evil design of his uncle Sugriv who would now never try to kill him overtly or covertly.

Besides this thing of the Lord giving Sugriv his word to kill his enemy and undo the grave injustice done to him and restore his dignity and right to the kingdom, there was another very important reason why Baali had to be eliminated. On some previous occasion a reciprocal military pact was made between Baali and Ravana that essentially said that they would not allow their respective territories to be used to launch an attack on the other, and also that they would come to each others aid should either of them is called to do so. The story is that once Baali had put Ravana under his armpit for many days while the latter had gone to challenge the former when he was doing some worship. Peeved by Ravana's arrogance and impertinence, Baali had tucked him under his arms to stop him from annoying him any further. When his worship was finished and he had returned back to his capital at Kishkindha, he realised that Ravana was still squeezed under his armpit. So he released the latter and made a pact of friendship with him. This story is narrated in Anand Ramayan, Saar Kanda (Chapter 1), Sarga (Canto) 13, verse nos. 96-101.

Since Lord Sri Ram needed to cross the territory of Kishkindha and also take the help of the army of this place to launch an assault on Lanka it was militarily wise and prudent to eliminate the foe in the backyard.

But the Lord knew the constraints under which he had to eliminate Baali though the latter had not offended the Lord in any manner whatsoever. The Lord was well aware of his responsibilities towards Angad and he wished to rectify this apparent biased action of his of killing Baali at the behest of Sugriv—so he ensured that the final right to the kingdom of Kishkindha went to the heir of Baali, instead of the heir of Sugriv, by appointing Angad as the heir-apparent or the prince regent, and declaring that though Sugriv was made the king of Kishkindha upon Baali's death it was Angad who would succeed to the throne after Sugriv instead of any direct descendent of Sugriv such as his own son.

<sup>2</sup>Vibhishan was the younger brother of Ravana, the king of the demon race and the one who had abducted Sita. When Lord Ram launched a campaign to retrieve Sita from his clutches and a ruinous war loomed on the horizon, many of Ravana's ministers and councillors tried to persuade him to give Sita back to the Lord and avoid total destruction. But by the fiat of fate had shrouded Ravana's wisdom in a thick veil of dooms-day darkness so much that he had become excessively stubborn and unamenable and so much deluded about his own invincibility, strength and powers that it wasn't no good trying to make him see reason and act with prudence as he wasn't ready to lend his ears to nobody who dared to give him any sane advice that was against what he wished to hear; he would listen to no nothing. He wasn't to blame for it for the hungry god-of-death had already bared his teeth for him. One such well-wishing advisor of his was Visbhishan, his own brother. But instead of facing harsh reality, Ravana was got so angry at his brother that he kicked him in full court and told him to get out immediately. Fearing for his life and smarting from grave insult, Vibhishan left Lanka and came to Lord Ram to seek refuge with him. The Lord of course graciously granted him refuge, promising him not only fearlessness from his arch enemy Ravana but also the throne of Lanka after the war.

This story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 38—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 50.

<sup>3</sup>A similar idea—that the glory and divinity of Lord Ram's holy Name is well known throughout the world and well established in the Vedas, the ancient scripture—has also been expressed in Doha no. 24 herein above. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Doha no. 51 where Lord Shiva has affirmed this point in an unequivocal term.

The point being stressed here is that while Lord Ram was personally able to restore the dignity and self-respect of only some selected individuals, such as Sugriv and Vibhishan in this particular case, and had granted them fearlessness from their tormentors, the holy Name of the Lord has been doing it for ages and from time immemorial for countless creatures all over the world.]

राम भालु कपि कटकु बटोरा । सेतु हेतु श्रमु कीन्ह न थोरा ॥ ३ ॥
नामु लेत भवसिंधु सुखाहीं । करहु बिचारु सुजन मन माहीं ॥ ४ ॥

rāma bhālu kapi kaṭaku baṭōrā. sētu hētu śramu kīnha na thōrā. 3.
nāmu lēta bhavasindhu sukhāhīm. karahu bicāru sujana mana māhīm. 4.

Lord Ram had collected an army of bears and monkeys, and took a lot of trouble to construct a bridge across the ocean (to cross over to Sri Lanka to fight and bring back Sita from the clutches of demon Ravana)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

But mere pronouncing Lord's holy Name is enough to dry-up the ocean represented by all the entanglements of this mundane, gross, delusory and dreary world. So oh wise men, think this over in your mind and ponder over it's significance<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Lord Ram constructing the mighty bridge across the ocean to reach the shores of Lanka is narrated in all the versions of the story of the Ramayana. Presently we will refer only to Tulsidas' Ram Charit Manas where we read about it in Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 60—to Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 5.

<sup>2</sup>This verse stresses that Lord Ram's holy Name helps a creature to easily cross this formidable world of transmigration, a world that is compared to the mighty and monstrous ocean because it is almost impossible to cross it, and more often than not this monster drowned people who dared to challenge it. But the glory of the holy Name of Lord Ram is such that with the help of it a creature can easily and as comfortably get across as if one was walking over a bridge. To wit, Lord Ram's holy Name makes a creature fearless in the face of the horrors of this world of birth and death, and it assures the creature that the future of his soul is secured. If a creature takes the help of the Lord's holy Name then he can easily find liberation and deliverance for himself; his soul would certainly and without gainsay attain emancipation and salvation. It would be as easy for a creature as walking across a bridge to reach the other side of an ocean, without being subjected to a bumpy ride on a boat, no matter how sturdy it may be, a-tossing, a-joggling, a-wobbling and a-stumbling, spinning, heaving and plunging so fiercely on the waves in order to cross a choppy ocean represented by this mundane, gross world of transmigration.

Lord Ram's holy Name would make this journey-of-life very peaceful and joyful for a devotee who would be at ease during his life in this world as he is assured of an all-round protection offered by the shield of the Lord's holy Name, and he is also assured of eternal peace and beatitude in the world hereafter as Lord Ram's divine Name would ensure of his soul's emancipation and salvation and eternal rest.

This verse essentially says that though there are many other means to attain liberation and deliverance as advised in the scriptures, such as doing Tapa (penance, austerity), Yoga (meditation), Dhyan (contemplation), Japa (repetition of holy Mantras), Daan (making charity), Yagya (fire and other religious sacrifices), Vrat (keeping fast and observing many vows and sacraments) and so on and so forth, but the most comfortable and easy path is that of Lord Ram's holy Name, for all other paths are strenuous and cumbersome, and they are rife with countless hurdles and problems that create a lot of uncertainty and trouble for the creature.]

rāma sakula rana rāvanu mārā. sīya sahita nija pura pagu dhārā. 5.
rājā rāmu avadha rajadhānī. gāvata guna sura muni bara bānī. 6.

Lord Ram had killed Ravana and his entire clan (except Vivhishan), and then returned to his capital Ayodhya along with Sita. (5)

He then was anointed as the King of Ayodhya with Sita as the Queen, while gods and sages sung his praises, virtues and glories in best of terms. (6)

[Note—These events are narrated in full in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Doha no. 102—to Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 15.]

सेवक सुमिरत नामु सप्रीती । बिनु श्रम प्रबल मोह दलु जीती ॥ ७ ॥ sēvaka sumirata nāmu saprītī. binu śrama prabala mōha dalu jītī. 7.

phirata sanēham magana sukha apanēm. nāma prasāda sōca nahim sapanēm. 8.

As compared to this, the Lord's devotees and followers are able to conquer an army of faults and delusions (known as Maya) without exertion simply by remembering the holy Name of the Lord with love and devotion. [To wit, while Lord Ram had to gather a huge army and wage a ferocious and strenuous war to eliminate the sinful and evil demons who were terrifying the world, the Lord's holy Name enables his devotees to overcome all their fears, sins and faults most easily and effortlessly.] (7)

These devotees of the Lord roam around cheerfully and fearlessly, absorbed in the thoughts of the Lord, and deeply immersed in the ocean of bliss that comes with having devotion for the Lord. By doing this, they derive immense joy, happiness and beatitude. They are not worried about anything even in their dreams, thanks to the glory and the grace of Lord Ram's holy Name. (8)

दो०. ब्रह्म राम तेँ नामु बड़ बर दायक बर दानि ।

brahma rāma tēm nāmu baṛa bara dāyaka bara dāni.
rāmacarita sata kōṭi maham liya mahēsa jiyam jāni. 25.

So therefore we conclude that the divine and the holy Name of Lord Ram is greater and superior than Brahm (the Absolute and Supreme Being) himself (because Brahm had manifested in the form of Lord Ram).

The Lord's holy Name bestows blessings and grants boons even to those exalted souls who themselves are capable of granting boons and blessing others. [This refers to the great gods as well as the sages, hermits and saints who can bless others and grant boons to them. To wit, these gods, sages, hermits and saints and et al derive their mystical powers relying on the strength of Lord Ram's holy Name. The Name of the Lord empowers them to do so; they derive their authority and power by the virtue of their invoking and using the Lord's holy Name while granting boons and blessings.]

Wise as he was, Lord Shiva selected these two syllables (Ra and Ma that form the divine name of the Lord as 'RAM') out of the one hundred million verses comprising the story of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. [To wit, out of so many choices and options available to Shiva, he selected these two letters as the easiest means to attain one's spiritual goal as well as to obtain whatever one desires in this world. When these two letters were joined by him, they formed the word 'Ram'. So this became the Mantra which Shiva repeats constantly and consistently, and consequentially he has found eternal bliss and tranquility. Not only this, he became renowned as the wisest amongst the pantheon of Gods.] (Doha no. 25)

The idea is that Lord Ram's name RAM ('Rāma' or 'Raam') is very divine and holy. It is not an ordinary name, but more powerful than any other Mantra (spiritual formula) advised in the scriptures. Its glory and majesty has been extolled and endorsed by the Vedas themselves as clearly mentioned herein above in Doha no. 24 and Chaupai line no. 2 that follows it.]

मासपारायण, पहला विश्राम (māsapārāyaṇa, pahalā viśrāma)

suka sanakādi sid'dha muni jōgī. nāma prasāda brahmasukha bhōgī. 2.

[In the following verses, a lot many instances are cited where well-known devotees of the Lord had attained blessedness and beatitude as well fame and an exalted stature by invoking the holy Name of Lord Ram. These instances are employed to lend support to the advice given in earlier verses about the greatness and the glory, the importance and the value, the effectiveness and the surety of employing Lord Ram's holy Name as a wonderful and mystically empowered sure-shot formula that can help a person to attain his spiritual objectives. The Lord's holy Name is richly endowed with all auspiciousness, blissfulness, blessedness, beatitude and felicity.]

By the grace of Lord Ram's holy and auspicious Name, Lord Shiva has become immortal. And inspite of having inauspicious and ominous forms of paraphernalia on his body (such as having serpents wrapped all around his body, wearing a wreath of skulls around his neck, and having ash smeared all over his almost naked body), he has become a treasury of the best of spiritual glories, values, blessings and auspiciousness<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The glory of the holy Name of Lord Ram is such that all those who have attained true bliss and beatitude, such as the sages Suka, Sankadi etc., and other such sages and yogis (mystics) who enjoy the supreme joy which comes with the blissful state of self and Brahm realisation—all of them have attained it due to the grace of Lord Ram's auspicious Name which is holy and divine<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the Hindu pantheon of Gods, Lord Shiva occupies the most exalted place of honour. He is one of the Gods of the Trinity, and is revered and honoured by all the other Gods for his mysticism, wisdom and enlightenment. Lord Ram, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, the second God of the Trinity and deemed to be a personified form of the Supreme Being, has himself said that if a person wishes to have devotion for him and attain beatitude and felicity of self-realisation and Brahm-realisation, then it is obligatory for the aspirant to worship Lord Shiva first as he is very dear to Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Lanka Kand, Doha no. 2 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it; and (ii) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 45.

It is also Lord Ram's declaration that his devotion is granted by those who worship and pay obeisance to Lord Shiva—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3.

Lord Shiva's external appearances that look very horrifying on their face value are very misleading, for the Lord actually is a great mystic, an Yogi par-excellence, one who is a treasury of holiness, auspiciousness, divinity and spirituality. He has assumed this unconventional attire of being wrapped in serpents, having ash all over his body and wearing a garland of skulls just to keep at bay and dissuade those who are not true devotees and not sincere in their spiritual pursuit, and worship Lord Shiva only to fulfill their worldly desires. The Lord abhors them for he hates deceit and conceit in his devotees, and nor does he like selfish ones who pretend to worship the Lord but it is only to fulfill some worldly aspirations.

Lord Shiva's most odd external appearance has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 92.

<sup>2</sup>All the great sages and mystics have unanimously declared that they have attained the state of eternal blissfulness and beatitude by relying upon the holy Name of Lord Ram. To wit, the Lord's holy Name is the formula that all self-realised and enlightened souls who have attained bliss, beatitude and felicity have employed to attain this exalted and eclectic state of being.]

नारद जानेउ नाम प्रतापू । जग प्रिय हरि हरि हर प्रिय आपू ॥ ३ ॥

nārada jānē'u nāma pratāpū. jaga priya hari hari hara priya āpū. 3.

nāmu japata prabhu kīnha prasādū. bhagata sirōmani bhē prahalādū. 4.

Sage Narad knows the glory, the power and the importance of the holy Name of Lord Ram. That is why while the world loves Sri Hari (Vishnu), and Lord Shiva (Har) is dear to Hari (Vishnu), sage Narad is loved by both Har and Hari<sup>1</sup>. (3)

By the grace of Lord Ram's holy Name, Prahalad<sup>2</sup> became a jewel (i.e. most honoured and respected one) amongst the devotees of the Lord (and he was freed from the fear of his demonic father who was ready to kill him). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Narad constantly repeats the holy Name of the Lord, and wherever he goes he announces his arrival by saying aloud 'Hari Hari'. The word immediately gives him recognition and invites great respect. He is welcomed everywhere, even by the demons who are otherwise inimical towards Lord Vishnu, one of whose names is 'Hari'. This is because the demons realise that Narad is shielded by a very powerful shield of the Lord's holy Name, and he is invoking the Supreme Being who is the supreme Lord of creation, and therefore of the demons also. Narad has been blessed with the boon of having access to all parts of creation precisely on the strength of the Lord's Name because he goes everywhere chanting the Name. It opens the door for him in all the directions of creation as if it were a magical charm that opens all doors and removes all obstacles.

Lord Shiva's other name is 'Har'. It literally means 'one who steals or removes all evil and sins as well as all worldly attachments and delusions from his devotees'. This paves the way for the devotees' liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation.

Lord Shiva is famed as the God who chants Lord Ram's holy Name constantly without fail, and he always remains in a state of quiet meditation even when appearing not to be so. Lord Shiva uses Lord Ram's holy Name as an exclusive spiritual formula for doing Japa (repetition of a holy Mantra) and Dhyan (contemplation) during Yoga (meditation). Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 58; Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 60; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.

<sup>2</sup>Prahalad was a young boy who had meditated by repeating Lord Ram's holy Name, and as a result he succeeded in having a divine vision of Lord Vishnu. His story in brief is this:

He was an ardent devotee of Lord Vishnu. He was the eldest son of the king of demons, named Hiranyakashipu. His mother was Kayaadhu, the daughter of the demon king named Jambhaasur. Both the mother and the son were initiated by sage Narad who had inspired them to become devotees of Lord Vishnu.

The story of Prahalad is narrated in detail in (i) Vishnu Puran, 1/17-20, and (ii) Bhagvata Puran, Skandha 7, Cantos 3-10. This is the story of Prahalad, the son of the demon Hiranyakashipu.

When Prahalad was still in his mother's womb, sage Narad had taught her about the principles of spiritualism and devotion for Lord Vishnu. {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 7, Canto 7, verse nos. 15-55.} Prahalad had heard this preaching, and when he was born he still remembered Narad's advice given to his mother. As result, Prahalad was born with devotion for Lord Vishnu firmly engrained in his heart and mind.

The father, being a demon, was an inveterate opponent of Lord Vishnu, and so naturally he couldn't tolerate his own son worshipping his enemy Lord Vishnu. He tried his best to dissuade Prahalad from being devoted to the Lord, but the son had immense faith in the Lord and would not be deterred by his father's threats, torments and scoldings. Hiranyakashipu tried even cruel means to change Prahalad, including an attempt to burn in a raging fire, but the child devotee escaped unscathed. So, finally the demon father decided to kill him personally. Prahalad was tied to a pillar and asked 'Where is your Lord Vishnu? Is he in this pillar also?' The child replied in the affirmative. Then his father swung the sword to kill him, and it was at this instant that Lord Vishnu revealed himself as the famous incarnation known as 'Nrisingh'—the upper half of his body was like a lion and the lower half was like a man. An Upanishad titled 'Nrisingh Tapini Upanishad' of the Atharva Veda is dedicated to this Lord.

Lord Nrisingh snatched the sword of the demon, which he had raised in his hand to kill Prahalad, and laid the demon across his laps. He then tore through his abdomen, and yanked out his intestines, thereby killing the demon instantly. He then picked up the child Prahalad on to his laps and lovingly licked and caressed him like a lion does to its cub. But Prahalad prayed to the Lord to provide deliverance to the soul of his father, at which the Lord liberated the demon from all his sins.

Prahalad is credited with enumerating the nine-fold path of Bhakti, the path of devotion for the Lord, in the epic Bhaagvata, 7/5/23.

Lord Dattatreya, one of the manifestations of Lord Vishnu, had preached Prahalad about the eclectic state of Avadhut Sanyasi in the form of a huge python, known as Ajgara. Prahalad had spiritual discussions also with other sages such as Hansa (the divine Swan, an incarnation of Vishnu), and with Indra (the king of Gods).

Prahalad had four brothers, three sons and a daughter. The king of demons known as Bali, who was famous for his charities and donations, was a grandson of Prahalad. The incarnations of Vishnu as Vaaman, the dwarf mendicant, is related to this legendary king.]

ध्रुवं सगलानि जपेउ हरि नाऊँ । पायउ अचल अनूपम ठाऊँ ॥ ५ ॥

sumiri pavanasuta pāvana nāmū. apanē basa kari rākhē rāmū. 6.

Dhurva chanted Sri Hari's (Lord Vishnu's) holy Name because he was insulted and ill-treated by his stepmother, but the effect was such that he was given a permanent and immovable place among the 'stars in the sky'. [It is believed in mythology that the Northern-Star in the northern hemisphere of the night sky, a star that remains fixed in its position while all other stars appear to move in the sky, is actually Dhruva.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

By remembering the holy and divine Name of Lord Ram, the Son of the Wind God (known as Hanuman) has kept Lord Ram under his loving sway<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Dhruva is as follows: He was the elder son of king Uttanpaad from his first wife Suniti. The king was so charmed by his second wife named Suruchi that he completely neglected Suniti and Dhruva. Once it so happened that the child Dhruva was snubbed by his step-mother for attempting to draw affection of his father.

The child was very upset and despondent. He approached his mother for solace. She advised him to accept Lord Vishnu as his eternal and loving Father and protector. For this, Dhruva had to do severe Tapa (austerity and penance). The overwhelmed child was so determined that he immediately proceeded to the forest to do Tapa. He met the celestial sage Narad on the way who instructed him on ways to meditate upon the Lord. The Lord was extremely pleased by Dhruva's sincerity and devotion and appeared before him. He blessed the child and gave him two boons—one was the restoration of his honour and kingdom of the kingdom, and the other was a permanent place in the heavens, a position so exalted, steady and unwavering that even the God could not match it. So, in due course of time, Dhruva assumed a personified form of a divine God and took up his heavenly abode in the Dhruva Loka. The story related to him is narrated in detail in the Vishnu Puran, section 1, cantos 11-12.

The Tripadvibhuti Maha-Narayan Upanishad of the Atharva Veda, in its Canto 5, paragraph no. 15 mentions this Dhruv Loka and Dhruva, the God, when it describes the path taken by a devotee of Lord Vishnu to the latter's abode in heaven when the former leaves his mortal body. The devotee has taken a ride on the back of the Garud, the vehicle of Lord Vishnu who is represented by the divine ethereal Mantra known as OM in this Upanishad, and has already passed through the Satya Loka where Brahma the creator lives, the Ishan Loka where Lord Shiva lives, the Graha Loka where the different Grahas live, the Saptarishi Mandal where the seven celestial sages live (and which is represented by the Great Bear constellation of stars in the sky), the Surya Mandal which is the realm of the Sun God, and the Chandra Mandal which is the realm of the Moon God. Then he reaches this Dhruva Mandal.

The Dhruva Loka or Dhruv Mandal is represented by the North Star and its immediate environs in the celestial map. The North Star is a personified form of Dhruva. The North Star has a great symbolic importance and value here. This star remains static and unchanging in its position in the sky—it is a metaphor for stability, uniformity, unchanging nature, steadfastness and durability. It is a vital guide for navigation purposes in the night. Hence, if a person is steady in his thoughts and single-mindedly pursues his chosen path, always keeping the aim in sight, he is sure to achieve success and obtain his objective in life. The objective of the spiritual aspirant is to attain his Lord Vishnu and find Mukti. So when he has crossed all hurdles and overcome formidable obstacles in the symbolic form of praises and honours lavished on him en-route to heaven as described above in this narration, it is only then that he can rupture through this world and reach the exalted abode where Vishnu lives. Now, if the celestial sky is imagined as a huge sphere, then this is the point from where the cosmic traveller has ruptured the solar system and entered the upper reaches of the cosmos where the upper heaven is situated. Since Lord Vishnu's abode is supposed to be unchanging and steady in its glory unlike other worlds, the metaphor of the North Star as a gateway to Vaikunth, the abode of Vishnu, appears to be very appropriate here.

<sup>2</sup>The Lord is exceptionally obliged to Hanuman and on several occasions he had expressed this too. Hanuman was more close to Lord Ram than any other single character in the Ramayana. Whenever the Lord needed help, he looked at Hanuman. Hanuman had always repeated the holy Name of Lord Ram silently, and this gave him immense strength and peace. By the way of the Name, Hanuman was able to have the Lord stay with him always. The best proof of the Lord recognizing this divine quality and spiritual nature of Hanuman was when the Lord directed him to stay in this world at the time of the Lord's own departure for his heavenly abode at the end of his tenure on this earth, and keep the light of the Lord's glory alight by way of repeating his divine Name and ensuring protection for those who said the Lord's Name. In other words, the Lord had appointed Hanuman as the heir to his legacy, and passed on the baton of Dharma (virtues of righteousness, probity, propriety, nobility and auspiciousness) and Satya (truth) to him to act as their custodian on the strength of Lord's holy Name.

A life sketch of Hanuman is narrated in the following scriptures—(i) Anand Ramayan, Saar Kand, Sarga (Canto) 13, verse nos. 155-190; (ii) Valmiki's Ramayan, Kishkindhya Kand, Sarga (Canto) 66, verse nos. 1-17 (as narrated by Jamvant, the Bear king); Uttar Kand, Sarga 35-36 (as described to Sri Ram by sage Agastya).

Wonderful hymns dedicated to Lord Hanuman are found in Tulsidas' "Vinai Patrika", verse nos. 25-36.

These describe Hanuman as the Son of the Wind God.

But it is also universally believed that Hanuman is a manifestation of Lord Shiva, and represents the 'Tej' (glory and dynamism) of Lord Ram. This is clearly mentioned in Brihad Brahm Sanhita, Chapter (Pratham) 3, Canto (Adhyaya) 1, verse (Shloka) no. 102. This verse also says that it is Lord Shiva who manifested also as Sankarshan, one of the forms of Lord Vishnu. In the case of Hanuman, it is said here that "Hanuman is a manifestation of Lord Maha Shiva, and represents the Tej (glory and dynamic aspect) of Lord Ram".

Lord Hanuman was one of the greatest devotees of Lord Ram. His devotion for Lord Ram had no match. He is regarded as the wisest, the most enlightened and a highly self-realised soul. He is an incarnation of the eleventh form of Lord Shiva that is known as Rudra. When Lord Vishnu decided to manifest himself as Lord Ram in this world, all the different Gods has assumed various forms to serve the Lord. Shiva had taken the form of Hanuman to serve Lord Ram.]

The sinful and fallen Ajaamil<sup>1</sup>, the elephant king known as the Gaja<sup>2</sup>, and Ganika the prostitute (harlot)<sup>3</sup>—they were all liberated by the power and the majesty of Lord Ram's holy Name. (7)

Say, how far can I (Tulsidas) describe the glory, the majesty, the divinity, and the spiritual importance and value of Lord Ram's holy Name (because I have no words for it). Even Lord Ram himself is unable to sing the glories of his own Name. (8)

[Note—Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 130.

The story of Ajaamil, Gaja and Ganika are as follows:-

<sup>1</sup>Ajaamil—He was a Brahmin by birth, but he became enamoured with a prostitute and married her. Bad company made him turn into a hunter. One day a group of sages passed by the village. When they asked the villagers if there was a Brahmin's house where they could spend the night, the villagers told them of Ajaamil. So these sages decided to spend the night there. When Ajaamil returned from his hunting trip with a catch of a bird and saw the sages, he felt very ashamed. He confided with them that he is a fallen man and that they should not eat in his house. The saints had a merciful heart and they thought amongst themselves that it is their moral obligation to show this man some way by which he can find liberation and deliverance.

They cooked their own meals with whatever they had. The next day, they summoned Ajaamil and told him, 'Look, your wife is pregnant. She will soon deliver a son. Give that son the name 'Narayan' (one of the many names of Lord Vishnu). This would lead to your emancipation.' And then the group of sages went on their journey.

When the son was born, Ajaamil named him as advised by them—he called the son 'Narayan'. He was very fond of the son, and called out his name 'Narayan, Narayan' umpteen numbers of times during the course of the day. He was unwittingly taking the name of Lord Vishnu. This continued till the time came for his death. When he was tormented by the messengers of Yam, the God of hell and death, he became terrified and called out in fear—'Narayan, Narayan. Save me'. Though he was calling his son, but the Lord heard his name being called out by someone in distress. So he sent his own messengers to protect the caller. The messengers of Lord chased away the messengers of Yam and took Ajaamil to heaven. When Yam complained to Vishnu, the Lord told him that if anyone calls out his name at the time of death he is duty-bound to liberate and protect him. This story tells us the power of the name of the Lord.

<sup>2</sup>Gaja, the king of elephants— In the ancient country of Dravid (the present day South India), there was a kingdom called Pandyaraaj whose king was named Indradumna. He was a great devotee of Lord Vishnu and used to offer regular worship to the Lord with great diligence. Once, sage Agastya passed that way with his retinue of disciples. The king was so engrossed in the worship of the Lord that he did not notice the sage and neither did he get up to welcome him or pay his obeisance to him. This annoyed the sage and he cursed—'You are like a haughty and wild elephant who pays no heed to those standing in the front. Therefore, you deserve to become an elephant—so you would take a birth as an elephant.' When the king died he became an elephant in a pleasant island in the middle of the Kshirsagar, the celestial ocean of milk.

He had a majestic body and was very strong in his herd. Once he was playing with his she-elephants and companions in a large and beautiful pond. In this pond lived an crocodile who was actually a Gandharva (a semi-god) named Huhu in his previous life and had become an crocodile due to a curse of sage Deval. The crocodile caught hold of the leg of the elephant and started pulling him inside the deep lake. The Gaja himself and all his companions tried their best but failed to free him from the mouth of the crocodile. A long tussle followed and the elephant became completely exhausted. When the situation became so bad that the Gaja, the elephant, was about to sink fully inside the water, he broke a lotus flower and offered it to Lord Vishnu as his last worship and offering before dying. The merciful Lord rushed instantly astride his mount, called the Garud, to save him. Reaching the spot within a moment, the Lord pulled the Gaja out of the water with one hand, and with the other he opened the mouth of the crocodile to yank the leg of the elephant free from its clutches. Then the Lord cut off the crocodile's head with his circular weapon known as the Chakra.

Both the crocodile and the elephant found liberation—the crocodile reverted to his earlier form of a Gandharva, and Gaja the elephant assumed a divine form similar to that of the Lord and went to his abode in the heaven.

<sup>3</sup>Ganika, the herlot—There was a prostitute by the name of Pingla. One day she had decorated herself with flowers and ornaments and waited eagerly for her lover. When he did not turn up even till midnight, she was very contrite and it dawned upon her that if she had spent so much of her time in devotion and remembrance of the Lord, she would have found deliverance. Right onwards, she turned away from her profession and became an ardent devotee of the Lord. This led to her emancipation and salvation.]

In Kaliyug, Lord Ram's holy Name is like a Kalpataru (the all wish-fulfilling Tree of the Gods)<sup>1</sup>, and a gracious benefactor of all in every imaginable way, by remembering and chanting of which Tulsidas has changed from being a 'Bhaang' (a hallucination producing herb having the technical name of Tetrahydro-Cannabinolis) into Tulsi (the Basil or Ocimum plant which is a herb used to sanctify food offered to deities in temples, and also as a medicine for its antibiotic properties).

[To wit, even a useless and despised man becomes a much sought-after and useful one by the good influences and good effects of Ram's holy and divine Name. In effect this means that the correctional properties of the Name removes all the negative virtues present in a creature, and transforms him into a worthy one.] (Doha no. 26)

In all the four Yugas or eras (ages or phases) of creation (known as the Sata, Treta, Dwapar and Kali Yugas respectively)<sup>1</sup>, as well as in all the three phases of time (past, present, future), and the three lokas (heaven, earth, nether world)—countless souls have got liberation and deliverance from their sorrows and miseries by chanting the holy Name of Lord Ram. (1)

The Vedas, Purans and saints have given this unanimous advice—that to have love in Lord's Form and Lord's Name is the result of all virtuous acts.<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>According to the Purans, the ancient mythological histories of the Hindus, one cycle of creation, development and destruction is divided into four parts, each known as a Yuga. Thus, there are four such Yugas.

The first is called 'Sata Yuga' and it is equivalent to 17,28,000 human years. The second is 'Treta Yuga' and it equals to 12,96,000 human years. The third era is known as 'Dwapar' and it is equal to 8,64,000 human years. The fourth and the last age, i.e. the current era, lasts for 4,32,000 human years.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 12-14 that precede Doha no. 122 that say: "Lord Shiva, the creator Brahma (aja), sage Suka (the parrot saint), the celestial sages Sankadi and Narad, and other such exalted sages who are experts in the knowledge of Brahm (the Supreme Being) --- [12] --- It is their unanimous view, oh the king of birds (khaganāyaka), that one should have devotion and affection for the lotus-like holy feet of Lord Ram. [13] --- The Vedas, the Purans and all other scriptures unequivocally assert that there is no happiness and peace without having devotion (Bhakti) for Lord Ram. [14]" ]

As a means of finding liberation and deliverance or emancipation and salvation, there was a provision of doing contemplation and meditation during the first era called the Sata Yuga. During the second era known as Treta Yuga, sacrifices were prescribed. In the third era known as the Dwapar Yuga, the Gods were propitiated through worship<sup>1</sup>.

But in the fourth (current) era called Kali Yuga, there is only evil and corruption, moral degradation and spiritual impurities all around so much so that the mind of men are rolling in this filthy water like a fish in an ocean of sin.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An exactly similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 102 (b) along with Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it.

<sup>2</sup>The horrors of Kali-Yuga has been detailed in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 97; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precede Doha no. 97—to Doha no. 102 (a).

A similar reference to the 'fish' is cited in Vinai Patrika, verse no. 102. ] rāma nāma kali abhimata dātā. hita paralōka lōka pitu mātā. 6.

In such a terrible age (of Kali Yuga), the holy Name of the Lord is like a Kalpa-Taru (an all wish-fulfilling tree), the very remembrance of which can abolish all sorts of illusions in this world—i.e. the divine and holy Name of the Lord can liberate a creature from the net of worldly delusions<sup>1</sup>. (5)

In Kali Yuga, Lord Ram's holy Name can give all desired results and fulfill all objectives of a devotee. It is beneficial for the creature in the afterworld after his death, while when he is alive in this world it acts as his caring parent<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 102 (a) and Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 103.

nahim kali karama na bhagati bibēkū. rāma nāma avalambana ēkū. 7.
 kālanēmi kali kapaṭa nidhānū. nāma sumati samaratha hanumānū. 8.

In Kali Yuga, neither there is a chance to do good deeds, nor is there devotion and wisdom. In this depressing scenario, the only resort or avenue (for the creature if he wishes to attain emancipation and salvation) is Ram's holy Name<sup>1</sup>. (7)

'Kali' is like the demon Kalnemi<sup>1</sup> who was like a treasury of falsehood, lies, conceit, deceit, pretensions and other vices, whereas the Lord's 'Name' is like Hanuman who was very wise and able in every manner. [Here, the holy Name of Lord Ram is compared to Hanuman who had slayed this demon, thereby giving the latter liberation from bodily bondage in which his soul was trapped. Likewise, the Lord's holy Name can free the creature from all delusions, and provide his soul with the spiritual reward of deliverance, emancipation and salvation.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 103 along with Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede it where an exactly similar idea has been expressed.

Refer also to Vinai Patrika, verse no. 155 which describes the horrors of Kali-Yuga.

<sup>2</sup>Kalnemi was sent by Ravana to prevent Hanuman from going ahead to bring the herb that would revive Laxman in the battle-field after he fell unconscious upon being hit by Meghnad's arrow. Kalnemi assumed the form of a hermit to trap Hanuman, but the latter discovered the demon's trick and killed him, thereby liberating his soul from the body of a demon. This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 58.

Similarly, the Lord's powerful Name helps the creature to attain liberation and deliverance from the evil world surrounding him on all sides.]

Lord Ram's holy and divine Name is like a Man-Lion (an incarnation of Lord Vishnu that is known as Lord Nara-Singha) and Kali is like the demon Hiranya-Kasipu (the father of Prahalad)<sup>1</sup>. Even as the Man-Lion crushed (killed) the demon who was tormenting the devotee Prahalad (to abandon his devotion for the Lord), the Name of the Lord can destroy all evil forces tormenting the devotees during the era known as Kali. (Doha no. 27)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Lord Vishnu taking the form of a 'Man-Lion' relates to the story of Prahalad, the child devotee of the Lord. Lord Nara-Singha is the half lion and half man incarnation of Lord Vishnu to slay the demon Hiranyakashipu who had been tormenting Prahalad, his son, because the latter worshipped and had devotion for Lord Vishnu whom the demon loathed. It is narrated as a note appended to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 26 herein above in this Chapter (Baal Kand of Ram Charit Manas).]

The holy Name of Lord Ram chanted with either good or bad intentions, in an angry mood or even while yawning lazily<sup>1</sup>, will always be beneficial for the living being and do good to him no matter in which of the ten directions of the world he lives<sup>2</sup>. [To wit, Lord Ram's holy, divine and glorious Name is a supreme benefactor of all the creatures of this creation, no matter where they live and in which form their soul exists in this world. Anyone who invokes the Lord's holy Name, in any way and under any circumstance, willingly or unwillingly, with devotion and love or with enmity and anger, with a cheerful mind or with a bored demeanour—the holy Name of Lord Ram would have its positive effect and bless one and all nevertheless in a universal manner, irrespective of everything else.] (1)

After remembering such a powerful and glorious 'Name' of the Lord, a Name that is both divine and holy, Tulsidas proceeded to narrate the story of the worldly deeds of Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are ample instances in the story of the Ramayana that endorse this observation. Lord Shiva continuously repeats Lord Ram's holy Name with devotion and affection and faith—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108.

Then in sharp contrast we have the demon Marich who was so terrified of Lord Ram that he remembered the Lord day and night out of fear, but this unwitting remembrance of the Lord made him eligible for the final liberation and deliverance of his soul in the hands of the Lord himself—this story is narrated in detail Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 24—to Doha no. 27.

Then there was Ravana, the demon king, who remembered Lord Ram with hostility (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103), and yet his soul attained a destiny that was envy of all—at the end of the war at Lanka, Ravana's soul exited in the form of a lightening streak from his evil body of a demon and entered the body of Lord Ram, who was a personified form of the Supreme Being, so as to merge with the cosmic Soul and find eternal peace, rest and beatitude. This fact is clearly stated in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-11 that precede Doha no. 103, and Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 104.

We have another example where Lord Ram's holy Name had its miraculous effect even when it was remembered upside down in an odd sort of way. It is the example of sage Valmiki who had done meditation by using Lord Ram's holy Name in the reverse order—i.e. 'MARA' instead of 'RAMA'. In spite of this unconventional way of using any name, Valmiki attained enlightenment and an exalted place amongst the greatest sages of all times. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 19.

Other such instances abound where a living being had called out Lord Ram's holy Name in distress and was granted instant protection even if he was a sinful one all along his life and hadn't called out the Lord's holy Name in no way out of any devotion or love for the Lord. A reference to such souls is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 26 where we read about Ajaamil, Gaja and Ganika.

A similar idea is expressed earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 27.

<sup>3</sup>Tulsidas has narrated the wonderful, the most fascinating and charming, and the most holy of stories ever told, the divine story of Lord Ram, in his epic rendering of it to which he gave the title ‘Ram Charit Manas’—literally, ‘the story that describes the life and time and deeds of Lord Ram who dwells in the heart of devotees and who is revered by the mind which remains focused on this story; it is a story that is like a lake full of and brimming over with spiritual nectar.

It is to be noted that Tulsidas has used all his persuasive skills, all possible arguments, words and logic to convince us all of the importance of remembering, loving and chanting, in having unwavering faith, devotion and loyalty for the holy Name of Lord Ram. He has offered all living beings a simple formula that can take care of all their spiritual needs.

The word ‘Ram’, the holy Name of the Lord, has been used as being synonymous with both the Nirguna aspect as well as the Saguna aspect of Lord Ram’s divine form. The ‘Nirguna’ aspect refers to that aspect which has no attributes, that is invisible, unmanifest, unqualified, cosmic and all-pervading form of the Supreme Being known as Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness and the Absolute Truth in creation, while the ‘Saguna’ aspect refers to that aspect of the same Supreme Being that is visible, that has attributes and a form which we recognise as Lord Ram. To wit, the holy Name of Lord Ram bridges the gap between these two aspects of the Supreme Being.

For those of a higher intellect and wisdom, the former aspect of Nirguna is more appealing, whereas for the ordinary devotees, the Saguna form is more useful. And for those who are neither, Tulsidas has this simple and practical advice—to just repeat the Lord’s holy and divine Name even without having any faith and conviction in the Lord and his divine nature—because he says that Lord Ram’s holy Name is just like a well chosen medicine for all the spiritual ailments that afflict a creature in this world, for once a correct medicine is taken by a sick person then it is no matter how that medicine was taken for its good effect will surely show upon the patient, and he would be on the path of recovery.]

rāma susvāmi kusēvaku mōsō. nija disi dēkhi dayānidhi pōsō. 4.

That (merciful and compassionate) Lord Ram (the glories of whose name I have narrated in the forgoing verses) will take care of correcting and rectifying any errors of commission or omission that I might make in my composition (inadvertently or advertently because of my limited skills, knowledge and aptitude)<sup>1</sup>, by setting them right and putting things in order—for the Lord is so exceptionally gracious and kind by nature that he is never tired of nor shies away from showing his unlimited grace and goodwill upon his devotees. (3)

On the one hand is Lord Ram who is an epitome of majesty, nobility and greatness, and on the other hand is me (Tulsidas) who is most humble and full of shortcomings! In spite of this great disparity between the Lord and his servant (i.e. in spite of the fact that I am not the least worthy of being shown any favour by Lord Ram), yet the Lord has graciously accepted me, he has sustained and protected me by showering his enormous bounty of benevolence and munificence upon me<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-11 that precede Doha no. 9 where Tulsidas has already expressed his limitations as far as competence and skills that are needed for one to successfully pen poetry or author any kind of composition.

He says that the only encouragement he has is that his composition has Lord Ram's divine and holy name in it; it is meant to honour Lord Ram and pay tribute to the Lord by singing about his glories and divinity, and it is enough of a qualification as far as he is concerned—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 9 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

Tulsidas also accepts that he is very humble, and does not have anything to rely on by way of a favourable Providence and good Fortune that could have stood him in good stead, because they play a pivotal role in an individual's success in any of his endeavours. So therefore, he asks everyone to excuse him for his boldness in attempting to write the holy story of Lord Ram in spite of his incompetence and limited support from Providence—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 8.

In the present verse Tulsidas expresses his confidence of success because even if he makes mistakes and his composition suffers from shortcomings, yet Lord Ram would take care of such faults by rectifying them himself and polishing the text so much so that it would shine with the radiance of divinity inherent in the Lord holy name that would attract attention and entitle the composition to get respect from one and all.

<sup>2</sup>Normally, a Lord would show favour upon those servants who are competent and skilled in their jobs, and who generally are qualified enough to be worthy of being called an attendant of the Lord keeping in mind the social standing and the stature of their Master. In the case of Tulsidas, he feels that he is not at all worthy of being called a servant or devotee of Lord Ram because he is very humble and has no good qualities worth the name in him that would entitle him to get any attention or favour from his Master, Lord Ram. But the fact that Lord Ram takes special care of such lowly and demoralized person as Tulsidas, never letting the latter feel neglected or underprivileged in any manner, shows how enormously gracious, how great and noble hearted Lord Ram is.

In this context one can note that there are countless verses in Tulsidas' book of prayer called 'Vinai Patrika' where it is stressed that Lord Ram is especially very careful in taking care of the humble and the lowly. Some randomly selected instances are verse nos. 71-72, 162-163, 192.]

ganī garība grāmanara nāgara. paṇḍita mūṛha malīna ujāgara. 6.

sukabi kukabi nija mati anuhārī. nṛpahi sarāhata saba nara nārī. 7.

Verily indeed, it has been observed in the world and is also reiterated in the Vedas (ancient scriptures) that a wise Lord or Master is one who is able to determine the sincerity of affection and devotion in the heart of a person as soon as he hears that person's submission or prayers<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The above principle applies to all—because everyone, males as well as the females (i.e. all the citizens or subjects of a kingdom) would praise their King (i.e. the Lord or the Master whom they serve or under whose domain they live), whether such people are rich or poor, whether they are rustic villagers or urban residents who are deemed to be more cultured, whether they are scholars and experts in their fields or just ordinary folks who are illiterate or unlettered, whether they have a bad reputation or a good one, (6) ---

--- Whether they are known as acclaimed poets, bards or minstrels (who are experts in their fields), or simple laity (who try to please their King by use of ordinary words)—all of them try extol the virtues and goodness of their King (to please him). (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A good Lord or Master or King is a person who has an exceptionally high mental level of understanding and a sense of accommodation; he has a broad outlook, a noble heart, a compassionate nature, and true grace in him. When a petitioner stands before him with some prayer or submission to be made, a good king would hear him patiently and decide the matter on its merit. He can immediately determine, by the virtue of his sixth sense and good understanding of the working of the world, whether or not the person who is standing before him with a petition is honest in his heart, or is he trying to pull a fast trick on the king by his pretensions.

A wise and judicious king's judgment is not based on the person's looks, wealth, stature in society, knowledge, or the ability to praise the king by flowery words of flattery; the king's decision is based on the honesty in the heart of the petitioner and his sincerity, as well as the truth and the merit of the case.

In the context of what Tulsidas has been saying till now in connection with his poetry known as Ram Charit Manas, what he intends to say in these three verses is clear: Lord Ram will not judge Tulsidas on any other parameters of judgment, but on the sincerity and honesty of his heart as to whether it is true or false that Tulsidas wishes to narrate the Lord's divine story to honour the Lord, pay obeisance to him and extol his glories, whether Tulsidas is honest when he says that inspite of his countless faults and shortcomings the only assurance he has with respect to his poem being faultless and perfect, and it being accepted by one and all in this world with respect due to it, is the one single fact that his narration has the holy name of Lord Ram in it, and that he has no intention of being glorified or praised personally for this composition but it is to sing the divine story of his beloved Lord Ram in a selfless manner so that everyone can benefit from it, and it is for this reason that he has chosen to write it in the local vernacular language so that the common man can enjoy the spiritual bliss and happiness that it would provide the society in general.

In the next two verses, i.e. chaupai line nos. 8-11, Tulsidas elaborates further on this idea; he expresses his confidence in Lord Ram that the Lord would graciously accept him and his humble petition in the form of this holy poetry written in the honour of the Lord, because realizing the honesty of Tulsidas' heart and the sincerity of his effort, the Lord would bless him with his grace, benevolence and munificence.]

साधु सुजान सुसील नृपाला । ईस अंस भव परम कृपाला ॥ ८ ॥
सुनि सनमानहिं सबहि सुबानी । भनिति भगति नति गति पहिचानी ॥ ९ ॥

sādhū sujāna susīla nṛpālā. īsa ansa bhava parama kṛpālā. 8.
suni sanamānahiṁ sabahi subānī. bhaniti bhagati nati gati pahicānī. 9.

A great King who is saintly and pious by his nature, who is most courteous and amiable and a thorough gentleman, and who possesses the auspicious virtues of mercy and compassion—such a King is deemed to be a representative of the Lord God in this mortal world (īsa ansa bhava). (8)

He listens to the prayers of everyone, without any discrimination or preferences, and recognizing them for their devotion and loyalty to him, as well as their true intentions, such a wise King would gracefully welcome such people with sweet and pleasant words. (9)

[Note—To wit, Lord Ram immediately judges what is in the depth of the heart of his petitioner. He immediately perceives that the person making a humble prayer is his devotee, inspite of the fact that he may not be a skilled poet who would sing laurels for the Lord in a flowery language, yet he pours out his love for the Lord that is deep in his heart by the rustic language he uses to express himself. Lord Ram immediately understands his language, and then he would warmly accept his devotee with open arms, making him feel at home with a smile and sweet words of welcome.

To wit, Tulsidas says that this being the case, he is sure Lord Ram would welcome him and his composition with grace and compassion by recognizing the high level of love and devotion for the Lord that Tulsidas has deep inside his heart.

This idea is expressly stated in the next two verses herein below.]

यह प्राकृत महिपाल सुभाऊ । जान सिरोमनि कोसलराऊ ॥ १० ॥
रीझत राम सनेह निसोते । को जग मंद मलिनमति मोते ॥ ११ ॥

yaha prākṛta mahipāla subhā'ū. jāna sirōmani kōsalarā'ū. 10.
rijhata rāma sanēha nisōtēm. kō jaga manda malinamati mōtēm. 11.

This (i.e. what has been said herein above in the preceding verses) is the general rule that is universally applicable to the nature and behaviour of all worldly Kings. So then definitely it also applies the 'King of such Kings'—i.e. to Lord Ram, the Lord of Kaushal (Ayodhya) who is the Sovereign Lord of this mortal existence (jāna sirōmani kōsalarā'ū). (10)

Therefore, it goes without saying that Lord Ram is easily endeared to the devotee by the virtue of purity of love and affection for the Lord that the devotee has in his heart.

So who is a bigger fool and of a lower intellect than me (Tulsidas) in this world (that inspite of having such a gracious and merciful Lord Ram as my patron

Lord and protector, who has his graceful hands on my head, I still worry for petty things in this world)! (11)

[Note—The meaning is clear now. Tulsidas affirms that he is being so stupid as to worry about the fate of his poetry, or whether he would be able to complete it successfully, and all such humdrum matters, inspite of declaring that he is a devotee of Lord Ram with a mission of singing his Lord's glories selflessly.

Even ordinary human kings are able to understand the real intention of their petitioners who come to them with certain prayers, and when they see that the person is fully loyal to his king and devoted to his cause, the king would shower his bounty upon that person. So therefore, will it not be so with Lord Ram? Besides this, Lord Ram is the Emperor amongst Kings, so a benediction and reward granted by Lord Ram would surely be in accordance to his exalted stature, which would far exceed and surpass all such grants from other kings. Tulsidas laments at the foolishness of his mind that though it understands these things, yet it worries and worries no end.]

दो०. सठ सेवक की प्रीति रुचि रखिहहिं राम कृपालु।

saṭha sēvaka kī prīti ruci rakhihahim rāma krpālu.

upala ki'ē jalajāna jēhim saciva sumati kapi bhālu. 28 (a).

Tulsidas says: 'I am very sure that such a gracious and merciful Lord Ram would honour the love and devotion of this humble and lowly servant of his, and uphold (fulfill) his wishes (that he wants to compose a story in honour of the Lord inspite of the fact that he has neither the skills nor the competence or any other wherewithal to undertake such a great task)—for almighty Lord Ram is the one whose mere grace made heavy stones float on the water of the ocean to form a majestic bridge at the time of going to Lanka, and who had enabled ordinary monkeys and bears to have such a high degree of wisdom and intelligence that they could become successful councilors and military advisors of the Lord during the war of Lanka. (Doha no. 28-a) [Note—Ordinarily stones don't float on water, and monkeys and bears are low down in the evolutionary hierarchy so normally they are not accepted to have a highly evolved mind and intellect that would make them expert military planners and advisors. But it was by the grace of Lord Ram that both these virtually impossible feats were made possible.

The bridge was constructed by just throwing the stones on the water of the ocean; instead of sinking or being washed away by swift currents they remained afloat and stuck together: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 2; and (ii) Doha no. 3.

Senior monkeys such as Sugriv, Angad and Hanuman, and the chief of the bears, Jamvant, became Lord Ram's close advisors during the entire course of the war in Lanka: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 17; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 39.

Not only this, these humble monkeys and bears were elevated to an exalted stature of being called as his close friends by Lord Ram: apropos—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-9 that precede Doha no. 8.

Tulsidas feels assured by these instances that the merciful Lord Ram, who had showed so much grace upon stones and monkeys and bears, would show such grace upon his humble devotee named Tulsidas too, making him succeed in his mission of writing an excellent story narrating the divine glories of Lord Ram.]

हौंहु कहावत सबु कहत राम सहत उपहास ।

साहिब सीतानाथ सो सेवक तुलसीदास ॥ २८ ( ख ) ॥

haunhu kahāvata sabu kahata rāma sahata upahāsa.
sāhiba sītānātha sō sēvaka tulasīdāsa. 28 (b).

I call myself a true devotee and a humble servant of Lord Ram, because so I am indeed, and the world also taunts me by repeating what I say about myself (because the world thinks I am either joking or have lost my wits). But Lord Ram is so exceptionally kind and gracious that he tolerates both my bold assertions (inspite of my limitations and incompetencies that don't make me eligible to become a favourite of Lord Ram), and also the way the world taunts me and scoffs at the fact that 'on the one hand there is Tulsidas who is good for nothing, and the other hand is the most exalted Lord Ram, the Lord of Sita'<sup>1</sup>! (Doha no. 28-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, when Tulsidas says that he is a devotee and a servant of Lord Ram, he is true in his heart and sincere about his assertions, but the world is skeptical about his claims and doubts its truth because he seems to have no meritorious qualities worth the name that would endear him to Lord Ram, or make him eligible to be honoured with such an exalted stature as being favoured by the Lord for being his devotee and follower.

Besides this, it also puts Lord Ram in a tight spot for accepting such a good-for-nothing person as Tulsidas as his close devotee and follower, one who is fortunate to become a recipient of the Lord's grace and favour. A great Lord is expected to show favour to well qualified, meritorious and competent persons of renown whom he keeps near himself, for such persons with specialized skills and exceptional virtues or stature in society would add some glory to the Lord's own majesty by their being associated with him, but surely the Lord would not like to be associated with useless persons whose presence near him would only tarnish and undermine his personal reputation and majesty.

Yet, Lord Ram is so gracious and kind by his nature that inspite of understanding the situation that accepting Tulsidas would undermine his own reputation as a great and mighty Lord of the World, he still shows his tenderness towards the meek, humble and lowly Tulsidas out of his inherent nature to be gracious and merciful and kind towards those who love the Lord selflessly, who have immense affection for the Lord, who worship the Lord and have true devotion for him, who have faith in the Lord's love for his devotees and followers irrespective of who they are and what their qualities are, for whom Lord Ram is the only destination in their lives, who look upon the Lord for succour and protection in this world, who are persecuted by the world and have no one else to call out for help except Lord Ram, and who are pious, truthful, honest, humble, lowly, meek and simple in their hearts—all qualities that Tulsidas possesses, and which endear him to Lord Ram.

Hence, the great and benevolent Lord Ram does not pay attention to all the taunts and scoffing that the world does vis-à-vis Tulsidas, for the Lord knows that Tulsidas is indeed his true and loyal devotee and servant, whose heart is pure and pious irrespective of what the world says about him. Ironically, the world does not understand these facts, and so it wonders why Lord Ram is so favourable towards Tulsidas.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (i) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 24; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 243 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it. Here we read that sage Vasistha had met the boatman (Kewat) most affectionately because this poor man was so fortunate that he had been blessed by Lord Ram for his devotion and affection for the Lord. The same thing applies to Tulsidas as well, for though he is otherwise most humble and lowly yet he has one great quality in him, which is to have true and undiluted devotion and affection for Lord Ram. These simple virtues raise him to an exalted stature that makes him honourable and a favourite of the Lord.

As to the wonder that inspite of all his shortcomings which Tulsidas has himself admitted, how was it possible for him to pen such a remarkable narrative of Lord Ram's divine story in the form of his classic 'Ram Charit Manas', the answer is found in the first half of this Doha, where Tulsidas says that the most merciful Lord Ram would fulfill Tulsidas' wishes as it is the Lord's nature to honour the wishes of his devotees and servants, no matter how foolish they may be.

Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, has acknowledged this obliging nature of the Lord when he makes a public acknowledgement of the fact that during their childhood days the Lord would willingly lose a game so that Bharat could win it—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 260.

The way Tulsidas has expressed his emotions that though he is so humble, and though he possesses no qualities, yet there is no doubt that Lord Ram would accept him affectionately, is also reflected in Bharat's acknowledgement of his own shortcomings, along with the confidence that the compassionate Lord would forgive him for everything and accept him affectionately. The presiding deity of the holy place known as Prayag had endorsed Bharat's views and blessed him too that his wishes would be fulfilled—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 205.]

[Continuing what has been said in Doha no. 28 herein above, Tulsidas says—]

My assertions (that I am a devotee and servant of Lord Ram, and that the Lord has affection for me) seems very presumptive and inaccurate, so much so that even hell appears skeptical about it, and expresses its doubts and annoyance at me by constricting its nose to scoff and sniff at it, with a great degree of resentment at me in its response to my claims. (1)

I myself quake in fear at the consequences of making such bold claims about myself (regarding my faith, trust, devotion and affection for Lord Ram, because I am unsure what fate has in store for me in case I am wrong), but Lord Ram is so kind, gracious, merciful and benevolent that he takes no notice of my outrageousness and seemingly rash over-confidence even in his dreams<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas feels that he may have exceeded bounds of proper conduct by making so tall claims about his own devotion, affection, faith and trust in Lord Ram on the one hand, and on the other hand unilaterally declaring that Lord Ram has great affection for him that has made the Lord not only sweep aside all of Tulsidas' shortcomings and incompetencies but also welcome him in the honourable community of the Lord's faithful devotees and followers.

But then this great and pious soul Tulsidas immediately finds comfort in the fact that Lord Ram is supremely gracious, kind, compassionate and magnanimous by his inherent nature, and therefore he feels certain that, on the one hand, the Lord would never feel offended by Tulsidas' temerity of making a claim repeatedly about his close and affectionate relationship with Lord Ram without the Lord's nod of approval, and on the other hand, that the Lord would be obliged to honour Tulsidas' words by actually accepting him as his devotee inspite of his many faults.

And when this happens, 'hell', which had scoffed at Tulsidas and was getting ready to punish him, would be perplexed and left wondering as to what to do with him, because once Lord Ram extends his protective shield over Tulsidas, hell won't be able to harm him in any way.

Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 298—to Doha no. 299 where Bharat has expressed the same emotion.

Refer also to Tulsidas' Book of Prayers called 'Vinai Patrika', verse nos. 158, 171, 176 and 182 amongst many other verses which reiterate the ideas expressed here.]

सुनि अवलोकि सुचित चख चाही । भगति मोरि मति स्वामि सराही ॥ ३ ॥
कहत नसाइ होइ हियँ नीकी । रीझत राम जानि जन जी की ॥ ४ ॥

suni avalōki sucita cakha cāhī. bhagati mōri mati svāmi sarāhī. 3.
kahata nasā'i hō'i hiyaṁ nīkī. rījhata rāma jāni jana jī kī. 4.

Lord Ram praised my devotion and affection for him when he heard others speak of them, as well as when he himself observed these qualities in me with his own eyes that can perceive the reality that lies behind the exterior, which consequently convinced him of the truth of my assertions (that I have made heretofore)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

For it is indeed true that Lord Ram looks deep into what is present in the heart of a person rather than what he says on the outside. To wit, if the heart of a person is pure and pious (i.e. if the heart has true love and devotion for the Lord), then even if the person's words are rough and unpleasant to hear, still the all-knowing Lord Ram becomes pleased with him<sup>2</sup>. (4)

<sup>2</sup>To wit, it is not possible to deceive Lord Ram by an external show of piety and holiness, for the all-knowing and omniscient Lord knows what is in the heart of a person, and judges him accordingly; the Lord pays scant attention to external appearances and pretentious behaviour. Hence, Lord Ram has shown favour to Tulsidas not because the latter claims to have devotion and affection for the Lord so as to mislead the world and get respect, but because the Lord could see deep inside Tulsidas' heart and see that he is honest in his claim, and what he says is indeed the truth.]

रहति न प्रभु चित चूक किए की । करत सुरति सय बार हिए की ॥ ५ ॥

 tē bharatahi bhēṇṭata sanamānē. rājasabhām' raghubīra bakhānē. 8.

Lord Ram is so exceptionally gracious and magnanimous that, on the one hand, he does not allow his mind to pay attention to and remember the many failings and shortcomings of his devotees and servants (followers), yet on the other hand the Lord takes special care to notice even the smallest traces of goodness and the minutest of good virtues that they have in their hearts. (5)

[Now, Tulsidas cites some examples to prove his point.]

The misdeeds for which Lord Ram had slayed Baali (the elder brother of Sugriv and the king of the monkeys in Kishkindha) like a hunter would kill his prey without any regret, the same kind of misdemeanour was done by Sugriv, but the Lord overlooked it<sup>1</sup>. (6)

A similar offence was committed by Vibhishan (the brother of Ravana who was the king of Lanka and of the demon race), but Lord Ram never allowed that wrong doing to find a place in his own heart that would have affected his cordial relations with Vibhishan<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Lord Ram showed both of them due respect while they were introduced to his brother Bharat (at the time of the Lord's arrival in Ayodhya from Lanka when everyone went to welcome the Lord on the outskirts of the city); the Lord had praised them even in his royal court (in the presence of all courtiers and ministers and the royal priest)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the fault of Baali, the elder brother of Sugriv, that Lord Ram cited to justify his slaying? The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 6; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 9. The reason that Lord Ram cited for slaying Baali was: “it is a grave sin for an elder brother to keep the wife of his younger brother as a mistress after beating and chasing the latter away”.

But it eventually turned out that Sugriv too had committed a similar mischief after he ascended the throne upon Baali’s death, for after all he too was a lustful creature like his elder sibling, and he was not only selfish but passionate too for enjoyment of worldly pleasures and gratification of the sense organs. These facts are clearly laid out in Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 18; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 21. In these verses two things are to be noted: (i) Lord Ram has threatened to kill Sugriv with the ‘same arrow that he had used to slay his elder brother Baali’. This statement of the Lord is a clear indication that he would ‘punish Sugriv for a crime that is similar to his brother’s misdeeds’; and (ii) Sugriv has himself accepted that he was overcome with passions and desires for self-gratification, and that the lustful sight of a woman and greed for wealth and its accompanying physical pleasures of the senses makes even the wisest lose their self control, leading them astray.

Like Baali who had forcibly kept Sugriv’s wife as his mistress, when Sugriv became a king he too committed the same misdeeds by making Tara, the wife of Baali, his mistress. A hint to this is given in Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 20 where Sugriv has sent Tara to calm down the anger of Laxman who was sent by Lord Ram to summon Sugriv.

Refer also to (a) Tulsidas’ book ‘Kavitawali Ramayan’, Uttar Kand, verse no. 5; and (b) Valmiki’s Ramayana, Uddha / Lanka Kand, Canto 18, verse no. 2.

But however, Lord Ram forgave him, and that too with a smile, saying “you are dear to me like my own brother Bharat”—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 21. Why is it so?

This is a very contentious issue and controversial one. Well, the simple and straightforward answer is this: Once someone surrenders himself before Lord Ram and seeks the Lord’s grace and protection, especially at a time when that person is in distress and needs the Lord’s help to tide over his misfortunes, and when the Lord consequently accepts that creature and assures him of his help and protection, then this assurance of the Lord lasts for a lifetime. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 49.}

In the case of Sugriv, Lord Ram had assured him of abiding friendship and help when they first met, and at that time Sugriv was a hunted person, persecuted by Baali and living under constant danger of being killed anytime. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, (i) Doha no. 4 and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it; (ii) Chaupai line no. 14 that precedes Doha no. 6—to Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 7; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 9.}

But do all these developments mean that Lord Ram retained his resentment for Baali forever? Not at all, surely—for once Baali had sought forgiveness from the Lord and begged for his grace, the Lord willingly blessed him by putting his hand on Baali’s head, and sending him to his own abode in the heaven at the time of his death.

{Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 9—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 11.}

<sup>2</sup>The same thing applies to Vibhishan. He had come to surrender himself to Lord Ram because his life was in danger in Lanka, for his elder brother Ravana, the ruthless king of the demon race, had become excessively angry at him for showing a soft corner for Lord Ram in his heart, for Vibhishan had advised Ravana to return Sita to the Lord and end hostility with him. So Ravana had kicked him out of the kingdom. At that time too Lord Ram had not only welcomed him but also promised all help for his security, making Vibhishan a friend of his. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 40—Doha no. 41; (ii) Doha no. 43—to Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 49.}

What was Vibhishan's fault that Lord Ram overlooked and which Tulsidas cites here? Well, after Vibhishan ascended the throne of Lanka upon Ravana's death in the Great War, he kept Mandodari, Ravana's wife, as one of his mistresses.

The idea expressed in these two Chaupais is also reiterated in Tulsidas' another book called 'Dohawali', in its verse nos. 157 and 159.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 8-a along with Chaupai line nos. 1-9 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 11; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 16—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 17. In these verses we read that Lord Ram had shown great honour to both Sugriv and Vibhishan, treating them equally and with great respect. Lord Ram had not once given any hint in public that he was annoyed with either Sugriv or Vibhishan for their offences.]

Lord Ram stayed under the branches of trees (because he was in the form of a human being) while his dear companions known as the Kapis (literally the 'monkeys') dwelt above him on the same trees. There was so much disparity between them (even in terms of evolution), yet the gracious Lord had cheerfully gone out of his way to make these lowly creatures equal to himself by befriending them, and acknowledging, without any reservations, their companionship and help they gave to him<sup>1</sup>.

Tulsidas unequivocally praises this excellent nature of Lord Ram: that he does not shy away from treating even the most humble and lowly with the respect and dignity that are due to them. Verily indeed, forsooth and without any gainsay, there is no other Lord in this world who is as gracious, compassionate, benevolent and magnanimous as Lord Ram is. (Doha no. 29-a)

Kand, (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-9 that precede Doha no. 8; (iv) Doha no. 16 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it.

All these verses explicitly show how Lord Ram has acknowledged the services these humble Kapis had rendered to him, and how much he feels obliged to them.]

Tulsidas declares: 'Oh Lord Ram! This glory and excellent nature of yours (as stated herein before) is beneficial to one and all in this world, and if this stellar character of yours is indeed true, which definitely it is, then I feel rest assured that everything will be fine and happy for Tulsidas for all times to come.' (Doha no. 29-b)

[Note—Tulsidas expresses his confidence that since Lord Ram has the nature to overlook all faults and shortcomings of his devotees, and that if someone comes to surrender himself before the Lord, seeking nothing but the Lord's grace, then it is sure and certain that Lord Ram obliges him by not only accepting him but even overlooking all his faults and shortcomings, and then granting this person assurance of his abiding protection and grace. With Lord Ram as his patron, what worry can a person have anymore in this world? This assurance is sure to make a distressed person happy, not temporarily, but for his entire lifetime.

In this way, after stressing about my incompetence, limitations and faults, as well as after repeatedly bowing my head reverentially to one and all, I shall now endeavour to narrate the holy, divine and immaculate glories of Lord Ram which have the mystical power to remove all sorrows and evil consequences caused by sins and impurities associated with Kaliyug (the present age)<sup>1</sup>.* (Doha no. 29-c)

Also, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 35 along with Chaupai line nos. 12-13 that precede it.

*This Doha concludes the introductory part of Ram Charit Manas where Tulsidas has first offered his obeisance to everyone, from the high and the mighty to the most humble and of a low degree, seeking forgiveness from them for any error he might make as well as to seek their blessings, and then he goes on to acknowledge his limited knowledge and competence, saying that he is endeavouring to write the holy story of Lord Ram merely to purify his mind and speech, as well as to pay homage to his beloved Lord Ram by singing the Lord's glories in the simple and rustic way in which he can, without any claim of fineness in his composition or expectation of getting any sort of honours.]

The sweet and pleasant story (i.e. the sacred story of Lord Ram which is divine, holy and sweet to hear) which sage Yagyavalkya<sup>1</sup> had narrated to sage Bharadvaj<sup>2</sup> – (1),

I (Goswami Tulsidas) shall now narrate in detail the same conversation at length<sup>3</sup>. All those who are good souls, those who are virtuous and pious, should listen to it attentively, with great delight, as it would give them joy and happiness. (2)

Sage Yagyavalkya belonged to that Vedic period when people had an integral and holistic view of life and the reality behind existence, and all-activities, secular or religious, were regarded as one big, wholesome and composite religious sacrifice called a Yagya. Life itself was consecrated and devoted to the realization of the transcendental and supreme truthful Reality. There was no distinction between renunciation and involvement in life's chores. There was no dichotomy between the two, and the various debates arising in Indian spiritual practices due to different interpretations and re-interpretations of the Vedic and Upanishadic tenets was a product of the later period. One such exemplary sage and seer belonging to that golden period was Yagyavalkya—he was an enlightened wise man who was not only a self-realised householder but an ardent ascetic, an acclaimed scholar and an exemplary renunciate man par-excellence, all at the same time.

It is believed that Yagyavalkya was an incarnation of Lord Brahma, the creator, when he was cursed by Lord Shiva. [Skand Puran, Nagar Khand, 1-9.] His father was named Brahmabahu (literally, the limbs of Brahma, because the latter's limbs had manifested as this person). [Vayu Puran, 61.] But according to a book of religious law written by Yagyavalkya himself known as 'Yagyavalkya Sanhita', his father also had the same name. So, our Yagyavalkya was, in effect, 'Yagyavalkya, the second'. [Yagyavalkya Sanhita, 1.]

There is another story in connection with the birth of sage Yagyavalkya; it is narrated in Skanda Puran, Haatkeswar Kshetra Mahatamya, Naagar Khand. It says that once the creator Brahma was doing a fire sacrifice. His consort named Savitri was late in arriving at the ritual site, and the auspicious moment was passing away. Since such sacrifices are to be done by both the husband and wife sitting together, and Savitri hadn't arrived, so in order to tide over this difficulty, Indra, the king of gods, brought a maiden of the milkmen community and asked Brahma to symbolically marry her so that the sacrifice ritual can be duly completed within the stipulated auspicious time frame. Brahma was reluctant, but there was no other choice before him. So he made that maiden enter the mouth of a cow and emerge from her womb, which symbolically gave her a new birth. This lady came to be known as 'Gayatri'—meaning 'born from a cow; the offspring of a cow'. Brahma then accepted her as his partner and performed the sacrifice.

Meanwhile, Brahma's consort Savitri arrived on the scene, and finding another woman sitting alongside him as his wife, she became infuriated and cursed her husband to become a human being, because he was so impatient and lustful like human beings usually are, for he couldn't wait for her and decided to make do with another woman. After thus cursing her husband Brahma, Savitri went to the mountains and started doing Tapa (severe penances and austerities) for purification. Meanwhile, Brahma had to honour her curse, and so he took birth in the household of a great sage by the name of Charan pronounced as Chaaran). Thus, Brahma became 'Yagyavalkya' in this birth. But owing to Savitri's curse, he had become exceedingly lustful and fidgety; so his father, sage Charan, expelled him from his hermitage. Yagyavalkya roamed around for some time and finally came to the hermitage of another great sage named Shakalya (pronounced as Shaakalya) near the ancient city of Chamatkarpur (pronounced as Chamatkaar Pur); it was here that Yagyavalkya studied the Vedas.

Once it so happened that a king of the kingdom of Aanartadesh performed a great fire sacrifice, and he invited sage Shakalya to preside over its rituals as the chief priest. Shakalya used to send one of his disciples daily by turn to look after the rituals; one day it was the turn of Yagyavalkya. After completing the rituals when Yagyavalkya went to give sanctified Prasad (offering of rice) to the king and bless him before leaving the venue, he found the king in a compromising intimate posture with a woman. The king was so engrossed in sensual pleasures that he asked Yagyavalkya to leave the sanctified rice grains on a log of firewood lying nearby. Infuriated at this stance of the lustful king who did not observe self-restraint over his passions even while the fire sacrifice was underway, and had insulted the sanctified rice as well as Yagyavalkya, the sage sprinkled those rice grains over the said log of wood and returned to his teacher's hermitage, but he was very angry. In the meantime, that dead-wood became green and new shoots sprouted from its side, and soon it bore green leaves and flowers. The king was stunned at this mystical transformation, and realized the immensity of spiritual powers of Yagyavalkya. He sent a messenger to Shakalya with a request that he should send this particular disciple of his daily to complete the rest of the rituals. When Shakalya ordered Yagyavalkya to go to the do the rituals the next day, he refused, and explained to his guru what had happened the previous day. But Shakalya wished to please the king in return of some reward, so he insisted. When Yagyavalkya firmly refused to go to attend a lustful king who had even insulted him, Shakalya became angry at his disciple, accusing him of not obeying his guru, though the fault was not of Yagyavalkya at all.

Peeved at Yagyavalkya's refusal to obey his commands, Shakalya asked him to return the knowledge of the Vedas that the latter had got from him. Stunned by this irrational demand of his guru, Yagyavalkya decided that it is not the worth for him to keep such a person as his teacher, so he vomited out all the knowledge of the Vedas by sipping a mouthful of sanctified water. This vomited knowledge of the Vedas was immediately picked up by other disciples of Shakalya who assumed the form of partridges to gobble it up. This knowledge came to be known as the 'Krishna Yajur Vedas'.

Meanwhile, once Yagyavalkya lost all his previous knowledge of the Vedas, which practically means he decided to forget what he had learnt out of disgust for his guru who lacked true wisdom and nobleness of heart to stoop so low as to ask a disciple to return what he had learnt after hard toil of long years, he wondered again like a foolish man. Then he went to a place called Hatkeshwar (pronounced as Haatkeshwar) where he consecrated twelve idols of the Sun God and worshipped him. Pleased by his devotion and sincerity, the Sun God appeared before him and asked him to seek a boon. Yagyavalkya requested the Sun to teach him the Vedas once again. So the Sun God blessed him and asked him to assume a diminutive form and sit in the ears of one of his seven horses where he will be protected against the fierce heat of the Sun's rays, and while the Sun God's chariot traverses across the firmament he will teach Yagyavalkya the entire text of the Vedas. So in this way, Yagyavalkya learnt the Vedas once again. This knowledge was called 'Shukla Yajur Veda', which refers to the knowledge of Brahm, so-called as it is the knowledge of the pure cosmic Consciousness that is as bright, enlightening and splendorous as the rays of the sun. {Naagar Kand, Canto 278.}

According to this ancient text, Yagyavalkya had two wives—Maitreyi and Kaatyaani. One renowned sage named Kaatyaayan was the son of Kaatyaani. {Naagar Kand, Canto 130.}

Yagyavalkya's teacher in the science of Yoga (meditation) and the knowledge of the self (metaphysics and philosophy) was sage Vasistha, son of Hiranyanabha Kaushalya, a king of the Raghu dynasty which ruled Ayodhya in ancient times. [Vayu Puran, 88; Bhagwat Mahapuran, 93/106.] The sage performed severe penances and austerities, know as Tapa, at Mithila, the birth place of Sita, the divine consort of Lord Ram. [Skandpuran, Reva Khand, 42.]

He used to attend the court of great ancient wise kings, such as king Janak (the father of Sita—Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, canto 3-4) and Yudhisthir (of the Mahabharat fame—Mahabharat, Sabha Parva, 4/32). It was in the court of king Janak that Yagyavalkya had defeated all the assembled scholars of the time on various metaphysical and theological concepts. He is also believed to be a chief priest in Yudhisthir's Rajsu Yagya.

Sage Yagyavalkya was one of the greatest, most erudite, wise and renowned seers of his time. He was a senior and enlightened man, so wise and learned a scholar that even king Janak, who himself was a most self-realised and enlightened king of his era, was so much bowled over by his erudition, depth of knowledge and scholarship that he accepted the sage's discipleship (refer Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, Canto 4, Brahmin 2, verse nos. 1, 4). He was proclaimed the undisputed champion and winner in a metaphysical and theological debate held in the court of Janak during the course of a great fire sacrifice held where great scholars, seers and sages from far and wide had assembled (refer Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, Canto 3, Brahmin 1-9).

He was a much sought after teacher and an honoured exponent of the eclectic Advaita Vedanta philosophy of non-duality. This basically propounds, inter alia, that everything in existence, visible or invisible, minute or colossus, important or unimportant, are all fundamentally the same singular unit called Brahm manifested in myriad and diverse ways, that therefore nothing that exists which is not Brahm is not true, that this Brahm is the only supreme Authority and Divinity in the entire creation, that this Brahm and the individual Atma or pure consciousness of the creature are one and the same, and not two independent units, that this Atma is the pure self, etc. Anything contrary to this is false and fallacious.

It is believed that all major Upanishads belonging to the Yajur Veda tradition are either directly or indirectly expounded and enunciated by and elucidated upon by Yagyavalkya or any one of his long line of disciples who had acquired this eclectic knowledge from him. (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 2/6/1-3, 4/6/1-3 and 6/5/1-3.)

One such example is the Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition in which sage Yagyavalkya has taught even the teacher of the Gods, i.e. Brihaspati, about the esoteric secrets and the profound spiritual importance as well as the significance of the Tarak Mantra, and about the divine nature of Lord Ram and his great Mantras that can provide a creature with Mukti (spiritual liberation and deliverance) once and for all.

The high spiritual prowess and reach of Yagyavalkya can be judged from the fact that he could communicate directly with the Supreme Being called Mandal Purush in his visible manifestation as the brilliant and splendorous Sun as described in Mandal Brahmin Upanishad of Shukla Yajur Veda tradition. The fact that Yagyavalkya had a repeated communion with the Sun God, at least on four occasion is clearly marked out in Mandal Brahmin Upanishad, 1/1/1-2; 2/1/1-2; 3/1/1-2; 4/1/1-2.

Yagyavalkya was a rich householder sage and seer. This is borne out by the fact that (a) on each occasion when he attended great debates he was showered with huge largesse by king Janak in the form of immense quantity of gold and thousands cows (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 3/1/1-2, 4/1/1-7, 4/3/33, 4/4/23), and (b) when he asks his wife Maitreyi to partition his vase estate before he went on to take Sanyas (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 2/4/1-2, 4/5/1-2).

The creation of Yajur Veda's two branches:- The word 'Yajus' means a liturgy of hymns chanted during the fire sacrifice. The Yajur Veda has been classified into Krishna and Shukla branches. It would be pertinent and interesting to add a brief note here on why the Yajur Veda has come to be known as Krishna and Shukla, meaning 'black' and 'white' respectively. The Yajur Veda Sanhita (a collection of Mantras or hymns) is classified into these two types for a variety of reasons. One of the probable reasons for this Yajur Veda having two names is that the collection in the Sanhita that came to be known as 'Krishna' had a mixture of prose and poetry, and hence considered 'impure and corrupted'. This is because primarily the Vedas were composed in poetry form with the verses structured according to one or the other methods of poetical composition called 'Chandas'. Prose as style of composition came later on and was regarded as an interpolation, interposition or juxtaposition which is all tantamount to corrupting the original method. Hence, that text which had both the poetry and prose was deemed to be 'corrupted and impure form of the Vedic text', and therefore called 'Krishna'—the dark one. On the other hand, the Sanhita which had only poetry was considered un-adulterated and pure form of the Vedic text, and hence called 'Shukla' or the white one, the colour 'white' being the colour of purity, immaculacy, divinity and holiness.

Since the primary use of the hymns of the Vedas in earlier times was for incantatory chanting during religious fire sacrifices, the poetical mode of composition was more suitable than the prose model. That is why these hymns were composed in 'Chandas' which are the different styles in which Sanskrit verses are composed. Later on, when these verses were also being used for purposes other than the fire sacrifices, the prose model evolved and developed. The Upanishads are mainly in the prose model because they are philosophical treatises and not ritualistic incantatory chanting.

Another plausible reason is that the verses of the Krishna Yajur Veda are more difficult to understand than those of the Shukla Yajur Veda. Hence, the former were called 'dark' or Krishna because of the difficulty in their comprehension and explanation as compared to the more easier ones classified as 'white' or Shukla. The Krishna Yajur Veda Sanhita was more prevalent in the south of India while the Shukla was more common in the north of the country.

The third reason is that the original classifier of Vedas was 'Krishna Dvaipaayana Veda Vyas' who taught the text of the Yajur Veda to his disciple called Vaishampaayana. Hence, the original version of the text was named 'Krishna' in order to commemorate this fact.

There is a fourth probable reason as outlined here. The chief exponent of the Yajur Veda is regarded as the ancient sage Yagyavalkya. He was one of the several disciples of sage Vaishampayana. Once the teacher asked his disciples to perform the 'Brahmavadhya' sacrifice (a type of elaborate penance) for him. Yagyavalkya was so confident of himself, his knowledge and competency that he offered to do it all by himself for his teacher. The teacher thought that he was haughty and boastful. So, disowning or disinheriting him from his line of disciples, he commanded that Yagyavalkya should return all that he had learnt from his teacher. The sage returned all the Mantras of the Yajur Veda that he had learnt from his teacher by 'vomiting' them out. The rest of the disciples were very cunning; they transformed themselves immediately into partridges, called Tittars, and gobbled up everything. From that developed the Krishna Yajur Veda's Taitirriya branch. It is called 'Krishna' after the teacher and 'Taitirriya' after the partridges. Also, since they were 'vomited products' they were regarded as polluted and impure. Such body of knowledge came to be known as 'Krishna'—the impure one.

Now, not to be demoralized so easily and determined to get back his lost knowledge and wisdom, Yagyavalkya worshipped the Sun God who blessed him with a fresh set of Mantras of the Yajur Veda. Since it came from a 'bright source' represented by the sun, this set of Mantras was called the 'Shukla Yajur Veda'. [The word 'Shukla' means 'bright or light or illuminated'.] The sage revised this into fifteen sub-texts, called the Vaaj-saneī, i.e. those belonging to the horse race. This is because the Sun God had assumed the form of a 'horse' to teach him, and the word 'Vaajis' means a horse. The teaching was done in the form of the cosmic neighing. This form of the Sun God came to be worshipped as 'Hayagriva', the Lord with the neck of a horse. An entire Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition is named after this God, and it is called 'Hayagriva Upanishad'. It is the 29th Upanishad of this Veda.

Yagyavalkya had fifteen disciples (e.g. Kaanva, Maadhyandin etc.) who mastered one each of these fifteen sub-text created by Yagyavalkya. [Vishnu Puran, 3-5; Vayu Puran, 60-1.] The list of sages and seers who excelled in the Shukla Yajur Veda branch has been given in Brihad-Aaranyaka Upanishad, Canto 2, Brahmin 6, and Canto 4, Brahmin 6.

The Yajur Veda is divided into two major types—viz. the Shukla (white) and Krishna (black or dark). The Krishna Yajur Veda has only four branches existing at present out of the earlier eighty-five—Taitirriya, Maitraayani, Katha, and Kapisthal. Its Brahman is known as Taitirriya Brahman. The Shukla Yajur Veda, also known as the Vaajsaneyi Sanhita, originally had seventeen branches, but now only following two branches exist—Kaanva and Maadhyandeen. Its Brahman is known as Shatpath Brahman.

The sub-Veda of the Yajur Veda is known as Dhanur-Veda which deals with the science of archery and warfare.

The Aaranyakas of the Yajur Veda are—Taittiriya (of the Krishna Yajur Veda) and Brihad-aaranyak (of the Shukla Yajur Veda).

There are 19 principal Upanishads of the Shukla Yajur Veda, and 32 principal Upanishads of the Krishna Yajur Veda—such as Taittiriya, Swetaasvatar, Katha, Brihdaaranakya, Maitri, Ishavasya Upanishads etc.

The priests who used the hymns of the Yajur Veda during fire sacrifices were called ‘Yajus’ or ‘Adhwaryu’.

The story of “Ram Charit Manas” written by Goswami Tulsidas, that describes the life, time and deeds done by Lord Ram, a human incarnation of the Supreme Being, was unveiled as a discourse between sage Bharadwaj and sage Yagyavalkya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47.

Yagyavalkya had previously heard this divine and holy story of the Lord from the saint-crow Kaagbhusund who himself had heard it from Lord Shiva, the original conceiver of the story—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precedes Doha no. 30.

Family—He had two wives. The elder was named Katayani, and the second was called Maitreyi. From the elder wife, he had a son named Katyanana. [Skandpuran, Nagar Khand, 130; Brihad Aranya Upanishad, 4/5/1.] According to ‘Yogi Yagyavalkya’, a hand book on Yoga, his third wife was Gargi, though she is depicted as a rival interviewer who tested the sage’s erudition and scholarship in Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad. [Yogi Yagyavalkya, edited by Upendranath, Vasumati—Calcutta, 1-5.]

Sanyas—Though Yagyavalkya was externally a householder sage and seer, he was internally (i.e. mentally; intellectually and emotionally) a highly self-realised and an exceptionally enlightened man, a sincere ascetic and a renunciate monk who knew the futility of worldly pursuits. He was not preaching what he did not believe in. So he finally took to the eclectic path of Sanyas as clearly mentioned in Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 4/5/15.

Works—Yagyavalkya wrote great texts on Yoga, metaphysics and law pertaining to daily life, much like Manu’s Smiriti Law. (i) Yagyavalkya Sanhita contains religious laws; (ii) Yog Sanhita was composed in the hermitage of sage Upmanyu [Kurma Puran, 25.]; and (iii) Yogi Yagyavalkya on Yoga philosophy.

Yagyavalkya was a great and acclaimed Yogi (an ascetic) as well as a philosopher and preacher par-excellence of metaphysical principles, one who was well-versed in the knowledge of Brahm and the Atma.

<sup>2</sup>Sage Bharadwaj—Sage Bharadwaj is regarded as one of the seven celestial sages known as Sapta Rishis. Ironically, we find many ancient sages with this name, and therefore it is clear that this word was used more as a surname or title rather than the name of an individual sage or seer. Bharadwaj is regarded as a Vedic sage after whom a lineage of sages and seers of the highest order was established. His disciples assumed their teacher’s name as their title, and came to be known as Bharadwajs.

Sage Bharadwaj Baarhasptya is the seer of several hymns of the Rig Veda, Mandal no. 6. He is the son of Brihaspati, the moral preceptor of the Gods. He was the father of Dronacharya of the Mahabharata who has taught Arjun the science of archery.

The epic story of the life and times of Lord Ram that was written by the legendary poet Goswami Tulsidas, the book titled “Ram Charit Manas”, mentions sage Bharadwaj. He lived in Prayag, the confluence of three holy rivers, viz. the Ganges, the Yamuna and the Saraswati. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44.

The story that narrates the time, life and acts of of Lord, a human manifestation of the Supreme Being, as told in the epic Ram Charit Manas was unveiled as a discourse between sage Bharadwaj and sage Yagyavalkya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 47.

Later on in the narration of Ram Charit Manas we read that Lord Ram had visited the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj during his forest sojourn—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 106—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 109.

Sage Bharadwaj is credited with two great works—viz. Bharadwaj Shrauta-Sutras consisting of ten sections, and Bharadwaj Griha-Sutras.

The profound philosophy pertaining to the divine nature of Lord Ram and him being the Tarak Brahm himself personified is preached to sage Bharadwaj by sage Yagyavalkya in Ram Uttar Tapini Upnishad of the Atharva Veda, Canto nos. 2-3.

In addition to this, the story of Lord Shiva’s marriage with Parvati was narrated to sage Bharadwaj by sage Yagyavalkya in Ram Charit Manas—refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 104.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Doha no. 47. Here we read that sage Yagyavalkya had narrated to sage Bharadwaj the story of Lord Ram which Lord Shiva had narrated to his consort goddess Uma some time in the past.]

संभु कीन्ह यह चरित सुहावा । बहुरि कृपा करि उमहि सुनावा ॥ ३ ॥
सोइ सिव कागभुसुंदिहि दीन्हा । राम भगत अधिकारी चीन्हा ॥ ४ ॥ sambhu kīnha yaha carita suhāvā. bahuri kṛpā kari umahi sunāvā. 3.

sō’i siva kāgabhusuṇḍihi dīnhā. rāma bhagata adhikārī cīnhā. 4.

Lord Shambhu (Shiva) was the first one who had conceived this glorious story that is so beautiful and pleasant (to hear and remember)<sup>1</sup>. He then graciously told or revealed it to Uma, his consort<sup>2</sup>. (3)

It is the same story that the Lord (Shiva) gave (i.e. told or revealed) to Kaagbhusund when he found that the latter was eligible to hear this story and was worthy to receive it as he had immense Bhakti (devotion, faith, reverence and affection) for Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva had conceived this sacred, divine and holy story of Lord Ram in his Mana—i.e. he had conceived it in his mind and enshrined it reverentially in his heart. When the time came he revealed it to his consort. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.

<sup>2</sup>Why did Shiva reveal this story to Uma has been explained in Ram Charit Manas, (i) Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Doha no. 111; and (ii) Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 52—to Doha no. 55.

<sup>3</sup>The story of Lord Ram that the saintly crow Kaagbhusund had heard from Lord Shiva was narrated by him to Garud, Lord Vishnu's celestial mount, when the latter was confused about the reality of Lord Ram. This narrative forms the second half of Uttar Kand of Ram Charit Manas. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Doha no. 125.

Lord Shiva had himself found Kaagbhusund eligible to have devotion for Lord Ram, and so Shiva blessed him with this glorious spiritual reward. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 109.

Even Lord Ram had personally blessed Kaagbhusund—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 85.]

तेहि सन जागबलिक पुनि पावा । तिन्ह पुनि भरद्वाज प्रति गावा ॥ ५ ॥
ते श्रोता बकता समसीला । सवँदरसी जानहिं हरिलीला ॥ ६ ॥

tēhi sana jāgabalika puni pāvā. tinha puni bharadvāja prati gāvā. 5.
tē śrōtā bakatā samasīlā. savamḍarasī jānahim harilīlā. 6.

Then from him (i.e. from Kaagbhusund), sage Yagyavalkya had received this story<sup>1</sup>, and subsequently he (Yagyavalkya) had recited it to sage Bharadvaj (or 'sung' it for him)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

These two sages, the hearer as well as the narrator (i.e. sage Bharadvaj who had listened to the story, and Yagyavalkya who had recited or narrated it to him), were both exalted, wise, learned and enlightened sages in their own right. They were both equally courteous and possessed equally excellent virtues; they had evenness of mind, uniformity of view and treated everyone alike<sup>3</sup>; and they were acquainted with the mysteries of Lord Hari's (Supreme Being's) maverick deeds and mystical plays. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The genesis and the sequence of how the divine story of Lord Ram, known as 'Ram Charit Manas', was first conceived and revealed, and then how it reached great sages of ancient time, has been outlined in the foregoing verses.

The lineage is clearly marked: It was first conceived in the Mana (heart and mind) of Lord Shiva, who then told it to his consort Uma; Kaagbhusund also was told the same story by Shiva. From Kaagbhusund it was heard by sage Yagyavalkya, and the latter revealed it to sage Bharadvaj.

The wondrous fact to note here is that Kaagbhusund was a crow, not a human being, and sage Yagyavalkya's hearing and understanding of this holy story from a saint who had the body of a crow, and hence spoke in a crow's language (i.e. he 'crowed'), proves that Yagyavalkya could comprehend languages of birds. It's not surprising though, because this sage was exceptionally able and possessed rare skills, for he was no one else but Brahma, the creator of all knowledge, himself. How Brahma became Yagyavalkya has already been narrated in an elaborate note on Yagyavalkya appended to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 29 herein above.

<sup>3</sup>To wit, both Yagyavalkya and Bharadwaj were realised souls who did not distinguish between creatures based on their physical bodies, as they knew that the Atma, which indeed is the true self of all living beings, is the same ‘pure consciousness’ that uniformly dwells in all the creatures, though the body of one creature is different from the other. They also knew that this Atma of the individual creature is the same as the Supreme Atma of this creation that is known as the Parmatma, or the Supreme Being. The only difference between these two, i.e. between the individual’s Atma and the Parmatma, is the level at which it is understood, for the individual’s Atma exists at the microcosmic level of existence while the Parmatma exists at the macrocosmic level of the same existence. So they treated everyone with equal affection and respect.

Hence, these two exalted sages could easily understand that though Lord Ram had the physical body of a human being, and he acted also like a human being, yet in reality he was the cosmic Consciousness known as Parmatma, or the Supreme Atma, in that form.]

aura'u jē haribhagata sujānā. kahahim̐ sunahim̐ samujhahim̐ bidhi nānā. 8.

They had transcendental knowledge, knowing definitely of the past, the present as well as the future in the same way as a person has a definite and an unambiguous knowledge of anything, for example the cherry plum (āmalaka), that he holds in his palms (right before his eyes)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Besides these sages, there are countless other devotees of the Lord as well as erudite and wise persons who narrate it in various ways, who hear it and understand it, and all of them hold the same view about its authenticity, holiness and spiritual powers.

[To wit, apart from these sages, other virtuous, enlightened and noble souls who are devotees of the Lord (Sri Ram), who adore the Lord and worship him, recite or narrate, hear, interpret and understand this story in a variety of ways]<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Both Yagyavalkya and Bharadwaj were great sages; they had such mystical powers that they could see what had happened at any point of time in the past, what is happening anywhere in the present time, and what will happen in the future too. To wit, they could perceive the reality of any given thing irrespective of its outer appearances. In the context of the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, it simply means that they could easily see that it contains a faithful account of the life and the deeds done by the Lord; they could also see that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human prince but the almighty Supreme Being himself in his form.

Hence, since they could not be deceived by falsehoods, pretensions, superfluity and external embellishments that may be used to polish a story and refine it make it look extraordinarily glorious and enchanting, so when they assert that the story of Ram Charit Manas is truly a divine and holy story that can grant spiritual bliss and joy to its reader, hearer and narrator, then surely it is a matter of fact beyond doubt.

It is as certain a fact as one actually holding a cherry plum in his hand; he can actually see it, feel it, taste it and smell it. The physical plum present in his hand is not a figment of that person's fertile imagination, but it's a reality. So likewise, what has been said about Ram Charit Manas is not something imaginary, but a matter of fact.

<sup>2</sup>The same story of Lord Ram acquires countless forms and versions depending upon the narrator and the listener. This is because each individual has his own level of wisdom, knowledge and intellect, and so each would interpret and understand the same universal story in his own unique way. Therefore, the way the story is told and passed on from generation to generation changes; it acquires countless variations, contours and connotations, but essentially it remains the same.]

[Goswami Tulsidas says—] Further, I have myself heard this story from my Guru (teacher and preceptor) at a place called 'Sukarkheta'<sup>1</sup>. But I could not fully grasp its meaning and import at that time as I was in my childhood days when the mind and the intellect are not mature<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 30-a)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sukarkheta or Sukar-shetra is the place where, according to legends, Lord Vishnu had appeared in the form of the Boar ("sukar") to slay the demon named Hiranyaaksha, the elder brother of the demon Hiranyakshipu. In this form, Lord Vishnu had salvaged the earth from remaining submerged in the depths of the ocean where the said demon had hidden it.

In the present day, Sukarshetra is believed to be located in a district known as Gonda across the river Saryu, approximately thirty miles from Ayodhya in the North-West direction. An old cottage where Tulsidas and his guru, saint Narhari-Das used to live still exists here atop a small hillock or mound of earth that is roughly twenty feet above the surrounding land. They chose it because the river Ghagra (by which river Saryu is known locally) inundated the surrounding plains during its spate in the rainy season. A huge Banyan tree and an Indian fig tree are located here next to this hut; it is locally believed that they were planted by Tulsidas' guru.

According to another account, it situated in a place called Soron in the west of the state of Uttar Pradesh in India.

These two places are called “Sukar Shetra” also because they are predominantly grazing land for domesticated animals. Earlier its inhabitants used to breed swine here; hence the name ‘Sukar’.

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas’ guru (teacher) was saint Narhari-Das. It is believed that Tulsidas became his disciple at the tender age of seven years. Narhari Das first brought the child Tulsidas to Ayodhya where the young boy studied the Sutras of Panini (Sanskrit grammar) for roughly ten months.

Then his guru took him to Sukarshetra roughly at the age of eight years and four months. There, Tulsidas continued with his Sanskrit studies for another five years. Simultaneously, his guru taught him the story of Lord Ram in the vernacular language, repeating it many times so that the young boy could know it like the back of his hand—see verse line no. 1 that follows this Doha herein below.

Hence, at the time Tulsidas learnt the story of Ramayana he was approximately of sixteen or seventeen years of age. That is why he says that he could not properly estimate the profound importance of Ram Charit Manas due to his childhood days when his mind and intellect were still immature.]

Both the listener and the narrator of the divine story of Lord Ram should be extremely wise, enlightened and intelligent; he must have the requisite competence and intellectual prowess to properly understand, interpret and benefit from it, because this story is highly mystical, with profundity of spiritualism and abundance of metaphysical principles as its contents. [To wit, it is beyond comprehension of those who are dull and stupid, or those who lack the wisdom and intellect to comprehend spiritual principles of profound depth and great magnitude. Those who do not exert themselves to pay proper attention to the gravity and depth of Ram Charit Manas vis-à-vis its spiritual messages will be like those blind fools who miss seeing the tree while living in the forest.]

Say then, how could I fully grasp the spiritual depth and the magnitude of its metaphysical message when I heard, given that I am a dull person of a low intellect who is overshadowed by the taints and shortcomings associated with life in the present age of Kaliyug (the present era where spiritual wisdom is at a premium, and people are more inclined to be interested in worldly affairs instead of spiritual matters)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 30-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas is being humble and unpretentious when he makes this observation. He implies that a true devotee of Lord Ram must never be boastful and haughty about his spiritual achievements as it would undo whatever he may have gained.

Remember: Tulsidas was not a fool or an illiterate person, and neither was he an ordinary person—because otherwise it would not have been possible for him to pen the marvellous epic book known as ‘Ram Charit Manas’, which till today has had no match. The lucidity, flow and succulence of the verses of this book holds the reader, the recitor and the listener equally enthralled and captivated as if by a wand of magical charm. The fact is that Tusidas was a blessed soul no less than any of the sages he mentions here—viz. Kaagbhusund, Yagyavalkya or Bharadwaj. It goes to his credit that he prefers to keep a low profile and act most modestly and humbly like a true devotee of Lord Ram should.]

Though I could not follow or understand the story of Lord Ram easily, my Guru had patience with me, and he kept on telling it to me repeatedly. But by-and-by I could follow and understand it little by little in accordance to my intellectual abilities<sup>1</sup>. (1)

I shall now put that understanding of mine with respect to the story of Lord Ram in simple words using the local dialect<sup>2</sup>, as this endeavour would give immense satisfaction to me.

To wit, I am narrating the holy and divine story of Lord Ram for my own joy and contentment (and not for any other purpose, such as expectation of getting any kind of honour or praises for writing it)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas was of a tender young age of approximately eight or eight and a half years when his guru named Narhari Das started teaching him the story of the Ramayana in the local dialect known as Avadhi. He taught Tulsidas the story of Lord Ram repeatedly, according to some traditions for twenty-four times, till this young boy attained his teens, i.e. till Tulsidas attained the age of thirteen or fourteen years. By this time his intellectual abilities also developed, and so he began to grasp the meaning and depth of the story of Ram Charit Manas better; he began to realize its profound spiritual import and the benefit it can grant to ordinary folks.

There is an important message here. And it is this: If one is unable to fully comprehend the secrets and mysteries of the story of Lord Ram, he must not lose hope but continue with the effort. He should hear the story again and again. In due course of time the darkness of ignorance would clear in a gradual manner, and the sunlight of spiritual knowledge with its sunshine of joy and happiness would dawn in the seeker's inner-self, filling him with a sense of fulfillment, elation and bliss.

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas says that he will re-tell the same story which he had heard from his Guru, but in a simple local language which is his mother-tongue and with which he is conversant. He won't use Sanskrit which is the language used by scholars and learned people. This is because he would be better able to put into words whatever little he has understood of the story if he uses a language he knows best—viz. his local mother-tongue.

It ought to be noted here that this is the primary reason why the story of the Ramayana written by Tulsidas with the title “Ram Charit Manas” became so popular and famous—it is because he had written it in the local dialect, using the common language and lexicon that an ordinary person could very easily understand and identify with. So, Tulsidas' version touched the heart of the masses immediately as it was free from complicated jargon and complexities of language and metaphysical or spiritual knowledge that are inherent in other versions of the Ramayana.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 10 he says that the only courage he has in going ahead with his narration is that the book has the holy name of Lord Ram in it, and this is enough for him as an encouragement, though he has no competence or expertise as a poet—apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 8.]

Whatever little strength of wisdom, erudition, knowledge, intellectual abilities and competence that I have, I shall employ them to do my best to narrate this divine and holy story (of Lord Ram) as my heart is inspired to do by the grace of Lord Hari (Lord Sri Ram)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

I shall do it also because this sacred and mystical story of the Lord would help me to get rid of my own doubts, delusions and bewilderments pertaining to existence in this gross mortal world (for this will give me abiding peace and unbound joy)<sup>2</sup>.

This holy story of Lord Ram is like a sturdy boat that can take a creature across the vast river symbolized by this gross mortal existence<sup>3</sup>. (4)

<sup>2</sup>Tulsidas makes it amply clear that he is going to tell this divine story of Lord Ram in order to eliminate any remnants of darkness caused by worldly delusions that may still be present in his heart and mind. Apart from the fact that the narration of this holy story spiritually benefits the narrator himself, the feeling of satisfaction that he gets when he finds that the listener too is filled with spiritual joy and bliss are additional rewards for him. Both the listener and the narrator therefore benefit by this sacred story of Lord Ram. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30-b herein above.

In Uttar Kand we read that Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu, too was overcome with confusions and delusions; it was only after hearing the story of Ram Charit Manas from the saintly crow Kaagbhusund that Garud finally found his peace. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Doha no. 68; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 125.

Even goddess Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva, was not beyond the tentacles of delusions and doubts. It was to remove her perplexities and give her peace of mind that Lord Shiva had revealed the divine story of Lord Ram to her in the beginning. In order to cross a wide and turbulent river with swift currents, a good and strong boat is needed. Likewise, for the purpose of obtaining deliverance from the miseries and torments of this mundane gross world, the divine story of Lord Ram acts like a buoy and a barge as it helps the devotee to find steadiness in his life and live peacefully in this world, with the assurance that he will finally attain spiritual blessedness and bliss.]

rāmakathā kali pannaga bharanī. puni bibēka pāvaka kahum̐ aranī. 6.

The spiritual story of Lord Ram, known as the ‘Ram Katha’ (rāmakathā), gives peace and rest to those who are wise, sagacious and enlightened. It delights all those who hear it, making them happy and blissful. It neutralises the negative effects of all the spiritual taints associated with Kaliyug. (5)

For the serpent symbolising Kaliyug, this Ram Katha is like a peacock (which is an enemy of serpents as it eats them)<sup>1</sup>.

For the purpose of kindling the fire of spiritualism and wisdom, it is like a piece of firewood known as ‘Arani’<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the divine story of Lord Ram is as beautiful as the peacock because on the one hand it is charming, sweet and pleasant to hear and delights the heart, and on the other hand it destroys all the fears and torments arising for a creature due to Kaliyug just like the beautiful peacock that can devour a poisonous snake.

<sup>2</sup>During fire sacrifices, two pieces of firewood are rubbed vigorously to create a spark that lights up the sacred fire in the sacrificial pit. So, when one hears, reflects and contemplates upon this divine story of Ram Charit Manas for sometime, spirituality and wisdom sprouts automatically in his heart and mind.]

sō'i basudhātala sudhā taraṅgini. bhaya bhaṅjani bhrama bhēka bhu'aṅgini. 8.

Ram Katha (the story of Lord Ram) is like the symbolic all wish-fulfilling cow known as Kaamdhenū during the era of Kaliyug (i.e. in the present world, it fulfils all the wishes of devotees).

For those who are wise and good, it is like a magical root that provides whatever they want. [Just like a medicinal herb that can cure the gravest of diseases if selected and administered properly, the story of Lord Ram has mystical abilities that enable a seeker to attain success in all his endeavours, which means all his wishes are fulfilled and his dreams are realised.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

On this earth (i.e. in this mortal world), the divine story of Lord Ram is like a sacred river of nectar that can provide liberation and deliverance from the fear of birth and death (i.e. it can provide salvation and emancipation to the soul of all those who hear it and narrate it with due devotion and faith).

Not only this, it removes all spiritual fears and consternations arising out of delusions and doubts that torment a creature, and for this purpose it acts just like a serpent that can easily devour a frog<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, a wise and enlightened person would not want worldly things; he would want spiritual blessedness, an eternal source of happiness, joy and peace, something that frees him from the miseries of life in this world and gives him liberation from the cycle of birth and death by providing deliverance to his soul. All these can be accomplished by hearing and narrating Ram Katha.]

<sup>2</sup>To wit, just like a serpent that devours a frog, the Lord's story can eliminate all the spiritual problems such as confusions and doubts (bhrama) that torment a living being. In this verse, the different spiritual consternations, confusions and doubts that create so much misery for a creature are likened to a 'frog', while the Lord's divine story that can eliminate all such problems is likened to a 'serpent' that can devour the frog.

The story of Ram Charit Manas, if listened to carefully and understood properly, would instill confidence in the heart of a devotee that inspite of all the problems he has to face in this world and uncertainties about his spiritual fate, Lord Ram would take care of him and his destiny, provided he submits himself unconditionally before the Lord and seeks his protection. When that happens, the Lord would certainly and surely look after his welfare, in the physical world as well as in the spiritual sphere. The very hearing and singing of Ram Charit Manas would provide unbound bliss and eternal joy to a devotee, and very soon he would discover to his delight that his mind and heart has finally found the peace for which he had yearned for so long but which had evaded him till now.

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 68—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precede Doha no. 69; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1 that precede Doha no. 129—to Doha no. 130.]

असुर सेन सम नरक निकंदिनि । साधु बिबुध कुल हित गिरिनंदिनि ॥ ९ ॥ asura sēna sama naraka nikandini. sādhu bibudha kula hita girinandini. 9.

santa samāja payōdhi ramā sī. bisva bhāra bhara acala chamā sī. 10.

Just like ‘Girinandini’<sup>1</sup>, it (the Ram Charit Manas; the story of Lord Ram) helps a pious soul by destroying for him the fear of the gravest of hells symbolising a huge army of demons which torments ordinary creatures.

Once again, just like this ‘Giridamini’ being favourable for the gods and their well-wisher, this story of Lord Ram is also beneficent to all the saints and pious souls by providing them solace and succour from their torments and miseries. (9)

For the ocean of clean and holy water symbolised by the community of saints and holy persons, it represents goddess Rama (Laxmi, the goddess of well-being and prosperity, who emerged from the celestial ocean of milk known as the Kshirsagar)<sup>2</sup>.

Like the earth that supports all forms of life and provides all its needs, this glorious story of Lord Ram too helps support the soul and takes care of all the spiritual needs of a person<sup>3</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “girinandini” has two important connotations: (i) it means ‘the Daughter of the King of the Mountains’, and hence refers to goddess Parvati who was the daughter of Giri, the ‘King of Mountains’ and the consort of Lord Shiva; and (ii) river Ganges which is also called the ‘Daughter of the Mountains’ as it has its origin in the higher reaches of the Himalayan mountain range.

Goddess Parvati is regarded as the ‘Mother Goddess’ and the ‘Shakti’ which refers to the dynamic force and the almighty powers of the Supreme Being. She had manifested herself in many forms on different occasions to destroy the demons who represented evil, dark and negative forces in creation that needed to be overcome and neutralised. One of her most famous forms is goddess Durga, and the other is Kali. Both these two forms are regarded as the patron deities of the battle-field, and are invoked for obtaining victory over one’s enemy, no matter how formidable the enemy might be.

River Ganges, on the other hand, is also regarded with great reverence as a holy river that can provide liberation and deliverance to the creature. It is regarded as the ‘river of gods’ as it is believed that it flows in heaven, and a stream of it had descended on earth to provide purity to mortal creatures.

This verse simply means that the story of Lord Ram, known as ‘Ram Charit Manas’, is as holy, sacred and divine as river Ganges; it is capable to provide liberation and deliverance to a creature like this holy river.

Similarly, like goddess Durga or Kali, this story of Lord Ram can eliminate all fears of hell like this goddess had destroyed the huge army of demons to provide safety and security to the gods in heaven and mortals on earth.

Now, let us read briefly about the interesting story associated with these two goddesses, Durga and Kali.

Goddess Durga is a combined form of the dynamic energy of the three Gods of the Trinity—i.e. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder. An entire Puran, called the ‘Devibhagwat’, is dedicated to her. Another work known as ‘Devimahatamya’ is a brief rendering of Devibhagwat, and it appears in another Puran called Markandeya Puran. Each verse of this ‘Devimahatamya’ book is revered as a Mantra, a holy formula dedicated to the goddess and used to invoke her blessings.

Goddess Durga is also known as ‘Mahisaasur-mardini’, one who slayed the demon called Mahisaasur, the demon who was shaped like a fierce he-buffalo. In his symbolic form of a ‘he-buffalo’ this demon stood for ‘law-of-the-jungle’—a law that has no regulations, no codes of conduct, morality and ethics, but is based on entirely on ruthless and mindless use of crude force depending on the whims and fancies of the most strong amongst the creatures. This demon’s misdeeds were so horrendous that Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva became very annoyed at him, and they pooled their energies and powers to create Durga. The dynamic powers of other gods also established themselves in her form and their weapons became her weapons, thereby empowering the goddess with stupendous powers and acquire invincible potentials. Thus empowered and authorized, she rode a fierce lion symbolizing valour, ferocity, invincibility, strength, agility and astounding powers, to challenge the demon and slay him in the battle that ensued.

Goddess Kali is also another form of Durga which was revealed from the body of Parvati, the primary form of the goddess known as ‘Shakti’ or the ‘Mother Goddess’. There are two versions regarding the story of the emergence of Kali.

One version says that when the cruelty of two demons Shumbha and Nishumbha reached a climax so much so that even the gods were not spared, they went to Parvati and requested her to save them. She manifested herself as goddess Kali, the black goddess of the battle-field, who eliminated these two demons along with their other equally ferocious companions known as Dhumralochana, Chanda, Munda and Raktabeej. Her black form is attributed to her anger and wrath, as well as to the ferocity and heat of the battle.

The legendary story briefly says that Shumbha and Nishumbha were infatuated by the beauty of Kali, so they wanted to marry her. She laid out a condition that first they must defeat her in a battle. Infuriated, they tried to drag her away when she cut off their heads. Their other companions intervened, but excepting Raktabeej the other three were easily eliminated. Raktabeej had a boon that if his blood fell on the ground, as many new Raktabeejs would be formed as the number of drops of the blood. So the goddess Kali elongated her tongue to lick all the drops of blood of Raktabeej before they fell on the ground. This is how he was killed.

Another version is mentioned in Adbhut Ramayan said to have been written by sage Valmiki, according to which it was Sita, the wife of Lord Ram, who manifested herself as Kali to eliminate the demon known as Sahastrabahu, the one with a thousand arms. The story says that after successfully slaying the demon kind Ravana, the ten-headed king of Lanka, Lord Ram returned to his capital city of Ayodhya. Then he launched a campaign against this demon who is said to be a cousin and elder brother of Ravana of Lanka. In the battle that followed, Lord Ram fell unconscious after being wounded. Then Sita jumped off the war chariot to assume the ferocious form of Kali to slay the demon.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 27.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, just like the case of goddess Laxmi, who is the patron goddess of wealth, material well-being and prosperity with their accompanying comforts and pleasures, the divine story of Lord Ram grants all sorts of spiritual comfort, delight and contentedness to those who hear it or listen to it. It fulfils all their wishes just as Laxmi helps a man to fulfil all his desires by granting him abundant money, power and authority. Laxmi represented the best of the things that emerged from the churning of the celestial ocean of milk when it was churned by the gods and the demons in search of Amrit, the nectar of eternity and bliss. Similarly, the story of Lord Ram is the best reward that one gets by keeping the company of saints and holy people which is compared to ‘the ocean of milk’ here because it is free from corruptions and is spiritually as rejuvenating as the nourishment given by pure and unadulterated milk.

<sup>3</sup>The earth sustains all its inhabitants, selflessly and without any bias. It sustains the animate as well as the inanimate, the high and mighty as well as the humble and the lowly. It provides nourishment and habitat to one and all, without any discrimination, and irrespective of who they are and what their religious beliefs are. Similarly, the divine story of Lord Ram selflessly provides spiritual solace and blessedness to one and all, it provides an opportunity for liberation and deliverance to all irrespective of who the person is and what his religious beliefs are.

Again, like Mother Earth, it is a treasury of everything that a person’s soul needs for its welfare and happiness.

Once again, like the earth’s diversity in its physical form and features as well the wide variety in the culture and tradition of its people, the story of Lord Ram too has many variations in its details and finer nuances, with different people interpreting and understanding it in different ways.]

rāmahi priya pāvani tulasī sī. tulasidāsa hita hiyaṁ̐ hulasī sī. 12.

Like the sacred river Yamuna (whose water appears to be dark in colour as compared to river Ganges), the story of Lord Ram is able to darken the face of the messengers of the god of death known as Yam.

[To wit, it helps to put to shame the messengers of Yam who come to take the creature to hell when he dies. The reason is that one who hears the sacred story of Lord Ram cannot go to hell.]

Similarly, it is like the holy place known as Kashi for the purpose of granting liberation and deliverance from the cycle of birth and death.

[It is believed that a person who dies in Kashi finds immediate freedom from the cycle of transmigration. There are two reasons for it: (i) The presence of river

Ganges on whose banks the last rites are conducted; and (ii) Lord Shiva who utters the holy name of Lord Ram in the ears of a dying person so that the latter gets immediate deliverance<sup>1</sup>.] (11)

This story is as dear to Lord Ram as is the sacred plant known as Tulsi (Basil plant) is to him.

[Lord Ram is an incarnation or manifestation of Lord Vishnu. According to legends, the leaves of the Tulsi plant are very dear to Lord Vishnu so much so that no worship or offering to the Lord is complete without first offering these leaves to him.]

And as far as Tulsidas (the composer of the book 'Ram Charit Manas') is concerned, this story is as dear to him as is his own mother whose name was Hulsī, as it sincerely and lovingly cares for his welfare as his own mother would have done. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19 regarding Lord Shiva giving the boon of deliverance to those who die at Kashi; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 212 where it is said that Ganges is the purifier of the world.]

Lord Shiva is fond of this story as much as he is fond of river Narmada (which is called “mēkala saila sutā” as it originates from the summit of a hill called Maikula which is part of the chain of hills called Amarkantaka). [The word “sutā” means a ‘daughter’; and “saila” means a hill or a mountain.]

It is a spring-board of all Siddhis (achievements; mystical powers) and a treasure-trove of all imaginable forms of happiness, joy and delight. (13)

For the purpose of inculcating and developing good and noble qualities, it is like Mother Aditi, the mother of gods, who not only produced the gods symbolising the best of qualities in this creation but also nourished them and favoured them.

[To wit, Lord Ram’s story helps a person to inculcate and develop excellent virtues in him; it helps him to become a noble soul with immaculate characters.]

It acts as a milestone in the path of devotion for Lord Ram; it represents the culmination of the spiritual efforts of a seeker to attain love and devotion for the Lord. (14)

दो०. रामकथा मंदाकिनी चित्रकूट चित चारु ।
तुलसी सुभग सनेह बन सिय रघुबीर बिहारु ॥ ३१ ॥

dōhā.

rāmakathā mandākinī citrakūṭa cita cāru.
tulasī subhaga sanēha bana siya raghubīra bihāru. 31.

Tulsidas says that in a metaphoric way this beautiful and holy story of Lord Ram is like the river Mandakini (a tributary of Ganges), a cheerful mind that is purified of all impurities and is tranquil and wise is like the holy place called Chitrakoot, devotion and affection for Lord Ram is like its verdant forest, and in it dwells Lord Ram with his consort Sita<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 31)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Chitrakoot was a place endowed with extraordinary natural beauty where Lord Ram, accompanied by his consort Sita and brother Laxman, had spent the greater part of his fourteen years of forest sojourn. The Lord lived here in peace and comfort in the lap of nature and its pristine beauty. The charm of Chitrakoot and the Lord's stay there on the advice of sage Valmiki has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 132—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 142.

Refer also to verse nos. 23-24 of 'Vinai Patrika', the wonderful Book of Prayers written by Tulsidas. Its English version with elaborate commentary has been published by me, the author of this present book titled Kaag-Bhusund Ramayan.

The calm environs of Chitrakoot is compared to a tranquil mind to imply that only when the mind is free from disturbances can it focus on the thoughts of Lord Ram. These thoughts of the Lord are so absorbing and charming that they resemble the bewitching natural beauty of Chitrakoot which enchanted and captivated the mind of the beholder so much so that one never had enough of it.

Those who live in Chitrakoot take a bath in the river Mandakini whose waters are clean and unpolluted. Similarly, the story of Lord Ram also helps one to refresh his spirit, rejuvenate himself and clean all his impurities if he takes a dip in its symbolic nectar-like water by way of hearing it, reading it or reciting it.

In this Doha, Tulsidas says that the Mana (mind and the heart) of devotees is like the forest of Chitrakoot where Lord Ram had spent quite of bit of time living peacefully with Sita and Laxman near the banks of the tranquil river Mandakini whose water was clear as liquid crystal. This river flowed through the forest of Chitrakoot and made the environment around it pleasant and the land fertile just like the story of Lord Ram, known as Ram Charit Manas, that is continuously recited and heard by devotees of the Lord gives delight to them and purifies their inner-self, making their Mana a fertile ground where the tree of spiritualism can remain evergreen.]

जग मंगल गुनग्राम राम के । दानि मुकुति धन धरम धाम के ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

rāmacarita cintāmani cārū. santa sumati tiya subhaga singārū. 1.
jaga maṅgala gunagrāma rāma kē. dāni mukuti dhana dharama dhāma kē. 2.

The glorious story that describes the life and time of Lord Ram is symbolically like the wonderful gem called ‘Chintamani’ (which has the magical power to eliminate all worries—“Chintaa”)<sup>1</sup>.

If the refined mind and intellect of wise and enlightened sages and seers are likened to a beautiful and intelligent woman (for instance, a chaste and loyal housewife), then this story of Lord Ram is like her ornaments and decent attire that make her look adorable and worthy of respect<sup>2</sup>. (1)

The hosts of glorious virtues possessed by Lord Ram and described in the story of the Lord are auspicious blessings for the entire world (for they do good to the world and all its inhabitants by acting as examples to be followed by one and all so that even a layman is offered a guidance to help him reach his spiritual goal very easily, comfortably, and in a sure way).

Not only this, the story of Lord Ram incorporating the Lord’s majestic qualities also bestows ‘Mukti’ (liberation and deliverance), ‘Dhan’ (wealth and prosperity; especially spiritual wealth in the form of wisdom, bliss, contentedness and blessedness), ‘Dharma’ (inspiration to follow the path of righteousness, probity and propriety), and ‘Dhaam’ (the final destination of the soul which is to attain emancipation and salvation; the attainment of oneness of the individual soul with the Supreme Soul)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The eclectic and magical qualities of the wonderful gem known as ‘Chintamani’ have been described by the saintly crow Kaagbhusund to Garud in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-9 that precede Doha no. 120.

To wit, if one hears and recites this mystically empowered story then all his worries are removed. He becomes carefree because Lord Ram is obliged to take care of his devotees.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, just like a housewife looks glorious and attractive in her beautiful ornaments and colourful attire, the mind and intellect that is devoted to this wonderfully glorious story of Lord Ram, finds joy in hearing it and reciting it to others, too is praiseworthy; such a mind and intellect indeed deserve respect and honour.

<sup>3</sup>Again, when one reads this story one becomes aware of what noble qualities in the world are, and then he can use them as benchmarks in his own life. A person desirous of reaching a high goal in life will find the story of Lord Ram as a practical manual to which he can refer for the purpose of guidance and advice. This fact is endorsed in clear terms in the next verse no. 3 herein below.]

सदगुर ग्यान बिराग जोग के । बिबुध बैद भव भीम रोग के ॥ ३ ॥

जननि जनक सिय राम प्रेम के । बीज सकल ब्रत धरम नेम के ॥ ४ ॥

sadagura gyāna birāga jōga kē. bibudha baida bhava bhīma rōga kē. 3.

janani janaka siya rāma prēma kē. bīja sakala brata dharama nēma kē. 4.

For the purpose attaining ‘Gyan’ (acquiring true spiritual awareness and knowledge; enlightenment and wisdom; gnosis), ‘Vairagya’ (the virtue of renunciation, dispassion and detachment from this world and the attraction of its sense objects of pleasure and comfort), and ‘Yoga’ (meditation, with its many branches and connotations)—this wonderful story of Lord Ram acts as a true and wise Guru (teacher and guide)<sup>1</sup>.

For the purpose of curing the serious disease, symbolised by the horrors and torments caused by this gross world of transmigration, that afflict all living beings, this holy story of the Lord acts as the heavenly physician (known as Ashwini Kumar, the medicine-man of the gods)<sup>2</sup>. (3)

For the purpose of inspiring love and affection for Lord Sita-Ram in the heart of a devotee, this story of the Lord acts as a parent<sup>3</sup>.

It is indeed like a metaphoric seed from which sprouts all kinds of religious vows, practices and observances<sup>4</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>If read carefully and analytically, the story of Lord Ram guides a spiritual aspirant as to what the practical meaning of the virtues of Gyan, Vairagya and Yoga is. The Book is a rich source material to enlighten a true seeker who wants to know what actually constitutes true wisdom, renunciation and meditation, and how to actually implement them in practical life.

<sup>2</sup>The celestial physician known as Ashwini Kumar is a patron deity of all doctors who use traditional medicines such as herbs to cure the greatest of illnesses. Hence, this story of Lord Ram is metaphorically an expert doctor who can treat his patient, the suffering creature, of all his ailments, no matter how grave they are. These ailments are not of the gross body which any other doctor can treat, but they are deep-seated spiritual problems that need some special treatment that only a specially qualified ‘doctor’ can treat. And this ‘doctor’ is symbolised by the glorious story of Lord Ram as it is able to remove all the horrors and torments associated with the cycle of birth and death by providing spiritual peace, happiness, bliss and blessedness to a creature.

It ought to be noted here that more often than not emotional problems—i.e. spiritual problems—are usually at the root of many intractable diseases which are hard for ordinary physicians to cure by the use of routine medicines.

<sup>3</sup>A parent is a child’s best friend and teacher; a parent would always teach what is best for the child. Likewise, the story of Lord Ram helps a person to develop devotion, love and faith for the Lord.

<sup>4</sup>To wit, even as a plant sprouts from its seed, the story of Lord Ram motivates a person to keep auspicious vows, follow good practices, and observe noble codes of conduct and thought. The story of Lord Ram is a ‘seed’ because all these glorious virtues—and countless others—spring forth from its content. A careful, wise and intelligent reader would find the story of Lord Ram a treasure trove of wonderful gems of wisdom and practical advice from which he can learn everything worth learning in life. From this ‘seed’ germinates wisdom and good advice that would help him in dealing with problems and dilemmas that arise during the course of his routine life. The glorious examples that sprout from this ‘seed’ hand-holds him in each step of his life so that he can find peace and happiness in life, lead a fruitful life, and reach his desired spiritual destination with ease.]

saciva subhaṭa bhūpati bicāra kē. kumbhaja lōbha udadhi apāra kē. 6.

The sacred and holy story of Lord Ram is able to vanquish and destroy all sins, torments and sorrows in this world.

It is a benevolent provider of spiritual sustenance to a creature in this world, and takes care of his providence as well.

[To wit, the story of Lord Ram provides joy to a creature while he lives in this world, and quietly ensures that he gets liberation and deliverance at the time of his death so that he does not have to re-enter the cycle of birth and death, thereby freeing him from the horrors incumbent in this cycle.] (5)

For the King symbolised by a person's thoughts and motivations, this story acts like a wise and intelligent chief Minister.

[Just like a wise and intelligent chief minister of king can guide him to attain great glory and fame, the story of Lord Ram too can help a person attain the pinnacle of fame and glory in his life.]

For the purpose of drying up the vast ocean symbolising greed and longing for material gains, this story of Lord Ram acts like sage Agastya (who had drunk the entire ocean in three gulps)<sup>1</sup>.

[To wit, just like sage could very easily gulp down the whole of the vast ocean, the eclectic story of Lord Ram can motivate a person to overcome all his greed for worldly things—which means 'all his desires are dried up'.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of sage Agastya drinking the mighty ocean is narrated in (i) Srīsthī Khand of Padma Purāṇ; (ii) Skanda Purāṇ, Nāgar Khand, (iii) Mahābhārata, Van-Parva, Cantos 103-105; and (iv) Anand Rāmāyaṇ, Vilāsa Kāṇḍa, Canto 9, verse nos. 18-24.

Refer also to: Rām Charit Manas, Bāl Kāṇḍa, Chāupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 256.

There are three versions of this story. In brief, they are as follows:

(a) Once, when Indra had killed the demon Vṛitāsur, other demons named 'Kāaleya' managed to escape and they hid themselves under the water of the ocean. From there they began terrorizing the sages and seers. They stayed under water during daytime and came out at night to torment and devour these sages, and generally cause nuisance and havoc all around. These demons had not spared even such renowned sages of the time as Vasistha, Chyavan and Bharadvaj, because the demons attacked their hermitages and killed the sages and seers who lived there. It was then that the Gods, led by their king Indra, requested sage Agastya to somehow expose the demons. At this, the sage had scooped up the water of the ocean in a cup made by joining the two palms of his hands and had drunk the water of the ocean in one gulp so as to expose the demons. The Gods were then able to destroy them.

(b) Sage Agastya once took pity on a bird whose eggs were washed away by the ocean. The grieving bird was trying to dry the water of the ocean by picking drops of it in its beak. Then the sage decided to punish the ocean by drinking it up.

(c) The third version says that the ocean had washed away the items of worship that sage Agastya had arranged for his routine religious rituals. Agastya became peeved and drank up the ocean. When the gods prayed to him to forgive the ocean, the kind sage obliged and refilled it in the form of his urine. That is the reason why the ocean is bitter and salty like urine.

This fact, that the ocean is sour and salty because it is the urine of sage Agastya, is explicitly narrated in the Anand Ramayan (purported to have been written by sage Valmiki), in its Vilaas Kand (Chapter), ninth Sarga (Canto), verse nos. 18-24 where Sita explains to Lopaamudraa, the wife of sage Agastya, why Sri Ram had constructed the bridge in order to cross the ocean to reach Lanka. She explained that the Lord did not ask the sage to dry up the ocean once again by drinking its water because it would be unthinkable to ask the sage to drink his own urine. Even if the sage had actually drunk the water, the Lord would be heaped with the ignominy of being so selfish that he made a Brahmin drink his own urine so that his purpose is served. The Lord did not swim across the ocean because it would be insulting and extremely demeaning for the Lord to swim in urine, and it would also be improper for him to step across a Brahmin's urine because it is to be regarded as holy as the urine of a cow.

In all these versions, one thing is found common, and it is that the sage had invoked the divine powers of Lord Ram to accomplish this unique feat. He had pronounced the Mantra (spiritual formula to invoke the cosmic powers of a chosen deity) of Lord Ram, which is "Raamaaye Raamchandraaye Raambhadraaye".]

काम कोह कलिमल करिगन के । केहरि सावक जन मन बन के ॥ ७ ॥

अतिथि पूज्य प्रियतम पुरारि के । कामद घन दारिद दवारि के ॥ ८ ॥

kāma kōha kalimala karigana kē. kēhari sāvaka jana mana bana kē. 7.
atithi pūjya priyatama purāri kē. kāmada ghana dārida davāri kē. 8.

In order to eliminate the wild elephants symbolised by such negative traits as 'Kaam' (desire, lust and passion), 'Krodha' (anger) and the countless 'Mals of Kaliyug' (the taints of sins, negative qualities, perversions and vices which are so dominant in the era of Kaliyug) that roam wildly and without any restraint or inhibition in the forest-like Mana (mind and heart) of devotees, the Lord's story acts like a group of young lions who can easily vanquish these rogue elephants<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The sacred and holy story of Lord Ram is most dear to Lord Shiva (known as "purāri"), and is like an honoured and welcome guest of the Lord<sup>2</sup>.

For the purpose of dousing the symbolic fire of wants and dearth that is as ferocious as a wild forest-fire that destroys vast tracts of land, this story is like the rain-giving cloud that pours its nectar-like water to quench all thirst (i.e. it satisfies all desires of the devotee and gives him contentedness)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lion is the lord and king of the jungle. It can easily overcome the might of the elephant that is far bigger in form and apparently stronger in body than the lion. Even rogue elephants are vanquished by the dexterity of the lion. Likewise, the story of Lord Ram has such mystical powers that it can easily vanquish such negative traits as Kaam, Krodha and other such taints that are formidable and almost invincible for a devotee to overcome on his own.

<sup>2</sup>Just as a person would happily welcome a guest of honour who happens to be his dearest friend as well, Lord Shiva eagerly looks forward to listening to and reciting this glorious story of Lord Ram at the first opportunity. He enjoys it; he is fond of it; he loves it.

<sup>3</sup>Just like the case of the wild forest-fire that burns down huge forests, wants and desires that a person harbours in his heart robs him of all peace and happiness. His mind is occupied with the thought of these wants, and he never rests in peace. But the story of Lord Ram teaches him the joy of renunciation, detachment and dispassion, it tells him that this world and its material things never give abiding happiness and peace, and that the true goal of a human body is to find final rest for the soul by way of liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation which is got when the individual soul merges and becomes one with the Supreme Soul.]

mantra mahāmani biṣaya byāla kē. mēṭata kaṭhina ku'aṅka bhāla kē. 9.
harana mōha tama dinakara kara sē. sēvaka sāli pāla jaladhara sē. 10.

For the purpose of overcoming the horrifying killer-effect of the poison of the snake symbolised by the sensual charms of this world, this story of the Lord acts as a great Mantra (formula) that is invoked to neutralise the harmful effects of snake-bite<sup>1</sup>.

This story has the potential to erase the writing of providence that has determined a doomed fate for a devotee<sup>2</sup>. (9)

For the purpose of removing the darkness symbolised by 'Moha' (delusions and ignorance that create infatuation and attachment), this story acts like the brilliant rays (light) of the sun<sup>3</sup>.

Similarly, for the purpose of sustaining the crop symbolised by the devotee himself, this story is like the rain-bearing cloud<sup>4</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the ancient traditional form of curing a person who has been bitten by a snake, the snake charmer uses certain incantations which are said to neutralise the poison. Hence this metaphor is used here to stress that the verses of this divine story are like the Mantras which help a devotee overcome his spiritual problems, no matter how grave and deep-rooted they may be.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, even if a devotee is destined to be doomed by providence, the divine story of Lord Ram can salvage his future miraculously, and give lift him up from the dark well of gloom and misery. This holy story of Lord Ram can re-write the fiat of Fate and the mandate of Destiny that had condemned the devotee to a life of misery and gloom by providing him redemption, filling his life with joy and happiness, and ensuring that his soul gets liberation and deliverance upon his death.

12.

For the purpose of fulfilling the wishes of a devotee, this story is like the all wish-fulfilling celestial Tree of Gods, known as the Kalpa Tree.

This story of Lord Ram is ever-obliging and ready to serve all the needs of the devotee just like the two benevolent, munificent and magnanimous Lords Hari and Har (Vishnu and Shiva respectively)<sup>1</sup>. (11)

For the symbolic sky during the clean winter night that is adorned by twinkling stars that dot it like so many pieces of jewel, the heart and mind of those who are learned, enlightened and wise are also adorned by the story of Lord Ram that sparkles in their inner-self like the stars in the sky<sup>2</sup>.

Indeed, without gainsay and in all sooth, this story of Lord Ram is like the cherished wealth of the devotees of the Lord, because they would never part with it, no matter what the sacrifice is that they have to make for it. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These two Gods of the Trinity are very gracious, easy to please, benevolent and munificent by nature. They help their devotees like a parent would help his or her child. Likewise, the sacred story of Lord Ram acts as a best friend and companion who stands in good stead for the devotee. It grants all his wishes.

<sup>2</sup>Here, the Mana, the heart and mind combination of devotees is likened to the clean sky of the winter season, and the different episodes of the story of Lord Ram are likened to the twinkling stars that dot the sky. The night sky looks so beautiful with the decoration of stars. Likewise, the heart and mind of devotees derive joy by remembering the different episodes of the story of Lord Ram.]

sēvaka mana mānasa marāla sē. pāvana gaṅga taraṅga māla sē. 14.

This story of Lord Ram is the culmination of all meritorious deeds and thoughts. It is the best fruit of all religious and spiritual endeavours.

For doing true and selfless good of the world and its inhabitants, this story of the Lord is equivalent to true and pious saints<sup>1</sup>. (13)

For the Mana (the heart and the mind combined) of the devotee and follower of the Lord which is like the Mansarovar Lake, this story is like a majestic Swan that floats on its surface<sup>2</sup>.

And for the purpose of cleaning and purification, this story is like the swift currents of the water of river Ganges (which is said to be a holy river that can clean the taints of sins and other negativities that cling to a creature who takes a bath in its water)<sup>3</sup>. (14)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Saints are always good to others; they always think good of others. Their actions and words are always meant for the welfare of others. They are selfless in their attitude and service. This is also true with the story of Lord Ram as it does the same.

<sup>2</sup>The ‘Mansarovar Lake’ is situated on Mt. Kailash, which is the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva. This lake is characterised by having crystal clean water on which float Swans. The ‘swan’ itself is regarded as a wise bird, and its white colour stands for purity and cleanliness. Here in this verse, the ‘Mana’ of the devotee is like a ‘lake’, and the story of Lord Ram that he always remembers and cherishes in this Mana is the symbolic Swan that floats in this lake.

<sup>3</sup>Just like the river Ganges that can easily purify the devotee who dips in its holy water, the sacred lake represented by the story of Lord Ram can also purify the soul of the devotee who reads and recites it.]

दो०. कुपथ कुतरक कुचालि कलि कपट दंभ पाषंड ।

dōhā.

kupatha kutaraka kucāli kali kapaṭa dambha pāṣaṇḍa.
dahana rāma guna grāma jimi indhana anala pracaṇḍa. 32 (a).

The hosts of the glorious virtues of Lord Ram (that are described explicitly or implied implicitly in the story of the Lord known as Ram Charit Manas) can destroy the greatest hoard of negative qualities that are so prevalent in the era of Kaliyug, evil qualities that corrupt the soul of all living beings, such as evil and corrupt ways that demean the dignity of the soul and destroy the character of the individual creature (kupatha), fallacious and distorted way of reasoning that is aided by being adamant about one’s point of view inspite of it being erroneous and untrue (kutaraka), mischievous, evil and pervert practices (kucāli), conceit, deceit and falsehood (kapaṭa), pretensions, hypocrisy, arrogance and heresy (dambha pāṣaṇḍa) even as a fierce fire would reduce to ashes the greatest stock of firewood<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 32-a) person who hears and recites the story of Lord Ram would learn of these eclectic virtues in the course of his study of the story, and then realising the immense importance of these virtues, how they make a person so great and how they can help one in his own life, if he is wise and intelligent he would endeavour to inculcate and practice at least some of these excellent virtues in his own life.

The reward would be that the numerous spiritual taints, blemishes and corruptions that darken his inner-self are scrubbed off one by one in due course of time, to render the 'self' immaculate and make it shine with the pristine glory of the supreme Consciousness.

To wit, the story of the Lord helps a man by acting as an example and showing him the practical way of being good and righteous in his life. It helps a man to become a good human being. It helps him to get rid of the layers after layers of evil tendencies and corrupt ways that had earlier suffocated his being, enabling him to breathe a fresh draught of air of spirituality and holiness which is the true character of his Atma or soul.]

rāmacarita rākēsa kara sarisa sukhada saba kāhu.

sajjana kumuda cakōra cita hita bisēṣi baṛa lāhu. 32 (b).

The glorious and magnificent story of Lord Ram is like the rays of the full moon that shines with a soothing brilliance to shower the nectar of joy and bliss upon all living beings.

Even as the rays of the full moon are specially liked by the white flower known as the water-lily as well as the bird known as the Chakor (the Indian red-legged partridge)<sup>1</sup>, the story of Lord Ram is especially loved by those who are pious, devout and holy by their inherent nature. This story is very beneficent to them even as it is very agreeable for the lily and the bird. (Doha no. 32-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The water-lily is so fond of the moonlight that it welcomes the sight of the moon by opening its petals. Similarly, the bird Chakor is so enamoured of the moon that it keeps its gaze fixed on the moon and follows its course through the sky from the time it rises in the east till the time it sets in the west.

This analogy is applied to saintly and pious people who are very fond of the story of Lord Ram as it gives them immense spiritual delight, bliss and peace.

By implication it means that those who are not saintly and pious would not like the story just like thieves who do not like the brilliant light of the moon because they prefer a dark night without the moon's light.]

I shall now describe how Bhavaani (i.e. Uma, the consort of Shiva) had questioned Lord Shiva and prevailed upon him to tell her this story, and how the Lord answered her queries in detail as a result of which this story (of Ram Charit Manas) was narrated by him<sup>1</sup>. (1)

I (Tulsidas) shall endeavour to narrate everything pertaining to the question as to how and why this wonderful story came to be revealed. For this purpose I shall tell this strange story in a most enchanting way by weaving its text using pleasant words and embellishing it with mysterious events and circumstances that would enthrall the mind and captivate the heart (of the reader, the narrator and the listener alike)<sup>2</sup>. <sup>2</sup>Tulsidas says that he will narrate the same story that Lord Shiva had narrated to his consort goddess Uma or Parvati. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 47; (ii) Doha no. 35 along with Chaupai line nos. 11-13 that precede it; (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Doha no. 55 along with Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede it; (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 64—to Doha no. 68; (v) Chaupai line nos. 11-13 that precede Doha no. 113; (vi) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128.

Tulsidas essentially means that he is not telling some tale of fantasy based on heresy or wild imagination, but an authentic story that was narrated by Lord Shiva himself in some ancient time, and which indeed has immense spiritual powers that will benefit the reader, the narrator and the listener alike.]

Let anyone who has not heard this story before not be surprised and get perplexed by its mysteries and strange anecdotes. (3)

Those who are wise, enlightened, learned and realised (gyānī), i.e. those who are aware of who Lord Ram actually was, and know the mystical and maverick ways of the Lord, they won't be surprised by it. It is because they would realise that – (4).

--- They believe that the divine and legendary story of Lord Ram has no end in this world—i.e. there are infinite ways it is told and re-told; there are myriad versions of it in this world. [Since they are aware that Lord Ram's story has countless versions that have been adopted by different cultures and civilisations, and therefore it had to be adapted to suit them, those who are wise and learned won't feel astonished when they hear my version of the story of Lord Ram.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

Lord Ram has manifested himself in this world during different times and for different reasons. And therefore, the story of Ramayan that describes the life, time and deeds of Lord Ram would logically be as many and varied as the times the Lord manifested himself in this world for various reasons<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Therefore, such wise men would also not be surprised to read and hear about the 'Kaag-Bhusund Ramayan' that appears in the Uttar Kand of this book Ram Charit Manas. They won't frown at and fret about this holy and divine story being narrated by even a humble creature such as a 'crow', which was the physical form of sage Kaagbhusund.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva himself has reiterated this fact to Uma in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124.

So Tulsidas is merely repeating what Shiva has said.]

The beautiful and pleasing story of Lord Ram differs according to the era and circumstances in which he had manifested himself. All these different stories have been recited (sung; narrated) by countless sages and seers over time. (7)

Therefore, one should not cloud his heart and mind with doubts (as it would rob him of the pleasure and joy derived by hearing the wonderful story). Instead, one should respect it and listen to it with devotion, faith and reverence<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, one should not be skeptical about this holy story, but read, narrate and listen to it with devotion, faith and conviction. In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 38; (b) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 15; (c) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 128 along with Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede it.]

Indeed and without gainsay, I reiterate once again that Lord Ram is eternal and infinite, and so are his virtues<sup>1</sup>. Likewise, the Lord's stories too are countless and varied, and they spread over eras and generations.

Those who are wise, those whose intellect is free from corruption, and those who have purity in their thought, they should not express surprise at this story and its variety. (Doha no. 33)

[Tuslidas says—] In this way, after removing all causes of doubts and confusions (pertaining to the story of Lord Ram), I put the dust of my Guru (teacher and preceptor) on my head (as a mark of respect to him<sup>1</sup>) (before I commence narrating the story of Lord Ram). (1)

I once again bow my head and pray to all by joining my palms in supplication so that by their grace and blessings no blame would come either to me (for any errors I may inadvertently make) or be imposed on the narration of this divine story (for any of the shortcomings or deficiencies that may creep into it unintentionally due to some cause)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

Now finally, I bow my head reverentially to Lord Shiva<sup>3</sup> and commence the narration of the elaborate story of Lord Ram that describes the Lord's exemplary virtues, stellar qualities and divine glories. (3)

[Now, Tulsidas mentions the auspicious year and date when he had started writing this glorious book dedicated to Lord Ram, and named as 'Ram Charit Manas'.]

Putting my head at the holy feet of Lord Hari (i.e. Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Lord of the world, who had manifested as Lord Ram) (to pay my deepest reverence to the Lord and seeking his mercy and grace), I hereby start narrating (writing) the holy story (of Lord Ram) in the Hindu year of Samvat 1631 (corresponding to A.D. 1574). (4)

It is a Tuesday, the ninth day of the Hindu Lunar month called Chaitra (corresponding to the period of end of March till mid of April) which is regarded as a pleasant month<sup>1</sup>. It was on this day in the holy city of Ayodhya that this divine story revealed its first rays of light for the world<sup>2</sup>. (5)

It is affirmed by the Vedas (primary scriptures) that on the auspicious day when Lord Ram took birth in Ayodhya, all the pilgrim sites represented by their presiding deities come here to pay their obeisance and offer their respects to Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Hindu month of Chaitra, corresponding to the period from end of March till beginning or mid of April, is pleasant because the weather is warm, and yet it is not too hot like in the month of May. It was also during this pleasant month of Chaitra that Lord Ram was born in Ayodhya.

Hence, this verse means that Tulsidas selected this auspicious month of Chaitra as well as the holy city of Ayodhya to start writing the story of Lord Ram as the Lord had taken birth during this month in Ayodhya. {Apropos: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 190—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 191.}

<sup>2</sup>To wit, it was on this day that the first verses of Ram Charit Manas were composed. They symbolically represented the first rays of the splendorous sun representing the glory and divinity of Lord Ram that this book endeavours to unfold, which eventually would show its light of spiritualism and the virtues of devotion and affection for Lord Ram to the whole world, in order to remove the darkness of night symbolized by ignorance and delusions that envelops it from all sides, thereby creating so much fear in the heart of a creature.

It was also the day when Lord Ram had revealed himself, or was 'born', in Ayodhya. Hence, Tulsidas chose this auspicious day of Lord Ram's birth, i.e. "the Lord's birthday", to start narrating the story of his revered Lord.

असुर नाग खग नर मुनि देवा । आइ करहिं रघुनायक सेवा ॥ ७ ॥
जन्म महोत्सव रचहिं सुजाना । करहिं राम कल कीरति गाना ॥ ८ ॥ asura nāga khaga nara muni dēvā. ā'i karahim raghunāyaka sēvā. 7.

janma mahōtsava racahim sujānā. karahim rāma kala kīrati gānā. 8.

Verily indeed, on this auspicious day, all creatures, such as non-gods, serpents, birds, humans, sages and seers, as well as the gods, come (to Ayodhya) to offer their services to Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>, the Lord of the Raghu's line of illustrious kings (raghunāyaka)<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Pious and noble people commemorate that auspicious occasion of Lord Ram's birth by holding mass celebrations and festivities on the day of the Lord's birth; they organize community recitals of the litany of the Lord's glories, and remember the Lord by singing verses lauding his divine virtues<sup>3</sup>. (8)

<sup>2</sup>Since the story that is being narrated in this book called 'Ram Charit Manas' pertains to Lord Ram, who though was the almighty Supreme Being in his primary cosmic form, yet he had manifested himself in the form of a prince in the kingdom of Ayodhya ruled by a line of illustrious kings descending from King Raghu. The Supreme Being has a subtle, sublime and all-pervading comic existence with no attributes or physical forms that are visible, because the Lord is a personified form of pure Consciousness, but when the same Lord revealed himself as 'Lord Ram' he had assumed all the normal attributes that characterize a human being. So therefore, it is proper to recognize the glory of that exalted line of kings that the Supreme Being chose to become a member of.

Hence, Tulsidas refers to Lord Ram on countless occasions throughout this book by using many variants of his name that indicate the Lord's birth in the fortunate royal household of the kingdom of Ayodhya which the Supreme Being chose to bless by his birth, inspite of being fully aware of the true identity of Lord Ram, that he was not a human being but the Supreme Being himself personified in that form.

japahim rāma dhari dhyāna ura sundara syāma sarīra. 34.

On this occasion (of Lord Ram's birthday), countless groups of pious men and women take a purifying dip in the holy waters of the river Saryu (that flows on the north of Ayodhya)<sup>1</sup>; they meditate upon Lord Ram, who has a dark complexion, and invoke Lord's divine grace and blessings by doing Japa (repetition) of his holy name. (Doha no. 34)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 4 where Lord Ram has himself praised the glories of river Saryu.]

चौ०. दरस परस मज्जन अरु पाना । हरइ पाप कह बेद पुराना ॥ १ ॥
नदी पुनीत अमित महिमा अति । कहि न सकइ सारदा बिमलमति ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

darasa parasa majjana aru pānā. hara'i pāpa kaha bēda purānā. 1.
nadī punīta amita mahimā ati. kahi na saka'i sārādā bimalamati. 2.

[These verses continue to praise the greatness and holiness of river Saryu that have been mooted in the previous verses herein before.]

The Vedas and the Purans (i.e. the ancient scriptures) affirm that the evil and negative effects of the misdeeds and sins of a person are washed away or nullified by the mere sight of, the mere touch of, by taking a bath in, or by the sipping of the holy waters of the river Saryu<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed and in all sooth, the river Saryu is very holy and purifying, and its glories are legendary and infinite so much so that even the wise goddess Saraswati, the patron deity of refined knowledge and speech, is unable to narrate them in entirety<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The water of river Saryu is regarded as very holy and purifying so much so that each of the four options given in this verse is independently able to neutralize the taint of sins and the negative consequences of misdeeds done by a creature. But this privilege of pardoning of sins and misdeeds granted by the holy waters of river Saryu does not mean that the person continues to commit sins and misdeeds in the hope that every time he will be forgiven. It is a way of redemption for those who have realized their mistake and are sincere about mending their way; it is meant for those who are honestly regretful and penitent about their wrong doings and evil way of life, and wish to repent and change themselves for good. It is like one washing one's dirty hands in clean water, but this washing makes sense if the person doesn't dirty his hands again; otherwise it is a futile exercise.

The sequence that is outlined here to clean one's self is significant: first one sees the holy river from a distance, next he goes near and touches its water, then he takes a bath in it, and finally he sips water to rinse his mouth.

In a metaphoric way, this is how one would benefit from the holy story of Ram Charit Manas: First a seeker hears about its wonderful glories and its divine nature in a distant place where he lives, which is like seeing the holy river Saryu from a distance. Then the seeker goes to a place where this story is narrated by some holy man who explains in detail its spiritual importance and the benefit it grants to the soul of the creature, which would be like coming near the river and touching its water. Next, the seeker sits down and hears the full story with attention and faith, which is like bathing in the holy water of river Saryu. Finally, he starts reading and reciting it himself, which is symbolic of the sipping of the water of Saryu to clean the mouth.

<sup>2</sup>River Saryu is so holy and revered because Lord Ram had blessed its waters by touching it and bathing in it. The Lord took birth in the holy city of Ayodhya which is situated on the banks of this river, and so it is natural that he would have gone to this river quite regularly, as a child as well as when he grew up. We read in Ram Charit Manas that those rivers which were visited by Lord Ram or on whose banks the Lord had spent some of his time were praised by the gods as well as the deities of other rivers. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 113; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 138; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 139.]

rāma dhāmadā purī suhāvani. lōka samasta bidita ati pāvani. 3.

cāri khāni jaga jīva apārā. avadha tajēm tanu nahim sansārā. 4.

[This verse is in honour of Ayodhya, the holy city where Lord Ram took birth.]

The holy city, which is the abode of Lord Ram (i.e. Ayodhya), is very charming, and it grants access to the holy abode of Lord Ram in the heaven (which is known as Vaikuntha) as well. It is famed in the world as a city that is most purifying for the soul of the creature, and as the holiest of the holy places<sup>1</sup>. (3)

There are four types of births for all living beings<sup>2</sup>. However, all of them find ultimate deliverance and freedom from the cycle of transmigration if they die in Ayodhya. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 4; Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 97; Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 109.

<sup>2</sup>The four types of births that all living beings have are the following: (i) ‘Andaj’: those born from an egg, e.g. birds; (ii) ‘Swadej’: those born from sweat and dampness, e.g. bacteria, fungi and lice; (iii) ‘Udbhij’: those born from seeds, e.g. plants; and (iv) ‘Jarayuj’: those born from an embryo inside the womb, e.g. a man.

To wit, anyone who dies in the holy city of Ayodhya will find deliverance from the endless cycle of birth and death. But it ought to be noted here that such a glorified death is available to those who have lived a righteous life and had devotion for Lord Ram while they lived; surely and certainly not to those who are sinful and evil, as well as those who care not for Lord Ram.]

सब बिधि पुरी मनोहर जानी । सकल सिद्धिप्रद मंगल खानी ॥ ५ ॥

saba bidhi purī manōhara jānī. sakala sid'dhiprada maṅgala khānī. 5.
bimala kathā kara kīnha arambhā. sunata nasāhiṁ kāma mada dambhā. 6.

Having paid my obeisance to the holy city of Ayodhya in the previous verses, and recognizing the fact that it is blessed with stellar qualities, such as that of exceptional charm in all respects (physical as well as spiritual), the mystical ability to grant all sorts of successes and boons, and itself being a mine of auspicious virtues—I have chosen this holy city as the place to commence writing the Divine Story of Lord Ram known as Ram Charit Manas, a story that can annihilate the negative traits of Kaam (worldly desires and passions), Mada (haughtiness, arrogance and ego) and Dhambha (falsehood, deceit, pretensions, conceit and hypocrisy), along with their damaging consequences. (5-6)

[Note—The city of Ayodhya is most blessed because it is here that the Supreme Being came down to earth in the physical form of Lord Ram; the Lord was born here and he ruled the mighty kingdom of the same name, i.e. the kingdom of Ayodhya, as its king and emperor. The Lord’s reign was a stellar instance of excellence of governance and full adherence to the laws of Dharma (righteousness, probity, propriety, ethical conduct, and truthfulness). The sort of good government under Lord Ram and the all round prosperity and happiness enjoyed by his subjects have been described in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Doha no. 26.

These two verses clearly indicate that Tulsidas had commenced writing this epic book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ in Ayodhya itself. Refer also to Chaupai line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 35 herein below, as well as to Chuapai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 34 earlier.

The three spiritually dark traits, viz. Kaam, Mada and Dambha, are neutralized if a devotee hears the holy story of Lord Ram, because the story is so powerful in its positive and purifying effects that under its illuminating light none of ghosts of the dark shadows of negativities associated with this material world can ever survive.

The next chaupai line no. 7 tells us that Tulsidas has named his book as ‘Ram Charit Manas’.]

{In the following verses, Tulsidas once again reiterates that (a) this holy, sacred and divine story of Lord Ram, known as Ram Charit Manas, is dear to sages, seers and hermits and they love to hear it, (b) it was first conceived by Lord Shiva who told it to his consort Parvati, and (c) it is the same story that he is now reciting for the benefit of others, and so everyone is welcome to hear it attentively and with due devotion and faith in one's heart.

He says further that this wish to narrate this wonderful story of Lord Ram was inspired in his heart by Lord Shiva, and therefore he concludes that the Lord himself wants him to teach it to others.}

रामचरितमानस एहि नामा । सुनत श्रवन पाइअ बिश्रामा ॥ ७ ॥

मन करि बिषय अनल बन जरई । होइ सुखी जौं एहिं सर परई ॥ ८ ॥

rāmacaritamānasa ēhi nāmā. sunata śravana pā'i'a biśrāmā. 7.

mana kari biṣaya anala bana jaraī. hō'i sukhī jauri ēhiṁ sara paraī. 8.

The name of this sacred, holy and divine story (of Lord Ram) is “Ram Charit Manas”<sup>1</sup>. One's ears find extreme solace and peace immediately upon hearing it. [Or, to put it in another way, “one finds immense solace and peace in his inner-self as soon as one's ears hear this story being narrated”.] (7)

The elephant symbolised by one's Mana (mind and heart; inner-self) is highly agitated as it is being scorched and greatly tormented by the heat of the fierce fire symbolising passions of the sense organs and temptations of their respective objects in this material gross world. This elephant can get rid of its sufferings and find peace and solace if it plunges in the cool and soothing lake filled with nectar represented by this divine story<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The title of this story is “Ram Charit Manas”. It simply means ‘The story that narrates the life and time of Lord Ram and the deeds done by him, a story that sprouts spontaneously in the Mana or the heart and mind of the narrator, and is enshrined in the Mana of those who narrate it as well as those who listen to it’.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, if a creature wishes to find emotional peace and stability in a world full of turmoil, if he is tormented by sufferings and grief, then he is advised to listen to this holy story of Lord Ram as it would bestow upon his soul immense amount of bliss and peace.

If we apply this metaphor of the tormented elephant and the lake of cool water in which it plunges to calm its agitated nerves to the story of Ram Charit Manas, it would mean that if a person is feeling highly upset and emotionally agitated, one who feels that he is emotionally empty, spiritually in a void and unfulfilled inspite of having all the material comforts and pleasures of this material world, one who is tormented by the countless problems associated with life and has reached a stage where he is very eager to find an avenue which would lead him to a place that would grant him eternal peace and abiding happiness, then he should head straight to this path of listening to this holy story of Lord Ram being recited by a wise narrator as this would surely restore his peace of mind, give rest to his agitated heart, help him discover spiritual bliss and fulfillment, and fill his inner-self with extreme joy and happiness.

In all sooth and without gainsay, the story of Ram Charit Manas benefits the narrator and the listener alike. It is like a symbolic lake represented by a creature's heart and mind, and it is filled with cool and soothing nectar that provides spiritual bliss and happiness to all those who make the effort to come and take a dip in it by listening to this story.]

रामचरितमानस मुनि भावन । बिरचेउ संभु सुहावन पावन ॥ ९ ॥

त्रिबिध दोष दुख दारिद दावन । कलि कुचालि कुलि कलुष नसावन ॥ १० ॥

rāmacaritamānasa muni bhāvana. biracē'u sambhu suhāvana pāvana. 9.
tribidha dōṣa dukha dārida dāvana. kali kucāli kuli kaluṣa nasāvana. 10.

Ram Charit Manas delights sages, seers and saintly souls; they are very fond of it. It is beautiful, holy and divine, and it was created or conceived (first) by Lord Shambhu (Shiva) himself<sup>1</sup>. (9)

This story destroys or eliminates all the three types of faults, sorrows and poverty that torment a creature in this world<sup>2</sup>. It helps one to defeat all the dirty tricks played by Kaliyug<sup>3</sup>, as well as neutralise the evil effects and tainting influences of sins, vices and misdemeanours. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva is an embodiment of all the spiritual virtues that are deemed to be excellent, auspicious, holy, divine, immaculate and redeeming for the soul of a creature. To wit, Shiva is beautiful, holy and divine himself. So the story of Lord Ram that sprouted in the soil of Shiva's inner-self that has these eclectic qualities as outlined above also acquired these qualities much in the same way as a flower derives its nourishment from the soil in which it grows.

Thus, the story of Ram Charit Manas is absolutely holy, divine, auspicious and spiritually redeeming like Lord Shiva who had conceived it. It is like a beautiful lotus flower that blooms in a lake of crystal clear nectar.

<sup>2</sup>These refer to errors one makes in relation to one's deeds, thoughts and words. The sorrows that torment a creature relate to his birth, old age and death. And the other things from which a creature suffers in this world are lack of resources, poverty, and dearth of opportunities to rise and attain success in one's endeavours.

<sup>3</sup>The dirty tricks of Kaliyug cause immense delusions, temptations, passions, lust, desires, attachments, infatuations, ego, haughtiness, arrogance, anger, jealousy, ill-will, malice, hatred, enmity, and so on and so forth. These negative things set in motion a train of problems for a creature. All these seemingly insurmountable problems can be easily overcome by listening to the holy story of Lord Ram as it ignites the hidden spark of spiritualism in the creature that gives him the taste of bliss and beatitude that would motivate him to forgo other superficial forms of tastes represented by the artificial comforts and pleasures of this material world of sense objects.]

तातेँ रामचरितमानस बर । धरेउ नाम हियँ हेरि हरषि हर ॥ १२ ॥

raci mahēsa nija mānasa rākhā. pā'i susama'u sivā sana bhāṣā. 11.

tātēṁ rāmacaritamānasa bara. dharē'u nāma hiyaṁ hēri haraṣi hara. 12.

Lord Mahesh (the Great Ish or the Great Lord God) had created (conceived) it (the story of Lord Ram known as the Ramayan) and kept it enshrined in his Mana (mind and heart).

When the proper time came, he had narrated it to his consort 'Siva' (who is also known as goddess Uma or Parvati)<sup>1</sup>. (11)

This is the reason why this story is called 'Ram Charit Manas'—for it was conceived (or viewed; visualised) by Lord Har (Shiva) in his Mana<sup>2</sup>. He loved and adored its beauty and spiritual value exceedingly, and so he reverentially, with due affection and devotion, enshrined it in his heart.

[That is why this Ram Charit Manas is the most revered and best form of the story of Lord Ram. It is because this story was conceived by Lord Shiva himself, then enshrined in the Lord's sacred heart, and he was the first one to reveal it to goddess Parvati.

It is Lord Shiva who had given it the name of 'Ram Charit Manas' when he observed that the mystical deeds done by Lord Ram when he had manifested himself on earth as a human being for the good of his devotees ("Ram Charit") was reflected in his (Shiva's) own heart ("Manas") while he was meditating upon the Lord and repeating his holy name during his spiritual practices.

This clearly establishes that it was Lord Shiva who had himself named this sacred, holy and divine story pertaining to Lord Ram as "Ram Charit Manas"] (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 105—to Doha no. 120.

<sup>2</sup>This story of the Ramayan is called "Ram Charit Manas" as it describes the life and times as well as the deeds done by Lord Ram, the Supreme Being who had manifested himself as a human being on earth for the welfare of the gods as well as other creatures, as it was conceived in the 'Mana', or the heart and mind, of Lord Shiva. Lord Shiva always remains submerged in meditation and contemplation; he repeats the holy name of Lord Ram, viz. "RAM", as his preferred Mantra (spiritual formula), and he treats Lord Ram as his revered deity to whom he offers all his worship and obeisance.

So during these meditative sessions this story revealed in his heart and mind, he was ecstatic with bliss and entered into a state of Samadhi, a transcendental state of the consciousness that appears to be like a state of trance to the outside world, and in which he lost awareness of everything else. He loved it so much that he carefully etched this story right inside his own heart and mind like one would consecrate a deity in a shrine.

Like one dips in a lake of cool and clean water to calm and sooth one's self and would prefer to remain in the lake as long as possible, Lord Shiva was so excited with this revelation and its attendant bliss and beatitude that he too found exceptional solace in remaining perpetually submerged in remembering this divine and holy story and repeating it within himself.]

I (Tulsidas) shall tell the same story that is charming and pleasant, and gives joy and happiness (to both the narrator and the listener). All those who are good, virtuous and pious souls should hear it attentively (because it for their own good and welfare) (13)

I shall now proceed to give a full account and describe what Ram Charit Manas is all about, what are its qualities, importance and values, how it came into existence, and how and for what reasons it spread in this world.

I shall now commence doing it after first invoking Lord Shiva who has a bull on his flag (“br̥ṣakētu”; the flag that has an emblem of a bull; Lord Shiva’s insignia), and his divine consort goddess Uma<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 35)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is absolutely essential and obligatory to pay respects to Lord Shiva and seek his blessings because he is the one who had first conceived this holy and divine story. Had it not been for him, we would have not heard of it, and so the world would have not been able to access this eternal lake of spiritual bliss and peace.

Another reason why Tulsidas pays his respects to Lord Shiva is given in Chaupai line no. 1 herein below.

Then again, it is equally important to pay my homage to goddess Uma because it was due to her enquiry and insistence that Lord Shiva revealed this story of Lord Ram for the first time, as hitherto he had kept it secret and enshrined in his own Mana.]

kara'i manōhara mati anuhārī. sujana sucita suni lēhu sudhārī. 2.

It is due to the grace and blessings of Lord Shiva that this divine, holy and sacred story of Ram Charit Manas sprouted and developed in its full bloom in the heart of Tulsidas. This enabled him (Tulsidas) to become a narrator or recitor of this wonderful story. (1)

To the best of his (Tulsidas') ability he would try to make it (i.e. narrate or recite or describe it) in the most beautiful way he can, but at the same time he requests one and all who listen to it to improve upon it and make it more attractive and valuable as much as they can<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>And so true was his request and prediction. Today we find so many preachers and teachers and readers of this single book 'Ram Charit Manas' that one can't keep count. Each of these teachers and preachers has presented it in his own unique way; each of them has interpreted the verses and their meanings in their own way; each reader understands and derives pleasure from this book in his or her own way.

Though there are many other versions of the Ramayan, this variety and flexibility is missing from all of them.]

सुमति भूमि थल हृदय अगाधू । बेद पुरान उदधि घन साधू ॥ ३ ॥
बरषहिं राम सुजस बर बारी । मधुर मनोहर मंगलकारी ॥ ४ ॥

sumati bhūmi thala hr̥daya agādhū. bēda purāna udadhi ghana sādhu. 3.
baraṣahiṁ rāma sujasa bara bārī. madhura manōhara maṅgalakārī. 4.

The purified and uncorrupt mind and intellect is equivalent to the 'earth', the heart of a pious person is its 'catchment area', the scriptures such as the Vedas and the Purans are like the 'ocean', and saintly people are the 'rain-bearing clouds'<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Even as the rain-bearing clouds shower their life-giving nectar in the form of rain, these saints preach the holy story of Lord Ram that describes the glorious of the Lord for the benefit of all living beings. This divine story acts as nectar for the soul of the hearer as it is very sweet to hear, is a rejuvenator of the spirit, and is a bestower of all sorts of welfare and auspiciousness for all the creatures. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The clouds gather moisture from the ocean and then they move inland to pour it out in the form of rain which quenches the thirst of all living beings and irrigates the land mass of the earth. Similarly, saints and wise people study the scriptures and extract the essence in the form of the holy story of the Lord God which they then preach to others who derive joy and peace by it.

In this way, even those who cannot directly access the spiritual nectar contained in the scriptures are benefited by the saints who have access to these holy books.

Further, just as the inherently sour and un-potable water of the ocean becomes clean and pure when it reaches the cloud, because it is done by the physical process of evaporation which is the Nature's way of distilling it, and when this cloud pours this water in the form of rain it becomes sweet and drinkable, the sagacious and erudite saints filter the vast contents of the scriptures by studying them thoroughly and then extracting their essence in the form of the divine story of the Lord God, i.e. Lord Ram, which they store in the reservoir of their heart and mind which acts as the 'catchment area', then they refine it further by applying their intellect and wisdom to transform the raw story into an exceptionally charming, sweet and pleasant narrative that would appeal to the heart and the mind of ordinary devotees with whom they share this spiritual nectar by way of reciting the story, preaching it, and explaining its finer meaning for their benefit.

Hence, just as the ordinary creature gets to access the life-giving sweet water from the vast natural reservoir of water known as the ocean by the grace of the cloud, the spiritual nectar buried in the huge volumes of the scriptures is made easily accessible for the devotees of the Lord by the grace of saints.

प्रेम भगति जो बरनि न जाई । सोइ मधुरता सुसीतलताई ॥ ६ ॥

līlā saguna jō kahahim bakhānī. sō'i svacchatā kara'i mala hānī. 5. prēma bhagati jō barani na jāī. sō'i madhuratā susītalatāī. 6.

The detailed narration and the explanation of the life and deeds of Lord Ram (the Lord God; the Supreme Being) during his human manifestation on earth is the 'cleanliness and purity' of the symbolic water (referred to in previous verse nos. 3-4 herein above; i.e. the divine story of Lord Ram and its spiritual benefits) that is made accessible to the devotee<sup>1</sup>. This distilled and refined symbolic 'water' is able to wash all the spiritual impurities and blemishes that cling to the inner-self of the devotee (and by extension to all those who hear it with devotion and faith). (5)

The subtle and silent message of love, faith and devotion that is hidden in the story comes to the fore when it is explained by wise saints, and this is equivalent to the sweetness and rejuvenating qualities of this water<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read in the previous verse nos. 3-4 that wise saints first refine the raw story and convert it into a sweet narrative that appeals to the heart, which they then preach to the devotee of the Lord. Thus, just like the rain water that falls on earth by the grace of the clouds to benefit one and all, is the purified and cleaned form of the raw water which was extracted from its primary source of the ocean which is sour and salty, the story that is narrated and explained by erudite and sagacious saints becomes easily understandable and it appeals to all. Even a person of ordinary intellect would be able to grasp its essence. Hence, even ordinary creatures can benefit from this narration.

Here, the process of explaining the meaning and message of the story of Lord Ram is like distilling water to make it sweet, refined, and free from all impurities.

<sup>2</sup>This verse explains the importance of ‘explaining the story of Lord Ram’. This method makes it very charming, and simultaneously removes all doubts—which is like distilling water to make it clean and purified.]

सो जल सुकृत सालि हित होई । राम भगत जन जीवन सोई ॥ ७ ॥
मेधा महि गत सो जल पावन । सकलि श्रवन मग चलेउ सुहावन ॥ ८ ॥
भरेउ सुमानस सुथल थिराना । सुखद सीत रुचि चारु चिराना ॥ ९ ॥

sō jala sukr̥ta sāli hita hō'ī. rāma bhagata jana jīvana sō'ī. 7.
mēdhā mahi gata sō jala pāvana. sakili śravana maga calē'u suhāvana. 8.
bharē'u sumānasa suthala thirānā. sukhada sīta ruci cāru cirānā. 9.

That cleaned and purified ‘water’ representing the detailed narration of the Lord’s holy story and removal of all doubts is the symbolic rain water that is beneficial for the crop represented by the good deeds of a creature.

[Just as rain water is beneficial for the crop as it makes the latter grow properly and yield good result for the farmer, the story of Lord Ram, when it is properly explained by the teacher and understood by the disciple, too is beneficial for the spiritual welfare of the latter.]

Therefore, for a devotee of Lord Ram this story is like his own life and soul, and hence it is most dear to him. (7)

This purified symbolic water represented by the narration of the holy story of Lord Ram fell on the earth represented by the wise, attentive and receptive ‘mind and intellect’ of the hearer (i.e. the devotee who listens to it with faith and devotion); this water then moves through the pleasant channel of the ‘ear’ to reach the best reservoir meant for it; and this reservoir is symbolised by the ‘heart’ of the hearer where this holy water finally collects and dwells (to be accessed by the devotee as and when he needs it)<sup>1</sup>. [And that is why the story of Lord Ram is called the “Ram Charit Manas” because the word ‘Manas’ refers to the ‘Mana’—the combination of the heart and the mind.]

As time passed, this ‘water’ became cleaner, cooler and more refreshing as it is allowed to settle in its resting place in the heart (because whatever residual impurities that still remained in this water could settle down to the bottom when the water was allowed to remain undisturbed for some time in the receptacle, making that part of the water that is to be used much cleaner than what it was in the beginning)<sup>2</sup>. (8-9)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Merely hearing the story won’t benefit the listener if he is not attentive and his mind is not ready to receive the message just like a student who does not pay attention in the classroom is unable to grasp the subject being taught by the teacher. Such students waste their time in school, and they gain nothing by attending the class physically when their mind is focused elsewhere and they are not paying attention to the subject being taught.

Once again, a clever student is one who goes home and revises the subject taught in school; he keeps on revising it from time to time till he has a complete grasp of the subject. Later on in life when he grows up, this wise student would shine in his field of expertise as his knowledge has a robust foundation and he is well-versed in the fine technical details of the subject of his choice.

Therefore, it is very important to hear this story of Lord Ram with a receptive mind willing to learn its finer details and understand its message properly. Just as running by rote won't benefit the student at all because he won't be able to understand the intricacies of any technical subject, and therefore would fail to solve practical problems pertaining to this subject, the hearing of the story of Lord Ram in a careless manner won't serve any purpose for the hearer. If a spiritual aspirant wishes to really benefit from the story of Lord Ram then he must pay attention to its finer details, remove all doubts by questioning his teacher, and then keep on thinking of the story and its subtle message on a continuing basis.

<sup>2</sup>When water flows over some surface then it is natural for it to collect some dirt sticking to this surface irrespective of the fact that the water was cleaned earlier. When this water is allowed to remain undisturbed for some time, the dust particles settles at the bottom of the container and clean water comes on the surface.

Likewise, when the story of Lord Ram is first heard and stored in the heart and memory of the devotee, it may not be perfectly clear in its meaning and message to him. Later on as time passes and he gets the company of saints where this story is explained in detail in a variety of ways by different teachers using different ways to explain it, the subtle meaning and the hidden message of the story of the Lord becomes more and more clearer to the devotee. This is what is meant here in this verse.

The 'cleaner, cooler and more refreshing water' obviously refers to the greater clarity of the meaning and the better grasp of the spiritual message of the divine story of Lord Ram that the devotee has already enshrined in his heart.

This most beautiful and attractive symbolic 'lake' ("manas") representing the divine story of Lord Ram has four banks represented by the four most excellent and wise conversations that have been recorded in it (and all these four conversations have been so expertly woven into the text of the story that they form an integral part of it, and cannot be separated from it).

[To wit, in this holy and divine Story of Lord Ram, (known as Ram Charit Manas), the four primary discourses, rich in spiritual and metaphysical wisdom, that have been narrated to form its framework, are like the four banks of a beautiful lake filled with ambrosia of bliss and beatitude. These four discourses are the following: Lord Shiva and Parvati; sages Yagyawalkya and Bharadwaj; the saintly crow

Kaagbhusund and Garud; saint poet Tulsidas and other saints and sages that narrated this story subsequently.]<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 36)

(i) Between Lord Shiva and his consort goddess Parvati (also referred to as Uma, Girija and Bhavani at different places)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 108; and Doha no. 111 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.

(ii) Between sages Yagyavalkya and Bharadwaj—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 46—to Doha no. 47.

(iii) Between the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and Garud, the mount of Lord Vishnu—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 63—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 64.

(iv) The devotee poet-saint Goswami Tulsidas and his Guru—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 30—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 31.

All those who had narrated the story of Lord Ram—i.e. Lord Shiva, sage Yagyavalkya, sage Kaagbhusund, and the Guru of Tulsidas—were wise, enlightened, erudite and sagacious. Hence, these conversations were intelligent, wise and full of spiritual wisdom.

A ‘lake’ usually has four banks—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 39 where it is said that Lord Ram went to a lake known as Pampa which had four banks on its four sides.

The story of Lord Ram is likened to a ‘lake’ because it is filled with the nectar of devotion (Bhakti) for the Lord as this story of ‘Ram Charit Manas’ stimulates the development of the glorious spiritual virtues of devotion, faith and affection for the Lord in the heart of the devotee. It cleanses his inner-self of all spiritual impurities, and just like a fresh-water rejuvenates the body and the spirit of anyone who takes a dip in its pristine clean and cool water, the story of the Lord soothes the creature by eliminating the torments of his soul and providing his mind with solace and succour.]

चौ०. सप्त प्रबंध सुभग सोपाना । ग्यान नयन निरखत मन माना ॥ १ ॥

रघुपति महिमा अगुन अबाधा । बरनब सोइ बर बारि अगाधा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sapta prabandha subhaga sōpānā. gyāna nayana nirakhata mana mānā. 1.
raghupati mahimā aguna abādhā. baranaba sō'i bara bāri agādhā. 2.

The seven ‘Kandas’ (Cantos or Chapters) are the seven symbolic ‘steps’ of this lake<sup>1</sup>, and one feels delighted in heart when one sees these steps with the eyes of wisdom<sup>2</sup>. (1)*

The fathomless depth of this reservoir of spiritual nectar is represented by the infinite glories and the eclectic virtues of Lord Raghunath (Lord Sri Ram) that are divine by nature, as well as beyond comprehension of the mind and grasp of the intellect<sup>3</sup>. (2)**

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Just as one needs steps to reach the water in a vast lake, the nectar that provides spiritual bliss to the devotee in the story of Ram Charit Manas can be accessed in the right way only if one reads the whole story consisting of seven Kandas from the beginning to its natural conclusion. Random reading would be like skipping the steps and trying to jump directly into the lake to bathe in its water, and this would obviously cause serious injury to the bather.

<sup>2</sup>When one sees a deep fresh-water lake and wishes to take a dip in its cool and refreshing water, the first thing that he searches for are the steps that lead to that water. Some of the steps may be dirty and made slippery by the use of others who may not have bothered to clean them after use, so he looks around to find some place where the steps are not only clean but also lead to that part of the lake where the water is free from surface impurities such as algae, hyacinth and other aquatic plants, or even stagnant water on which some kind of scum may have collected over time.

In this metaphor, the devotee would get true benefit by reading or hearing this story of Lord Ram if he approaches it with the ‘sight of wisdom’. To wit, he must be careful, alert and wise to be able to understand the hidden spiritual message of the story to gain anything from it, and not get entangled in the mesh of other superficial things relating to the humdrum affairs of the mortal world as described in it. One must realise that the story describes the life and time of the Supreme Being during his manifestation as a ‘human being on earth which is a gross and mortal world’. Life on earth is not the same ideal life as one expects in the heaven.

It is quite natural and incumbent in this scenario that all the not-so-divine factors that are associated with and are a part-and-parcel of life on earth and existence in the mortal gross world are bound to cast some of their shadows on the story. It would therefore be foolhardy and stupid on the part of a seeker to get bogged down in this quagmire and be distracted from his real spiritual goal. This is what is meant by ‘looking at the seven steps with eyes of wisdom’.

<sup>3</sup>One must not be misled by what one sees on the surface of the story, for its content of spiritual knowledge and wisdom is exceedingly deep and beyond measure. To wit, on the surface it appears to be one other story from ancient mythology, but on deep analysis one would see more to it than what meets the eye. The deeper one goes into the story, the greater is the treasure of wisdom that one discovers in it.

It is not a shallow lake; it is as deep as the ocean. Nay, it is deeper than the ocean; it is as fathomless as the sky and the space of the cosmos that is filled with ether.

Some of the instances where the stupendous glories and the divine nature of Lord Ram have been mentioned in Ram Charit Manas are as follows: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 341 (where king Janak has praised Lord Ram); (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 93 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it (where Laxman has praised Lord Ram’s greatness to Nishad); (iii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 126—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 127 (where sage Valmiki has praised the glory of Lord Ram); (iii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-9 that precede Doha no. 13; (iv) Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 1 (where Hanuman has praised the Lord); (v) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 21 (where Hanuman has praised Lord Ram’s stupendous glory in the court of Ravana, the demon king of Lanka); (vi) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 22 (where Angad, the messenger of Lord Ram, has praised the Lord while admonishing Ravana and advising him to surrender before the almighty Lord); and (vii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 82 (where the saintly crow Kaagbhusund describes the cosmic form of Lord Ram).]

<< We can read these two Chaupais and interpret them a little differently as follows:-

*This divine story of Lord Ram has been arranged into seven chapters (called the Kandas), and they represent the seven steps that lead to the nectar of spiritual bliss present in the center of the symbolic lake represented by this holy story. When one sees these steps and the lake that they lead to with eyes of wisdom, one's Mana (heart and mind) is filled with delight unbound#, --- (1)

**--- For he realizes that the water of this holy lake is accessed by reading the full story having seven chapters that narrate the infinite glories and greatness of Lord Ram, because they expound upon the divinity and holiness of the Lord in a finite and comprehensible way so as to make the Supreme Lord, whose primary form is invisible, cosmic, infinite and without any attributes, become easily accessible to a devotee in a way he can relate to in the gross, mortal world in which he lives. (2)

#Why are eyes of wisdom so important? The answer is given in the second Chaupai—because without wisdom and proper understanding one would look at this holy story as a mere tale of a great prince of Ayodhya, a tale that describes his life and time like so many other fascinating stories and captivating tales written by numerous court historians, minstrels and bards meant more to eulogise and lift to lofty heights the concerned princes and kings in order to please them rather than to present a truthful account of events.

However, the case of Ram Charit Manas is completely different, for it is the story of the Supreme Being who was gracious enough to assume the form of a human being in the person of Lord Ram to fulfill the wishes of his devotees as well as to give countless pious souls a chance to have simple way to know the Lord and identify themselves with him, to give them a visible form which they can easily worship and offer obeisance to, because having devotion for an entity that has no form and attributes, which is the case with the primary form of Lord Ram as the Supreme Being who has a cosmic presence that is invisible and without known attributes, is extremely difficult in practice.

By manifesting himself as Lord Ram, the Supreme Being has given countless ordinary devotees a chance to attain spiritual joy, bliss and beatitude, as well as find deliverance, emancipation and salvation which they would have missed if the only way to attain this eclectic state of exalted being was by acquiring metaphysical and theological knowledge based on spiritual philosophy, for the latter is too abstract and makes it difficult for the common man to benefit from. >>

In this metaphoric lake, the eclectic glories and the excellent virtues of Lord Ram and Sita (his consort) are its 'water'<sup>1</sup>.

The innumerable instances of enchanting comparisons, similes and metaphors that have been used in this wonderful story are like the softly undulating wavelets of this charming lake that captivate and enthrall the mind<sup>2</sup>. (3)

The Chaupais (verses that precede as well as follow each two-line couplet known as the Doha) are the thick maze of lotus plants with its stems<sup>3</sup>.

The various styles of poetry employed in composing this story are like the many oyster shells that yield so many beautiful pearls. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>If Lord Ram was a personified form of Lord Vishnu, the cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as 'Brahm', Sita is the human form of Laxmi, the goddess who is the consort of Lord Vishnu and a manifestation of the cosmic Shakti, the dynamic powers and energy of Brahm.

To wit, Ram and Sita are not an ordinary human couple; they are personified form of the cosmic almighty Lord and his dynamic powers called Shakti. This fact is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 246.

<sup>2</sup>Some excellent examples of wonderful comparisons, similes and metaphors are found in Ram Charit Manas, (a) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 37—to Doha no. 40 when Lord Ram visited Lake Pampa; and in (b) Kishkindha Kand, Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17 where we read about the time spent by Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman on the summit of Mt. Prabarshan.

<sup>3</sup>The word "Chaupai" means a 'four-legged verse'. The traditional form of a Chaupai is like the standard 'stanza' of a poem that has four lines that recur as the basic metre of the poem. There are many variations to this basic structure, and as for our Book 'Ram Charit Manas', the term 'Chaupai' is applied to each line of the poem. It is to be noted that each of these lines has two parts, one to the left and one to the right, with a pause in the center. This pause is like a coma (,) in a standard sentence, whereas the end of a particular line is like a semi-colon (;) or a full stop (.), depending upon the flow of the idea that is being expressed. If one line is sufficient to complete the idea, the end is like a full stop, and if the idea is continued into the next line then the end of the line is like a semi-colon.]

The beautiful Chandas, the Sorthas and the Dohas<sup>1</sup> that adorn this poetic composition are like the countless lotus flowers of different hues of colour that embellish the lake (referred to in Doha no. 36 and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it). (5)

The high spiritual quality of the meaning of this divine story of Lord Ram (i.e. the Ram Charit Manas), the exaltedness of the noble ideas expressed in it, and the lucid and enchanting language employed to compose it are like the nectar, the essence and the fragrance of these lotus flowers (that spreads all over the lake symbolised by the story itself). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “Chanda” is a style of poetry that usually consists verses having a standard stanza of four lines each as opposed to the ‘Chaupai’ which has stand-alone verses of single lines. The standard number of letters and syllables also differ in the two styles. The way they are recited also differs. Other than this, the superficial structure is the same in both these systems of composition—i.e. there is a pause in the center of the line.

The “Doha” and the “Sortha” are also alike in the sense that they consist of two-line verses. The basic difference between the two lies in the fact that whereas in the ‘Doha’ the last words of both the lines rhyme with each other, but it is not the case with the ‘Sortha’.

Another technical difference between the two, which is usually understood only by an expert in languages, is that whereas in the ‘Sortha’ the first and the third parts have eleven syllables each, and the second and the fourth parts have thirteen syllables each, the ‘Doha’ has just the opposite, i.e. its first and the third parts have thirteen syllables each, and the second and the fourth parts have eleven syllables each.

An example of this will be evident when we compare Doha no. 15 and Sortha no. 16 of Baal Kand.]

The devotees who have done a host of good and meritorious deeds are like the huge assembly of ‘black bees’ that are so naturally attracted to the lotus flower that they crowd around it, humming away merrily and hovering over the flower to find an opportunity to draw nectar from it<sup>1</sup>.

{Alternately, this part of the verse can be read as follows: “The many glorious and meritorious deeds narrated in this story of Lord Ram are like the black bees that swarm on the surface of the lake, buzzing around merrily and hovering over the lotus flowers in order to drink their nectar.”<sup>2</sup>}

The eclectic virtues of Gyan (true knowledge, wisdom and enlightenment; gnosis), Vairagya (renunciation, detachment and dispassion) and Vichaar (proper analysis, correct thought, and intelligent application of the mind to chose the right option) are like the wonderful ‘Swans’ that float on this lake. (7)

The many styles of poetic compositions, and their excellent qualities and sublime charm are like the many varieties of colourful fish, small and big, that inhabit this symbolic lake. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are countless insects but only the black bee is attracted to the lotus flower. Similarly, there are countless people who may read this story of Lord Ram just due to curiosity but they will find no interest in it. Only those who have done some good deed from the spiritual perspective will find the true value in this story. So such devotees flock to it like the black bee flocks to the lotus flower, and then they enjoy reading and reciting this story and deriving immense bliss and blessedness by doing so just like the bee that merrily hums over the lotus flower, alights on it and enjoys drinking its nectar.

<sup>2</sup>There are numerous examples of the righteous and noble way of living and thinking in this world that are cited in the story on different occasions. These are like the black bees that hover over the lake because they are attracted by the fragrance of the lotus flowers present in it. These bees hum and buzz around the surface of the lake full of lotus flowers, alight softly over the flower, drink its nectar, and linger on in the vicinity. This creates a beautiful sight for the beholder.

The countless other beautiful aquatic creatures that live in this lake are represented by the following: (a) the four rewards that one can obtain for all human activities (and these are ‘Artha’, ‘Dharma’, ‘Kaam’ and ‘Moksha’)<sup>1</sup> as described in the story, (b) understanding of what constitutes true wisdom and enlightenment, and what is the true reward for all human endeavours as indicated in the story, and then speaking about them wisely<sup>2</sup>, (c) the nine charms of any composition, whether poetry or prose that are found in the story<sup>3</sup>, and (d) the grand spiritual virtues of Japa (repetition of prayers and mantras), Tapa (penance and austerity), Yoga (meditation and contemplation), and Vairagya (renunciation, detachment and dispassion) as they are described by way of examples in the story. (9-10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four rewards are ‘Artha’—material well-being and prosperity; ‘Dharma’—righteous way of living; ‘Kaam’—fulfilment of desires; and ‘Moksha’—liberation and deliverance from the torments associated with the cycle of birth and death.

<sup>2</sup>These above rewards have two connotations—one is their temporal attainment, and the other is their spiritual attainment. A wise and intelligent person is one who reads the story of Ram Charit Manas and understands the fact that it is useless to strive for any kind of worldly gains by doing religious practices and meritorious deeds. The real use of reading and hearing the story of Lord Ram is to gain awareness and knowledge of what constitutes the actual benefit that one should hope to get by doing any meritorious deed in life. The superficial gains and rewards in the form of material riches, comfort, fame and powers are not of any real worth. The true reward one gets for all his efforts and other meritorious deeds must have a spiritual dimension to it, and it is to attain Mukti or Moksha—which is to attain freedom from the cycle of transmigration; attainment of emancipation and salvation of the soul; attaining oneness of the individual's soul with the Supreme Soul.

Besides this, a careful reading of the story would also enlighten the devotee of what actually constitutes ‘meritorious deed’. The story also tells him what is Gyan, Vairagya, Japa, Tapa, Yoga etc. in the true sense, and what is the best reward of all these spiritual practices taken together.

Emphasise is on ‘first understanding these virtues wisely, and then speaking about them wisely as well’. This is an important observation. If one wrongly understands or interprets something that is vital and important, he would not only harm his own interests but others to whom he tells about it would also suffer.

So, a wise person is one who first carefully reads and analyses the story, understands its true meaning and deciphers its hidden message, and then only he advises others about it. Otherwise, more harm would be done than doing any trace of good.

<sup>3</sup>The nine charms of poetical composition are the following shades of sentiments or emotions that are inherent in all compositions: (i) Sringaar—the sentiment of love and passion; (ii) Haasya—humour and satire; (iii) Karuna—pity; the pathetic sentiment; (iv) Vira—valour and heroism; (v) Rudra—anger, wrath, ill-temper and fury; (vi) Bhayaanak—that which inspires the sentiment of fear, terror and horror; (vii) Bibhatsa—the sentiment of disgust, revulsion; (viii) Shanta—tranquility, peace, calmness; (ix) and Adbhuta—that which is strange and marvellous, that which inspires wonder and awe.]

sukṛtī sādhu nāma guna gānā. tē bicitra jala bihaga samānā. 11.
santasabhā cahum̐ṣi avam̐rāṭī. śrad'dhā ritu basanta sama gāṭī. 12.

The wonderful flocks of aquatic birds of different kinds of feathers that abound in this lake are represented by the countless noble men who have done meritorious service and righteous deeds, as well as the innumerable saintly and pious souls who jointly praise Lord Ram and sing the Lord's excellent virtues and glories together<sup>1</sup>. (11)

The congregation or assembly of saints (where such singing or recitation is done) represents the gardens and orchards (of succulent and sweet fruits) that surround this lake on all its four sides. [And it is in these assemblies or groups where these saints ecstatically sing the divine story of Lord Ram just like the proverbial lark. Fruit gardens are usually flocked by birds. Hence this metaphor is used here.]

The faith and devotion that these pious souls have for the sacred, divine and holy story of Lord Ram is like the spring season that prevails in this symbolic garden and orchard<sup>2</sup>. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Where there are large numbers of birds of different kinds, there would a cacophony of their sounds. This noise is not irritating for the senses; rather it sounds sweet and gives a pleasant aura to the environment. This analogy is used to describe how countless devotees sing or recite the story of Lord Ram in their own style, either singly or in unison with others, to create a pleasant atmosphere of holiness and spiritual bliss.

<sup>2</sup>The saints and holy men are exhilarated when they read and recite the story of Lord Ram. The atmosphere of joy and happiness that prevails in their company reminds one of the spring season when the leaves turn green, new flowers open their petals, the sun shines in all its splendour, there is greenery all around, and life seems to be full of happiness and joy.

This phenomenon of Nature is invoked here to emphasise that the general atmosphere in the company of saints is as pleasant, rejuvenating and spiritually refreshing as the spring season is for life on earth.]

भगति निरूपन बिबिध बिधाना । छमा दया दम लता बिताना ॥ १३ ॥

सम जम नियम फूल फल ग्याना । हरि पद रति रस बेद बखाना ॥ १४ ॥

bhagati nirūpana bibidha bidhānā. chamā dayā dama latā bitānā. 13.

sama jama niyama phūla phala gyānā. hari pada rati rasa bēda bakhānā. 14.

Exposition and discussions on the various shades of the virtue of Bhakti<sup>1</sup> (devotion for Lord Ram) as well as of Kshama (forgiveness), Daya (mercy and compassion) and Dama (self-restraint of one's sense organs)—these represent the canopy of creepers in these gardens and orchards (as visualised in the previous verse nos. 11-12 herein above). (13)

Control of the Mana (mind and heart), the five forms of Yam (self-restraint) and Niyam (observations, sacraments and vows)<sup>2</sup> are the symbolic flowers of these creepers that abound in the gardens and orchards (described above).

Gyan (true knowledge, wisdom, enlightenment and self-realisation; gnosis) is the fruit of these creepers. And having or developing devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Hari (Sri Ram) is the juice or the essence of these fruits<sup>3</sup>. (14)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The many forms that Bhakti can take have been described in Ram Charit Manas, (i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 128—to Doha no. 131; and (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 35—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 36.

<sup>2</sup>The five 'Yams' are the following: non-violence, truthfulness, non-stealing, continence, and non-acquisition of worldly riches.

The five 'Niyams' or religious observances or vows are the following: purity, both external and internal, contentment, austerity, self-study of the scriptures, and repetition of holy Mantras that culminate in surrender to God).

<sup>3</sup>Of what use is Gyan if it can't teach the devotee to have devotion and faith in the Lord God. To wit, the true essence of hearing or studying Ram Charit Manas is that the devotee is able to develop devotion for Lord Ram, have faith in the Lord, and love the Lord as he would love his own life.]

औरउ कथा अनेक प्रसंगा । तेइ सुक पिक बहुबरन बिहंगा ॥ १५ ॥

aura'u kathā anēka prasaṅgā. tē'i suka pika bahubarana bihaṅgā. 15.

The myriad other tales and anecdotes narrated in this Ram Charit Manas are like the many parrots, cuckoo and other birds of colourful feathers that live in these gardens and orchards (as described herein above). (15)

Further, the sense of thrill, ecstasy and exhilaration that is obtained by hearing, reading and reciting this story of Lord Ram are the symbolic gardens, forests and orchards.

The joy and happiness and bliss that accompanies such hearing, reading and recitation are the symbolic birds that abound in these gardens, forests and orchards.

The purified and uncorrupt Mana (mind and heart) is like the expert gardener (who takes care of this metaphoric garden)<sup>1</sup>. He waters the excellent garden and its beautiful plants with the water symbolised by the tears that flow from the eyes of the devotee when he is overwhelmed with ecstasy and bliss<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 37)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, just like the case of a garden or an orchard depending on the will and the sincere effort of an expert gardener to thrive and remain charming, the Mana of a devotee is responsible for how much benefit the devotee draws from the story of the Lord. If the Mana is interested and finds charm in the story of Lord Ram then it would motivate the devotee to find interest in the story and keep him focused on it. A wise and intelligent Mana would help the devotee to properly understand the story and derive benefit from it. Otherwise, the devotee would lose interest and easily get distracted by other things.

<sup>2</sup>Tears of joy and love would flow automatically when the devotee reaches a certain point of spiritual bliss that is expected by reading, hearing and reciting the holy story of Lord Ram. When this state is reached it is deemed that his spiritual garden has been well taken care of.]

चौ०. जे गावहिं यह चरित सँभारे । तेइ एहि ताल चतुर रखवारे ॥ १ ॥

jē gāvahiṃ yaha carita saṁbhārē. tē'i ēhi tāla catura rakhavārē. 1.
sadā sunahiṃ sādara nara nārī. tē'i surabara mānasa adhikārī. 2.

Those who sing (or recite) this story with due care and diligence are the ones who are deemed to be clever, skilful and alert angel-guardians of this symbolic lake (representing the divine story of Lord Ram that contains the nectar that provides spiritual solace, succour, bliss and blessedness). (1)

Those men and women who hear this story reverentially, with due faith and devotion, are deemed to be the patron deities of this lake which is known as 'Manas'<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “Manas” means that which is related to and originates in the ‘Mana’—the mind and the heart. The holy story of Lord Ram was conceived in the ‘Mana’ of Lord Shiva, then whoever heard it later on loved it so much that he remembered it by heart and kept his mind engaged in thinking of it. The story of Lord Ram is so enchanting and spiritually fulfilling that once one hears it one becomes exhilarated and so enamoured of it that one would commit it to one’s memory and remember it fondly because it becomes very dear to the heart. The story takes a permanent place in the memory and the heart of the devotee, and whenever he has time to recall it, or whenever he hears it being recited by others, he feels ecstatic and blissful.

To wit, the spiritually rejuvenating story of Lord Ram is enshrined in the subtle space of the heart of the devotee just like a physical lake filled with fresh and cool water is located in a hollow space scooped out of the earth. Again, just as taking a dip in this physical water makes a man feel fresh and rejuvenated, a dip into the lake symbolised by the story of Lord Ram too provides rejuvenation and joy to the spirit and the mind of the devotee.

According to ancient tradition in the Indian society, all sacred places such as pilgrim centers and holy sites that include temples, lakes and ponds in these centers have a presiding deity to whom a person is expected to pay his obeisance before proceeding with his other religious rituals. In the case of the symbolic lake representing the story of Lord Ram, those devotees who sing it with devotion and faith, those who hold the story dear to their heart and mind, those who enjoy reading, reciting and preaching other about it to others, those who have understood its true meaning and spiritual value—they are the ones who are deemed to be living presiding deities of this ‘lake’. So they must be shown respect first before someone proceeds with the hearing or reciting of the story. This is done not only to honour them but also to invoke their blessing and patronage as they would help the new-comer to become fully acquainted with the intricacies of the story and its spiritual value, that would, in turn, motivate the newly initiated devotee to start loving and revering this story of the Lord.]

sambuka bhēka sēvāra samānā. ihām̃ na biṣaya kathā rasa nānā. 4.

Those people who are wicked, crooked and pervert, those who love sensual pleasures and worldly charms more than anything else are the unfortunate ones who are like the herons and the crows who do not dare to venture near this lake<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The reason is that in this divine and holy lake there are no snails, frogs and moss that symbolise vain talk and vile stories related to attachment to the senses<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘Mansarovar Lake’ located at the base of Mt. Kailash, the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva, is in the higher reaches of the Himalayan mountain range and is inhabited only by Swans; herons and crows don’t go there. This fact has been invoked here while comparing the story of Lord Ram with a sacred lake when it is said that herons and crows don’t go near this lake.

The ‘Swan’ is used as a metaphor for wisdom, purity and cleanliness. It is believed that it is so wise and selective in its choice of what to accept and what to reject that it would be able to separate water from milk, and pick up pearls from an assortment of jewels. On the other hand, crows and herons eat fish and are deemed to be lowly birds.

Therefore, in such a holy lake as the story of Lord Ram, only those who have a pure mind and heart can have access. Crooked people are not able to come near it.

<sup>2</sup>Those who find pleasure in the world and its sensual things will find the story of Lord Ram boring and dull as it does not cater to their liking. This story teaches one to renounce the pleasures of the gross mundane world as it does not give any lasting peace and happiness to the creature, but on the contrary it is so full of misery, pain and grief that it only causes torments to the creature. True and lasting happiness comes with self-realisation that entails turning away from the external world of sense objects, and towards the eternally blissful Atma that resides in the inner-self of all living beings. This eclectic spiritual philosophy, no matter how true and correct, would surely not appeal to the lustful and the passionate creature. So such people loathe this story of Lord Ram.]

tēhi kārana āvata hiyam̃ hārē. Kāmī kāka balāka bicārē. 5.
āvata ēhiṃ sara ati kaṭhināī. Rāma kṛpā binu āī na jāī. 6.

This is the reason why people who are likened to herons and crows shun this lake and do not want even to venture near it. (5)

Access to this symbolic holy lake is very difficult, and the path leading to it is full of obstacles<sup>1</sup>. Only those upon whom Lord Ram becomes graceful and kind are able to overcome all hurdles and access this sacred lake<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These have been briefly enumerated in the verses that follow herein below.

Refer also to the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, that describe the many spiritual hurdles that the devotee has to face, and which can only be overcome by the grace of Lord Ram: (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Doha no. 71; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 89—to Doha no. 90; (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 93; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 28-37 that precede Doha no. 121.

kaṭhina kusaṅga kupantha karālā. tinha kē bacana bāgha hari byālā. 7.
gṛha kāraja nānā janjālā. tē ati durgama saila bisālā. 8.

Company of highly pervert, sinful, evil, wicked and lustful persons is equivalent to the difficult terrain (path) that has to be successfully traversed in order to reach this lake<sup>1</sup>.

The words of such companions are equivalent to the roar of the tiger and the lion, and the hissing sound of the snake<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Similarly, the myriads of household duties and worldly obligations that have to be fulfilled are like the high and intractable mountains and hills that are very hard to cross before the seeker can reach this lake<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, the first hurdle is bad company. This company creates a lot of practical problems for the spiritual seeker. It is extremely difficult and requires a lot of will power and resilience on the part of the spiritual aspirant to resist the evil influence of this company.

<sup>2</sup>Just as the very roar of the tiger or the lion, or the hissing of the snake sends a chill down the spine of a person who is sore affright of them, the sarcastic remarks, derisive comments and insolent words of members of evil community for a person who wishes not to toe their evil line and instead lead a life of righteousness is too humiliating for him to bear with comfort. He feels disgusted and dejected and lonely; he feels rejected and condemned. Evil people would proffer so many ill-conceived and irrational logics to deter the righteous man and make him fall from his chosen spiritual path that even the wisest of men begins to doubt his own wisdom.

The result is that one finds it hard to travel cheerfully and spiritedly on the path that leads to the lake of spiritual nectar symbolised by the story of Ram Charit Manas. His steps become heavy and weary, and chances are that he would yield to the constant mental and emotional pressure exerted by his companions to stop thinking of this lake.

<sup>3</sup>This is the second practical problem a spiritual aspirant faces. Even if he decides to shun bad company, he finds it difficult not to fulfill his obligations towards his family and the world. He has to carry on with his business or vocation that consume the better part of his time and energy in life, leaving little space for him to devote towards his spiritual objectives.]

बन बहु बिषम मोह मद माना । नदीं कुतर्क भयंकर नाना ॥ ९ ॥

bana bahu biṣama mōha mada mānā. nadīṁ kutarka bhayaṅkara nānā. 9.

The negative traits such as ‘Moha’ (infatuation and attachment), ‘Mada’ (arrogance and haughtiness) and ‘Maan’ (ego and pride) are like the many dense forests that have to be crossed in order to access the lake.

Irrational logic, fallacious arguments, pretensions of self-righteousness and having better knowledge, fraud and deceptions are the many terrifying rivers that too have to be crossed in order to reach this lake. (9)

[Note—These are the third set of problems faced by the seeker. Even if he manages to overcome the physical obstacles listed in the previous verses, the ones listed here become harder to overcome as they relate to his inner-self and form a part of his attitude, character and inherent nature to which he is habituated, and which is too difficult to mend.]

दो०. जे श्रद्धा संबल रहित नहिं संतन्ह कर साथ ।

तिन्ह कहूँ मानस अगम अति जिन्हहि न प्रिय रघुनाथ ॥ ३८ ॥

dōhā.

jē śrad'dhā sambala rahita nahīṁ santanha kara sātha.

tinha kahum̐ mānasa agama ati jinhahi na priya raghunātha. 38.

Those who do not have money in the form of faith, conviction and devotion to meet their travel expenses, those who do not have a company of saints and pious people on this path, and those who do not have affection for Lord Raghunath (Lord Ram)—such people find this path extremely arduous and difficult to travel. (Doha no. 38)

[Note—These three things—money for travel expenses, company of like-minded fellow travellers, and a strong desire and dedication to reach the targeted place—are necessary for a traveller to reach his cherished destination. Hence, the factors mentioned in this Doha help a spiritual aspirant to fully benefit from the reading and hearing of the story of Lord Ram.

To wit, he must have faith and belief, he must have company of saintly people who would encourage him onwards if he gets stuck somewhere or if he is unable to understand anything, and love for Lord Ram that would keep him inspired.]

चौ०. जौं करि कष्ट जाइ पुनि कोई । जातहिं नीद जुड़ाई होई ॥ १ ॥
जड़ता जाड़ बिषम उर लागा । गएहुं न मज्जन पाव अभागा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jauri kari kab jā'i puni kōī. jātahiṁ nīda jurāī hōī. 1.
jaṛatā jāṛa biṣama ura lāgā. ga'eḥum' na majjana pāva abhāgā. 2.

Hence, the journey to access this lake represented by the story of Lord Ram is very arduous and full of difficulties. In spite of this, if a person successfully overcomes all these problems and manages to reach the lake, he is overcome with sleep and lethargy as if he has some fever<sup>1</sup>. (1)

His heart becomes so numbed by foolishness and ignorance that it literally begins to develop signs of shivering that usually accompanies high fever<sup>2</sup>.

As a result of this perceived illness (shivering and drowsiness as if fever is coming on), this unfortunate person is deprived of the opportunity to take a bath in this sacred lake in spite of the fact that he has already reached it after striding so many difficulties found on the way<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>By the time the pilgrim reaches the holy lake he is so tired that he becomes sleepy. This means that even if one manages to actually hear this glorious story from some wise saint or read it under the guidance of such saint, he soon becomes bored, begins to yawn and becomes drowsy. It is a natural observation that when one does not find anything of great interest he begins to get bored, and this is manifested in the form of yawning and drowsiness.

<sup>2</sup>The traveller had endured so much difficulty to reach his destination. It is so stupid for him to waste his time by going to sleep there instead of doing what he is expected to do upon completion of the journey.

Similarly, the spiritual aspirant would be deemed to be a great fool if he becomes bored of reading and hearing the divine story of Lord Ram which he has managed to access due to some great good luck of his. It is not an ordinary story which one would read casually to pass time while commuting on a train or bus, or one that is read before going to bed at night so that it can induce sleep.

It is a holy and sacred story that has profound implications for the spiritual welfare of a person as it bestows upon him spiritual fulfilment and liberation to his soul, and so must not be treated lightly.

<sup>3</sup>The meaning is clear: A devotee needs a fresh and alert mind to fully benefit from the story of Ram Charit Manas. If he becomes inclined to doze off, it is futile for him to hear or read it.]

करि न जाइ सर मज्जन पाना । फिरि आवइ समेत अभिमाना ॥ ३ ॥
जौं बहोरि कोउ पूछन आवा । सर निंदा करि ताहि बुझावा ॥ ४ ॥

kari na jā'i sara majjana pānā. phiri āva'i samēta abhimānā. 3.
jaum bahōri kō'u pūchana āvā. sara nindā kari tāhi bujhāvā. 4.

Due to the above problems he is unable to bathe in this lake, so he returns and becomes proud of his spiritual achievement<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Then if someone comes to him to seek advice and his opinion about this lake (symbolised by the story of Lord Ram), this unfortunate person criticises the lake and discourages the would-be traveller (spiritual aspirant) not to take the trouble of making this journey (or hearing and reading this story)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>He proudly tells everyone that he has fully read this holy book, he has heard discourses on it, and he is fully conversant with it. But this is mere falsehood and obvious boast as he was sleeping all through.

It is just like the case of someone going on a long journey of pilgrimage to a holy place that entails a lot of money, planning, effort and dedication. But instead of devoting his mind on some spiritual theme at least for the time spent on this journey and while he was at the holy place, if a person spends this time on futile worldly talk or on merrily eating and drinking away, and then when he actually reaches the place he wraps himself in a blanket and goes off to sleep while his companions are performing their religious duties—what would be said of such a person if he comes back from this journey that was more of a picnic or a leisure trip for him than a true pilgrimage, and boasts about his spiritual fulfilment due to this religious journey? He would indeed be deceiving himself as well as his friends?

<sup>2</sup>This unfortunate and ill-fated person who found the story uninteresting would discourage other people and tell them that there is no good in reading or hearing it.

To wit, a true seeker should be wary of such persons.]

सकल बिघ्न व्यापहिं नहिं तेही । राम सुकृपाँ बिलोकहिं जेही ॥ ५ ॥
सोइ सादर सर मज्जनु करई । महा घोर त्रयताप न जरई ॥ ६ ॥

sakala bighna byāpahim nahim tēhī. rāma sukrpām' bilōkahim jēhī. 5.
sō'i sādara sara majjanu kara'ī. mahā ghōra trayatāpa na jara'ī. 6.

All the different obstacles hinted at in the aforesaid verses do not cause any hindrance for a devotee who is looked upon munificently by Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Only a soul who is fortunate enough to be graced by Lord Ram is able to (first successfully access this symbolic lake of spiritual nectar, and then) take a bath reverentially in this lake, and as a reward of this he is also not affected by the three legendary fires (or torments) that create immense misery for all living beings<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 28; (b) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 21; (c) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 30; (d) Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 46; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 48; (e) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 129.

All the above cited verses emphasise that when Lord Ram looks gracefully upon someone, all his miseries and troubles are dispelled.

<sup>2</sup>The three horrifying fires representing the different torments that create immense suffering and misery for all living beings are the following: ‘Adhyatmic’—those related to his spiritual well-being; ‘Adhbhaotic’—those related to the world and its inhabitants; and ‘Adhidaivic’—those related to opposed gods and stars.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 21 where it is said that these three fires have no effect in the reign of Lord Ram. To wit, wherever there is the shadow of Lord Ram’s grace and mercy, these three types of torments are vanquished automatically.

Even as a man who is scorched by the blazing sun finds intense pleasure and relief by taking a dip in a fresh water lake, a devotee who immerses himself in the story of Lord Ram, reading it, reciting it and preaching it to others, too derives immense bliss, solace and succour for his tormented soul that had been suffering from countless problems associated with life in this gross mundane world of transmigration. He is able to enjoy the freshness of the rejuvenated spirit, he is able to find bliss and happiness that had eluded him all his life prior to his accessing this symbolic lake representing the divine story of Lord Ram.

So therefore, though a devotee had heard and read the story in the beginning out of curiosity, he later on begins to love it and hold it dear to his heart and mind when he experiences spiritual ecstasy and a sense of blessedness got by this effort so much so that he begins to revere the sacred story of Lord Ram and adore it like one would worship a deity which fulfils all his wishes.]

jō nahā'i caha ēhim sara bhā'ī. sō satasaṅga kara'u mana lā'ī. 8.

Those men who have abiding faith, devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Ram, they do not leave this symbolic lake, no matter what the temptation or provocation is. (7)

Oh Brother! Those who wish to take a refreshing bath in this lake should endeavour to have company of pious and saintly souls<sup>1</sup>. (8)

bhaya'u hr̥dayam' ānanda uchāhū. umagē'u prēma pramōda prabāhū. 10.

When a wise, sagacious, self-realised and enlightened poet (kabi) saw this symbolic lake with his subtle eyes of wisdom and intellect, and when he took a dip in this lake (filled with nectar of bliss and beatitude), his mind was purified (of whatever remnants of evils and faults that had managed to cling to it till this point of time). (9)

His heart felt extremely exhilarated and thrilled, and a wave of delight, joy, bliss and beatitude surged in it<sup>1</sup>. (10) sarajū nāma sumaṅgala mūlā. lōka bēda mata maṅjula kūlā. 12.

When the thrilled and jubilant poet's heart overflowed with surging waves of emotional ecstasy and joy, he could not restrain himself so much so that his emotions spilled over and poured out from his exhilarated heart in the form of excellent poetry that symbolised a river of pristine pure water symbolising the divine story of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. (11)

This metaphoric river is called “River Saryu”<sup>2</sup> (that flows on the north-bank of the holy city of Ayodhya which was the capital city of Lord Ram when he took a human birth in the kingdom with the same name).

This river is holy and purifying, and it is a fountain of bliss and joy.

This symbolic river has two banks representing the secular view-point and the one from the perspective of the scriptures<sup>3</sup>. (12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this metaphor, Tulsidas talks about all the spiritually realised poets and bards who have sung the glorious story of Lord Ram known as Ram Charit Manas with the greatest of devotion and affection. Like a perennially flowing river that has its source in the higher reaches of the mighty mountains where glaciers are located, a river that descends from the high mountains and irrigates the dry plains below to provide joy and succour to one and all, and finally it ends in the ocean which awaits to embrace it along with all the creatures such as aquatic animals and plants that are present in its water, the story of Lord Ram makes its appearance in the Mana (mind and heart) of great sages and saints, then it reaches the common man who hears it from these exalted souls, deriving immense happiness and joy by doing so. Some of these fortunate ones dive deep in the water of this symbolic river, and when they find its waters to be nectar-like they prefer to remain in it forever instead of going on land that is dry and parched for water. So they swim along with the currents of this majestic river to find their final destiny in the form of liberation and deliverance of the soul when it merges with the Supreme Soul represented by Lord Ram.

Indeed, what a fascinating thing and wonderful scenario for a poet to imagine!

<sup>2</sup>The story of River Saryu: There are many versions of how river Saryu, which flows on the north of the holy city of Ayodhya where Lord Ram took birth and ruled as its great King, appeared on earth.

(a) According to Ananda Ramayan, Yatra Kand, Canto 4, the story briefly is as follows:- Once Lord Ram went to meet the great sage named Mudgal in his old hermitage, but on reaching there the Lord found that the sage had left it and now lives in somewhere else in another hermitage. The Lord went there and asked the sage why he had abandoned the previous hermitage.

The sage explained that he wanted to live at a place where the two holy rivers Ganges and Saryu exist together so that he can derive religious merit of bathing in both of them at the same time. Lord Ram wished to know about the importance of river Saryu and how it came down to earth.

The learned sage told the Lord that in some ancient time a demon named Shankhaasur had stolen the Vedas and hid them in the bottom of the ocean. Then Lord Vishnu, who is the primary form of Lord Ram, took the form of a great Fish and salvaged the Vedas after slaying the demon. Then Lord Vishnu reverted to his original form and felt so glad that tears of joy flowed from his eyes. These tears of joy fell down to form a river that flowed and collected in a lake known as Mansarovar somewhere in the bowls of the lofty mountains called Himalayas.

Just during that period of time, the great ancient King known as Vaivaswat Manu (after whom one cycle of creation known as a 'Manwantar' is named) decided to do a fire sacrifice. He sought the advice of his Guru (preceptor) who told him that if he intends to do the fire sacrifice then he must sanctify and purify the land by bringing the holy river Saryu from the Himalayas.

Hearing this, the King shot an arrow that pierced the wall of the mighty mountains that surrounded the Mansarovar Lake so that the waters of river Saryu gushed through the crevice and streamed down to the plains. This stream followed behind the arrow as it returned to the quiver of the King. It may have been that the stream of the river flowed through the groove made on the surface of the earth by the blazing arrow as it made its way through the plains and up the side of the mountain to reach the lake like some colossal caterpillar.

This river is called ‘Saryu’ as this name reminds one of its origin in a ‘lake’ which is called a ‘Sara’ in the local dialect, or because it was discovered by an arrow which is called ‘Shara’.

(b) According to Satyopaakhyaan, Canto 37, verse nos. 15-41, the story of river Saryu is as follows:- Once, King Dasrath of Ayodhya paid his obeisance to the holy river Saryu by composing a eight-verse hymn in her honour. The deity representing this river was pleased, and she revealed herself. Then the great king told her that as far as he knew, his Guru, sage Vasistha, had brought the river during the era of King Swayambhu Manu. But that is all he knew about the origin of the river. So he wanted to know more about it.

The patron deity of Saryu answered the king and told him the story behind the advent of this holy river on earth. It is this: In the beginning of creation when Brahma, the Creator, himself was born on the top of a lotus flower that emerged from the navel of the Supreme Being known as Viraat Purush, he was inspired to do Tapa (penance and austerity) to empower him to initiate the process of creation. Lord Vishnu, the Viraat Purush, was so pleased by Brahma’s Tapa that tears of joy flowed down his eyes. When Brahma saw these tears of blessing, he immediately collected them in his Kamandalu (the wooden water-pot he carried). Brahma realized that this water (tears of Vishnu) is very rare, and since it was shed personally by the Lord it is to be revered and worshipped as a direct blessing of the Lord. So Brahma created a lake by employing the creative powers of his mind for safekeeping of this holy and sanctified water. Since this lake was the result of Brahma’s mind, and also perhaps because this ‘lake’ symbolized the emotion of love and devotion for Lord Vishnu that he had in his heart, the lake was called ‘Mansarovar’—the lake (“sarovar”) having its origin in the ‘Mana’ (mind and heart).

Brahma then poured the contents of the water-pot into it, and appointed a sage named Manjukesha to guard it.

Later on, the great King Ikshwaku, one of the forefathers of Lord Ram, requested his Guru sage Vasistha to bring this holy water for him. Vasistha prayed to Manjukesha and sought his permission to take the river to the plains where Ayodhya was located. The sage granted his permission and told Vasistha that first he must bathe in the lake, and then a stream of water would follow the direction he takes. Sage Vasistha took a holy dip in its water, and moved in the direction of Ayodhya which lay to the south. So a stream of water from the Mansarovar Lake followed him as he walked back to the kingdom of Ayodhya. This is how the river reached this holy city.

<sup>3</sup>This statement means that the story of Lord Ram, known as the epic ‘Ram Charit Manas’, is approached by people in two different ways, depending on their spiritual attitude, outlook and objective. One approach is the secular one whereby the reader treats it as a historical or mythological narration of some ancient event. This approach makes them regard Lord Ram as being a great and noble King of a certain ancient kingdom known by the name of Ayodhya, and then with this view-point they read the rest of the story.

The other perspective is in light of what the scriptures say of Lord Ram—that he was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, who is also known as the ‘Viraat Purush’, the almighty cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as Brahm. Lord Ram came down to earth in a human form to fulfil certain obligations that he had as the ‘Lord of Creation’. Hence, he was a visible and easily accessible form of the Supreme Being who is primarily invisible as well as beyond the reach of the senses and the mind-intellect complex.

For a spiritual aspirant, the second approach is what bears fruits.]

nadī punīta sumānasa nandini. kalimala tṛṇa taru mūla nikandini. 13.

This holy and purifying river is the ‘daughter of an auspicious lake’<sup>1</sup> (known as the Mansarovar Lake). It is powerful and strong enough to uproot the sins, small or big, that are so common in the era of Kaliyug like any great river that would snatch and carry with its swift currents the twigs and small plants found obstructing its path<sup>2</sup>. (13)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The river Saryu is called a ‘daughter of the lake’ because it has its origin in it. We have other instances where one is assigned a name that reflects one’s origin. For instance, goddess Parati, the consort of Lord Shiva, is often called ‘Girija’ as she was born in the Himalaya Mountains. Sita, the consort of Lord Ram, is called ‘Jaanki’ as she was the daughter of King Janak.

The three types of listeners<sup>1</sup> of this story are the various villages, hamlets and towns that are found on the two banks of this holy river.

The exalted community of saints and pious people where this story is read and recited with great devotion and due reverence, where its verses constantly reverberate in all the directions, is the symbolic holy city of Ayodhya (on the north of which this holy river Saryu flows). (Doha no. 39)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The three types of listeners are the following: (i) those who have already attained self-realisation; (ii) those who are striving to attain self-realisation; and (iii) those who are not interested in spiritual pursuits as they are tempted by the senses.

This holy river (Saryu), with its purifying water, symbolizes all meritorious deeds and goodness that a devotee of the Lord possesses as it goes to and merges with the holy river Ganges<sup>1</sup> symbolized by Bhakti (devotion) for Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (1)

The fame and glory that Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman attained in the great war and the battles they engaged in<sup>3</sup> are like the two great rivers known as Mahanadi and Sona<sup>4</sup> acquiring fame when they fall in river Ganges and merge with it (because then they are no longer ordinary rivers but are deemed to be revered and holy like the sacred river Ganges)*.

[*There is another way of interpreting this verse. It may be read as: “The fame and glory that Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman attained in the great war and the battles they engaged in are like the great river (mahānadu) Sona<sup>5</sup> acquiring fame as one of the most revered rivers in the land when it falls and merges with the holy river Ganges.”] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>River Saryu is believed to be the daughter of sage Vasistha, the royal Guru or preceptor of the kings of Ayodhya, including Lord Ram, while river Ganges is said to be the daughter of king Bhagirath who brought it down from heaven by his Tapa (penances) in order to liberate the souls of the sons of king Sagar.

Now, Vasistha was a Brahmin and a Guru, while Bhagirath was a King and Kshatriya by birth. Even as a King's daughter welcomes a Brahmin's daughter and embraces her, river Ganges receives river Saryu and symbolically embraces her by allowing the latter to merge with it.

Second reason is this: River Saryu has its origin in the eyes of Lord Vishnu, as tears, while river Ganges originates in the feet of the Lord in the form of water used to wash the holy feet of the Lord. It is natural for water from a higher plain to go down to meet another source of water lower down. So therefore, it is but natural for river Saryu, having its origin in the eye of Lord Vishnu to flow down and fall into the stream that owes its origin in the holy feet of the Lord.

The third reason of merger of Saryu with Ganges is narrated in Anand Ramayan, Yatra Kand, verse nos. 95-98 which says that on the orders of Lord Ram, his brother Laxman used his arrow to bring river Saryu and make it fall in river Ganges for the benefit of sage Mudgal who had his hermitage in the Himalayas, in the area where the holy site known as Badri was situated.

Regarding the origin of rivers Saryu and Ganges, there is a story in Skanda Puran, Reva Khand, that says that once Manu, the ancestor of the human race, performed a fire sacrifice on the banks of river Narmada in the pilgrim site known as Tripuri Tirtha. Upon successful completion of the fire sacrifice, the deity of Narmada was pleased by Manu and asked him to request for a boon. Manu sought that all the holy rivers in heaven should descend on earth and come to purify the land. The deity granted his wishes and said that first Ganges would be brought to earth by the efforts of king Bhagirath in the beginning of Treta Yuga, the era when Lord Ram came down to earth, and the other holy rivers such as Yamuna, Saraswati, Saryu and Gandak would follow.

<sup>2</sup>There are two ways of interpreting this verse in relation with the analogy of river Saryu's merger with river Ganges and Lord Ram's devotee attaining devotion for the Lord, as follows:

(i) Just like the river Saryu that meanders through difficult terrain and unclean land, overcoming all sorts of obstacles and not paying attention to all sorts of impurities that continuously fall in its water all along the way till it reaches its final destination, which is river Ganges, where it falls into it and merges with its holy waters to become one and indistinguishable with the river Ganges, so likewise is the case with devotees of Lord Ram, for they lead a pious and meritorious life, doing all sorts of good and noble deeds with the sole aim to attain devotion for Lord Ram, and towards this end move on diligently, overcoming all obstacles and resisting all temptations that come in their way, attempting to divert their attention from their objective and leading them astray from their destination. None of the impurities and disturbances of the world around them affect them; they remain as pure and calm as the water of river Saryu in which all sorts of impurities and rubbish are dumped, but it moves on calmly towards river Ganges.

The idea here is this: Even as the holiness and purity of river Saryu is not compromised by the various types of rubbish that fall in its water, the holiness and purity of the soul of the devotee too is not affected by the grossness of the surrounding world around him, and even as the river Saryu maintains its sanctity inspite of all the nuisance it has to encounter on its way to river Ganges, the devotee too pays no heed to the countless distractions he faces in his spiritual journey towards attaining devotion for Lord Ram.

Further, like the case of river Saryu having its final destination in river Ganges considered as the holiest of all rivers, and with this merger river Saryu cleanses itself of all the impurities that have been falling in its water all along its journey through the land, and it too becomes as holy as the river Ganges when it merges with the latter, so is the case with the devotee of Lord Ram, for when he attains devotion for the Lord and receives the Lord's grace and blessings then all his previous impurities represented by his numerous faults and shortcoming and blemishes are washed off, and the devotee becomes exemplarily holy and pure. This is the culmination of his spiritual journey and the reward of all the good deeds and pious efforts he had been making all along in his life.

(ii) Another way of interpreting this verse is that like river Saryu which has acquired merit by the virtue of it being near the city of Ayodhya where Lord Ram took birth and lived, a devotee of Lord Ram acquires fame and merit by the virtue of his or her having devotion for the Lord which grants the reward of the Lord's blessings and grace.

<sup>3</sup>Obviously, the 'war' referred to here is the epic War of Lanka, and the 'battles' to the many independent duels which the two brothers fought together with the demons. This Great War of Lanka is described in Lanka Kand of this book Ram Charit Manas.

The battle that the two brothers fought together was at the time of protection of the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, where they defeated the formidable army of demons Marich and Subahu. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 210.}

Wars are not something worth lauding and have no relation with spirituality; they are always bloody and painful. So, how and why did the War of Lanka and the battles fought by Lord Ram and Laxman gave them good fame; why are these wars and battles called holy?

Well, the answer is this: these wars were fought not for usual worldly reasons for which kings and emperors fight wars—such as expansion of their kingdoms, destroying their enemies to usurp their land, and such other reasons driven by greed and rapacity for power, authority and dominion. The two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, fought the War of Lanka and other independent battles with the sole purpose of eliminating the scourge of the demons and end their reign of tyranny which they had unleashed on this earth. The War of Lanka and the other individual battles fought by Lord Ram and Laxman were done to fulfill the promise made by Lord Vishnu to the gods and mother earth that he would himself come down to earth to eliminate the cruel demons and the terror they had spread on earth. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187.}

The War of Lanka and the Battle with the ferocious army of demons Marich and Subahu were fought by Lord Ram and Laxman against evil forces represented by the cruel and sinful demons. The battle with Marich and Subahu was fought to protect the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, and the war of Lanka was undertaken to eliminate the tyranny of the demons led by their ferocious and cruel king Ravana who had unleashed a reign of terror on earth.

Besides this, this war and battle led to the deliverance of the souls of the demons, leading to their emancipation and salvation, for otherwise they were so sinful that there was no chance of them ever finding peace for their souls. {This is clearly mentioned on different occasions in Ram Charit Manas: for instance, (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 209; (ii) Aranya Kand, Doha no. 20 (a); (iii) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precedes Doha no. 45; and Chaupai line nos. 7 and 9-10 that precede Doha no. 114.}

The current of these two rivers, Sona and Mahanad or Gandak, is very swift, and the rivers are very dangerous when in spate. This is the case with wars and battles too: developments are very swift, unpredictable and dangerous. But in the end these wars and battles fought by Lord Ram and Laxman proved a boon for the souls of the demons just like the fate of river Sona and Gandak, because they became holy at the time of their merger with river Ganges.]

<sup>4</sup>Here, the fame of Lord Ram is like the great river Mahanadi, and that of Laxman as river Sona. The river Sona has its origin in the region of Amarkantak in the state of Madhya Pradesh in India and flows east to merge with river Ganges in the state of Bihar at a place near the city of Danapur. The ancient kingdom of Magadha was established on its banks. The other ‘great river’ associated with Ganges as well as Saryu simultaneously is river Gandak, for Saryu merges in Gandak before finally falling into Ganges. This Gandak river originates in the mountains of Himalayas in Nepal, and during its flow down the plains many smaller rivers and streams merge with it till it reaches Ganges and merges itself with the latter near Patna, the capital city of the state of Bihar.

<sup>5</sup>The word ‘mahānadu’ means the “Great River”, and when it is used before the name of a river, in this case river Sona, it becomes an adjective for this river—meaning that the river Sona is a ‘great river’. The reason is this: The bed of river Sona becomes extremely wide when it reaches the plains of the state of Bihar, where it spreads over 2-3 miles in width. During rainy season, it appears to be like an ocean—stretching till the horizon if one looks at it from either of its two banks. Hence, the epithet ‘great river’ is apt to be applied to it, for no other river has this spread.

From ancient times, i.e. from the time Purans were composed, India is said to have the following seven rivers that are considered sacred as they fostered great civilizations and nestled life along their banks: Kshonbhadra (another name of river Sona), Sindhu, Brahmaputra, Satlaj, Jhelum, Ghaghara, and Vyas. These rivers gave the name of the country as the ‘land of seven rivers’. {Refer: Amarkosh 2/5/4.}

त्रिबिध ताप त्रासक तिमुहानी । राम सरूप सिंधु समुहानी ॥ ४ ॥

juga bica bhagati dēvadhuni dhārā. sōhati sahita subirati bicārā. 3.
tribidha tāpa trāsaka timuhānī. rāma sarūpa sindhu samuhānī. 4.

Between the two virtues of ‘Gyan’ (gnosis; realization and true knowledge of the ‘self’; in-depth understanding of metaphysics as enunciated in the Upanishads) and ‘Vairagya’ (renunciation, dispassion, detachment, non-involvement in gross worldly affairs), which are symbolized by the two rivers Sona and Saryu respectively, flows the holy stream of the river Ganges (the river of gods—“dēvadhuni dhārā”) representing the virtue of ‘Bhakti’ (devotion, that leads to the deliverance, salvation and emancipation of the soul)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

These three streams (rivers Sona, Saryu and Ganges, representing Gyan, Vairagya and Bhakti respectively) are very soothing, and they provide succour from the three types of sufferings of the devotee<sup>2</sup> as he steadily moves in the direction of his destination—i.e. attaining nearness with Lord Ram<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this analogy, river Sona represents Gyan; river Saryu represents Vairagya; and river Ganges represents Bhakti. To wit, when these three excellent virtues work together in tandem in a person, he becomes a perfect soul, one who is as divine and holy as any god, and is transformed into a personified form of the Supreme Being himself. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 44; and Uttar Kand, Doha no. 100 which echo this idea.

The imagery is wonderful indeed: river Saryu travels in the south direction from the north; river Sona from the south towards the north direction; and river Ganges from the west towards the east direction. To wit, spirituality and its reward in the form of deliverance, emancipation and salvation consists of joint effort of these three stellar virtues—Gyan, Vairagya and Bhakti. It’s a Tripod for attaining stability and peace in this world; it’s like a Triumvirate that makes the person who practices them the real Emperor in life.

Since Bhakti is placed in between the other two virtues of Gyan and Vairagya, and rivers are used to represent them, it means that just like the case of a river having two banks from where a person accesses the water of that river, the virtue of Bhakti is easily attained when one practices Gyan and Vairagya.

It also means that both Gyan and Vairagya lead to Bhakti, and if Bhakti is not attained then the two other virtues are useless, just like the case of a person deriving real benefit of going to a river when he actually reaches its water and dips in it to take a bath and clean himself, but if he just stands on its banks and stares at the water of the river he benefits nothing. To wit, merely having Gyan and Vairagya would lead the devotee nowhere if he has no Bhakti in him.

<sup>2</sup>These three types of sufferings are called ‘Tritaap’. They are the following: Daihik—sufferings related to the body such as diseases; Daivik—sufferings caused by angry gods and stars; and Bhautik—sufferings caused by things associated with life in this gross world. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 21.}

<sup>3</sup>The aim of all spiritual practices undertaken by a devotee of Lord Ram is to attain the Lord and find nearness with him. This verse says that if a devotee has these three virtues in him, i.e. if he practices Gyan, Vairagya and Bhakti, then he is sure to reach his destination, he is sure to be successful in his spiritual practices.]

बिच बिच कथा बिचित्र बिभागा । जनु सरि तीर तीर बन बागा ॥ ६ ॥ mānasa mūla milī surasarihī. sunata sujana mana pāvana karihī. 5.

bica bica kathā bicitra bibhāgā. janu sari tīra tīra bana bāgā. 6.

Having its source (place of origin) in the sacred Manas Lake<sup>1</sup>, and its destination in the holy river Ganges in which it merges, the symbolic holy river Saryu representing the glories and fame of Lord Ram purifies the mind and the heart of those pious and noble souls who listen<sup>2</sup> to the divine story of the Lord. (5)

The many interesting tales and fascinating episodes that are interspersed here and there in the story of Ram Charit Manas and narrated as part of it<sup>3</sup>, are like the many gardens and groves and forests that are found on the banks of the river Saryu all along its course<sup>4</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this analogy, the story of Lord Ram is represented by river Saryu, and the comfort and pleasure one gets by taking a bath in the cool and clean waters of the river are compared to the spiritual peace and solace that one derives by listening to this holy story.

Again, even as river Saryu heads towards river Ganges and merges with the latter to become inseparable from it, a devotee of Lord Ram who listens to this holy story too attains nearness with Lord Ram, and at the time of his death his soul merges with the Lord’s supreme Soul to become one with it.

It is believed that the river Saryu has its origin in the Mansarovar Lake near Mt. Kailash which is the terrestrial abode of Lord Shiva. The divine story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, the present book we are reading, had been conceptualized in the ‘Mana’, i.e. the mind and heart, of Lord Shiva during his meditative sessions. The Mana of Lord Shiva is regarded as a ‘lake’ because it is from this place that the divine story of Lord Ram had first emerged. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.}

Thence, this symbolic river of Lord Ram’s holy story spread across the world much like a physical river that has its origin in a lake situated in the higher reaches of a mountain glacier, from where the water flows out in a stream and cascades down the mountain to reach the plains below and form a mighty river that irrigates the land and nestles great civilizations. Similarly, the divine story of Lord Ram took the symbolic form of river Saryu and spread across the land to provide solace and succour to all those who would come to the banks of this river and take a dip in its soothing, cool and clean water, i.e. all those who would listen to this holy and divine story of Lord Ram would be able to overcome all sufferings that torment them in this world.

These sufferings are the three listed in verse no. 4 herein above.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, the story of Lord Ram has such great mystical powers that those who listen to it are made pure, pious and noble in a natural way just like the case of one taking a dip in the waters of river Saryu that would automatically make him feel fresh and rejuvenated by its cool, soothing waters.

<sup>3</sup>As we move along reading Ram Charit Manas, we shall find that a number of episodes that are not directly related to the story of the life and time of Lord Ram are narrated in the book. The holy book of Ram Charit Manas will still retain its holiness, divinity and charm if these random episodes are removed from the main text, but their inclusion adds more wonder and enhances the interest of the reader, they serve the purpose of embellishment just like ornaments worn by a beautiful lady, for the lady's grace and charm would in no way be less if she hadn't worn these ornaments, but these add-ons on her body help to serve the purpose of increasing the charm of her person.

Another example is this: If a picture is inherently beautiful and stunning, its appeal and charm are inherent and natural to it and the value of the picture does not depend on any external factor, but if the same picture is mounted on a beautiful frame or stand then obviously its appeal and value are enhanced many times.

Now, let us cite some instances of episodes that are not directly related to the story telling of the Ramayana but are included in this book Ram Charit Manas by way of embellishment to it:

One such episode is of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati. It is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 60—to Doha no. 103.

Another episode is that of king Pratapbhanu and his getting cursed to become a demon—it is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 153—to Doha no. 175.

Yet another story pertains to delusions that overcame sage Narad where he cursed Lord Vishnu to become a human being—it is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 124—to Doha no. 139.

Then there is the story of king Manu and his wife Satrupa doing Tapa (penances) as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142—to Doha no. 152.

In all these instances we will observe that even if they were not included in the main text of Ram Charit Manas its narrative or beauty wouldn't have been diminished or compromised in the least, but their inclusion only makes the reading more interesting and informative.

<sup>4</sup>Suppose one takes a boat ride and cruises on the river Saryu from one point to another. The journey would look dull and boring if the landscape on either banks of the river had the same dull and monotonous contour, but if the landscape changed colours and contours, once presenting the scene of a forest or a garden, then a green field, then a small village, then a vibrant city, then a desert, then a hill and a mountain, then an island far away, sometime lonely stretches of the bank are seen and then comes into sight a harbour with ships and boats docking and undocking, and at some places along the bank are seen people bathing and carrying on with their routine life—naturally these changes are fascinating and would make the cruise interesting, and the tourist would flock on the deck of their boat in order not to miss anything unique that hoooves unexpectedly into sight on the horizon.

Likewise, these small isolated episodes and tales inserted here and there in the main narrative of Ram Charit Manas keep the story interesting for the reader.]

उमा महेस बिबाह बराती । ते जलचर अगनित बहुभाँती ॥ ७ ॥

रघुबर जनम अनंद बधाई । भवँर तरंग मनोहरताई ॥ ८ ॥

umā mahēsa bibāha barātī. tē jalacara aganita bahubhāmṭī. 7.

raghubara janama ananda badhāī. bhavamṛa taraṅga manōharatāī. 8.

The instance of the many members of the bridegroom's party that attended the marriage of Lord Shiva with goddess Uma (also known as Parvati)<sup>1</sup> are like the many kinds of aquatic animals that live in the waters of river Saryu. (7)

The narrative of the joy and ceremony that attended the birth of Lord Ram and described in this book<sup>2</sup> is like the many charming eddy currents and waves that abound in this river (Saryu). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 60—to Doha no. 103.

The members of the procession that accompanied Lord Shiva as he went to wed goddess Uma were all sorts of ghosts and phantoms, who were terrifying to behold with unseemly faces and hideous bodies, because Shiva is their deity as the Lord presides over death. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 93 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede it.}

Here such odd and terrifying forms are cited to imply that a devotee may encounter all sorts of people who may terrify him and torment him, but he must remember that they will do him no harm as long as he is headed towards Lord Ram and pays his obeisance to Lord Shiva to thank the latter for making this holy story of Lord Ram available to the world.

Other such pleasant episodes can be recalled here as well. For example, the celebrations that attended the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 285—to Doha no. 289 for instance.

Then there is the narration of celebrations in Ayodhya when Lord Ram came back from the forest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 9.

Such pleasant episodes represent the charm of the many currents and waves that are present in river Saryu.]

The frolics, pranks and playful activities of the four divine brothers (Lord Ram and his three siblings, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan) during their childhood days<sup>1</sup> are like the many lotus flowers of various hues<sup>2</sup> that bloom in this symbolic lake called 'Manas' (i.e. the heart and mind of a devotee of Lord Ram, from where the story of Lord Ram emerges), as well as the river named Saryu (which symbolizes the spreading of this divine story far and wide in this world).

The noble deeds and spiritual merits accumulated by king Dasrath and his queens (who were the parents of the four divine brothers) are like the many bees that hover over the lotus flowers, while those of other family members and relations are like the many water-birds that flock around these lotus flowers to derive immense pleasure by being in close proximity to the latter<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 40)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 198—to Doha no. 205 where a broad outline of the playful activities and the carefree days of the four brothers during their childhood have been described, along with the immense joy and pleasure the four brothers gave to their parents as well as all those who were present at that time, such as the members of the royal household, their friends, and the ordinary citizens of Ayodhya.

<sup>2</sup>There are said to be four types of lotus flowers depending upon the colour of their petals: grey-coloured, red-coloured, pink-coloured, and yellow tinged petals. There are four brothers too, i.e. Lord Ram, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan, so four types of lotus flowers have been cited in this analogy so that the comparison fits in well.

<sup>3</sup>The honey bee is extremely fascinated with and enamoured of the lotus flower; it hovers over the flower and its attention is fixed on it. To wit, the bee derives immense pleasure while being in the proximity of the lotus flower, and it would not think of going away from the flower. Likewise, the parents and other family members of the four brothers loved them so much that they kept the children's company as much as was possible, feeling overjoyed and thoroughly enjoying their playful activities.

Like the bee, other water birds too flock around the lotus flower blooming in a lake or a pond, and these water birds cheerfully frolic around the flower in merry abundance.

In this context, the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, are very relevant and specific: (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 198; (ii) Doha no. 199; (iii) Doha no. 200 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 7-8 that precede it; (iv) Doha no. 203 along with Chaupai line nos. 1, 4-8 that precede it; (v) Doha no. 204; (vi) Doha no. 205 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede it.

The basic idea in this Doha is that the childhood playful activities of Lord Ram and his brothers are so fascinating and captivating for the mind and the heart that they give immense joy and pleasure to the Lord's devotees who remember them and sing about them as a means of remembrance of their beloved Lord Ram and remaining submerged in his thoughts.]

The pleasant and captivating story of the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram<sup>1</sup> represents the magnificent aura of charm and beauty that spreads over the waters of the holy river Saryu. (1)

The many questions that are asked with regard to the different episodes and details of the divine story of Lord Ram are like the many boats floating on the river Saryu, while convincing answers that settle all doubts and remove perplexities in the mind of the seeker of truth and help him understand the reality are like the skilled boatmen who row these boats and help the latter reach the other shore safely inspite of the turbulence in the river and the many unexpected obstacles that are encountered on the way<sup>2</sup>. (2)

<sup>2</sup>The story of Lord Ram appears to be the fascinating story of a great King, but the fact is that the Lord was not an ordinary human being as his physical appearances gave the impression about him, for he was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being.

In Ram Charit Manas there are many examples where Lord Ram's worldly activities had bewildered those who saw him act like an ordinary human being, provoking them to ask questions about his authenticity. One example is that of goddess Uma, the consort of Lord Shiva, who was so confused about the true identity of Lord Ram that she requested her husband to tell her in detail the truth of the Lord and why he behaved in an ordinary way. The answer that Lord Shiva gave to Uma forms the background of the revelation of the holy book Ram Charit Manas which we are reading at present. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 113; and Uttar Kand, Doha no. 125-b—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 130.

The other example is that of Garud, the celestial vehicle of Lord Vishnu himself, who too was vexed by Lord Ram's worldly behaviour. He went to the saintly crow Kaagbhusund and asked many questions pertaining to the divinity of Lord Ram as well as about many spiritual principles. Kaagbhusund patiently answered each query and completely satisfied Garud, who felt highly obliged to the saintly crow for giving him peace and settling all his doubts. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 58—to Doha no. 125-a.}

Yet another example is that of Guha, the chief of the boatman community, who asked Laxman why Lord Ram had to suffer so much if he were the manifested form of the Supreme Lord. Laxman's answer to him forms the 'Laxman Geeta' of Ram Charit Manas. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 90—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 94.}

King Janak too was perplexed when he first met Lord Ram, and he had asked sage Vishwamitra to enlighten him about the truth, which the sage indeed did. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 214—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 217.}

On many occasions such questions and answers had immense spiritual import—such as the case when Lord Ram asked sage Valmiki to tell him the place where he can live during his forest exile. The sage's answer is an excellent one—for he outlines all the qualities that a devotee of Lord Ram must possess, for then the Lord would reside in his heart. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 126—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 132.}

In a similar fashion, there are many other instances of questions being asked and answers being given with respect to different spiritual and metaphysical principles that help to remove all doubts in the mind of a seeker of truth.

In this analogy, the questions are compared to a boat and the answers to the boatman who rows the boat and takes it safely to the other bank of the river, because just like an expert boatman who knows the tricks of his trade and can safely transport the passenger to the other side as he is well versed about the nature of the river, its currents, its depth, its whirlpools, the obstacles that one may encounter while crossing it, its behaviour during the time when it is in spate as well as when it is calm, and how to row a boat safely across its waters all round the year like the back of his hand, a wise teacher too would satisfy all doubts in the mind of a devotee of Lord Ram by answering his questions in a convincing and logical manner, thereby giving him peace of mind and reinforcing his faith in Lord Ram.

If the answers are not satisfactory, they will rock the boat of the devotee's faith and devotion for Lord Ram, and ruin the prospects of his spiritual enlightenment.

The story of Lord Ram is like the 'boat' because it helps the devotee attain his spiritual destination easily and with the least effort, but the many doubts that arise in his mind regarding Lord Ram and his divinity, about the truth of the story and its ability to grant him spiritual peace and beatitude, are like the violent turbulence in the river, its rapid currents and swirling whirlpools, as well as the many big and small obstacles that lie in the river that together can rock the boat and drown the devotee midstream. Hence, the answers that are given by wise men to settle all doubts in the mind of the devotee are like the skilled boatman as he deftly negotiates all hurdles and safely takes the boat to the other side of the river.

If a river is known to be rough and turbulent by its nature, then everyone would like that they are taken across by boatmen who are experts in their profession; no one would board a boat rowed by a novice as it is highly dangerous and risky. Likewise, wise devotees would always seek answers to their questions from learned teachers of the story of Lord Ram, and not from any random person because the latter would more often mislead the devotee by erroneous answers.]

सुनि अनुकथन परस्पर होई । पथिक समाज सोह सरि सोई ॥ ३ ॥

sunī anukathana paraspara hō'ī. pathika samāja sōha sari sō'ī. 3.
ghōra dhāra bhr̥gunātha risānī. ghāṭa subad'dha rāma bara bānī. 4.

After hearing the divine story of Lord Ram, the listeners gather together in groups to discuss it, ask questions and answer them amongst themselves, and in general help to spread the holy story and its spiritual message far and wide—such listeners are like the travelers and passengers of the boats (mentioned in the previous verse no. 2 herein above) who cross the symbolic river (represented by the story of Lord Ram as narrated in 'Ram Charit Manas') and reach the other side to go on towards their destinations<sup>1</sup>. (3)

In this story (of Ram Charit Manas), the episode that describes the angry outburst of sage Parashuram is like the furious current in the river, while the calm and peaceful response of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup> that ultimately diffused all tensions and succeeded in making the wrathful sage surrender before the Lord and seek forgiveness for his impertinent behaviour is like the strongly built and firms steps, known as 'Ghats', on the banks of this symbolic river<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Those who seek spiritual peace and deliverance, those who seek emancipation and salvation, those who wish to be granted grace by the Lord God, come to this symbolic 'river' represented by the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas. They hear it patiently—and the time spent by them hearing it and having their queries answered by the boatman is the time spent on the 'boat' to cross the river to the other side. When they disembark and step on the ground on the other bank of this symbolic river to resume their journey onwards, they are now so happy and contented that they have overcome the many obstacles they had faced in their spiritual journey, obstacles that are represented by the many complexities of the story that had filled them with doubt and confusions, and which were like the turbulent river that they had to cross in order to move ahead towards their destination. The 'boatman' is the wise teacher who has removed all their doubts and enlightened them about the Truth.

What is the importance of discussions and debates, of asking questions and answering them? Well, this process makes the subject very interesting as it involves all concerned; it also confirms that those who listen to the story have paid attention to its details, because it is only then they would ask specific questions and thoroughly discuss the answers. Otherwise, without a question-answer session, it cannot be ascertained if anyone has actually taken interest in the story, and whether he has correctly understood it without distortions.

Travelers come to a river and get on board a boat to cross to the other side to continue with their journey towards their destinations. While on the boat they are entertained by the boatman who tells them an extremely interesting story which completely absorbs the mind of the passengers and keeps them enthralled. They listen to it with immense interest and pay great attention to the details of the story, asking pertinent questions and getting satisfying answers from the boatman. The story they hear leave a lasting impression on their minds and makes an indelible mark on their sub-consciousness so much so that when they reach the other side of the river they thank the boatman for what he had told them, and the subject matter of the story they had heard now becomes a point of discussion amongst them as they continue with their journey further on. When these travelers reach their destination, they tell others of what they had heard, because this story had mesmerized them and had given them immense peace, joy and happiness. This is how the story spreads by the word-of-mouth to far flung places on the land.

This imagery has been used here too. Those who listen to the divine story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas first hear it out of curiosity and its novelty factor, but sooner rather than later they are mesmerized by its charm and beauty as well as by the spiritual peace and joy that the story naturally provides to the listener. Surely they have certain questions to ask, because many episodes need further clarifications and the hidden spiritual message needs to be explained. So they approach a wise teacher who apprises them of the finer nuances of the story, answering their questions and setting all doubts to rest. The ordinary listener, who was till now skeptical, now transforms into a devotee who is so firmly convinced of the holiness and authenticity of the story as well as the divinity of Lord Ram, its chief protagonist, that he cannot forget it, and retelling this story to others and spreading its divine spiritual message gives this devotee immense pleasure and satisfaction, some even making this task a mission of their lives as it would benefit a lot of other people who do not have the privilege that the devotee himself has had.

It can be a single devotee or a group of devotees; they are like the passengers who have crossed the river of doubts and skepticism to land on solid ground on the other side, so happy and fulfilled that they thank their stars at having had the opportunity to meet the boatman who not only told them a fascinating story, but who also answered all their queries, and gave them a treasure that would grant them eternal happiness and peace which they will cherish for the rest of their lives.

Sage Parashuram was renowned for his short temper and wrathfulness. When he heard that Lord Ram had broken the old bow belonging to Lord Shiva, sage Parashuram became furious and rushed to the venue to punish the Lord. He shouted and hopped around mad with anger, vowing to cut off the head of Lord Ram and his brother Laxman to revenge the breaking of the old bow. But Lord Ram never lost his cool; he was politeness personified, asking the sage to calm down and take it easy. After fretting and fuming a lot, when all his suppressed anger was vented out like steam escaping from the spout of a kettle, Parashuram was crestfallen, regretting his behaviour and becoming mellowed like a true sage should be.

Lord Ram's calmness and peaceful behaviour is compared to the 'solid and well built steps on the banks of the river' because this attitude gives firmness of mind and steadiness in the steps of an aspirant and a seeker of truth who moves ahead steadily and calmly on his spiritual journey. On the other hand, anger and loss of composure are like slippery ground where a person is not sure of his stand, and an angry man is more apt to make mistakes than a person who approaches an issue with a cool head.]

The grand festivities and abundance of merriment that accompanied the marriage of Lord Ram and his brothers (Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan)<sup>1</sup> are like the cool and soothing waters of this symbolic river (represented by the story of Ram Charit Manas) that overflows its banks during the rainy season to wet large stretches of land all around it and making it fertile, and which gives pleasure to one and all even during normal times<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Those persons who feel joyous and happy by reading this story (of Ram Charit Manas) are the ones who have truly derived the pleasure and reward of taking a bath in this symbolic river (Saryu)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 285—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 355.

<sup>2</sup>The narration of the marriage of Lord Ram and his three brothers is an occasion for celebration and joy. This episode is beautifully narrated in Ram Charit Manas; it captivates the mind and enthralls the heart. It is like the case of a tired person coming to a river to refresh himself with its cool and clean water: he takes a bath in the river, sips its sweet and cool water, lies down on its banks to relax, and feels refreshed and rejuvenated. Similarly, the episode of Lord Ram's marriage is very heart-warming; its narrative is in the form of a beautiful poetry that is nothing less than nectar for the heart.

The flood of a river is useful for the land around it as it wets and softens the soil, making it fertile and useful for the next crop. Likewise, the charming story of Lord Ram's and his brothers' marriage is so exhilarating and full of merry excitement that it fills the reader with ecstasy, which is akin to a river overflowing its banks during the rainy season.

<sup>3</sup>The story of Ram Charit Manas has been compared to the river Saryu, and the pleasure and joy one gets by reading it and listening to it is likened to the pleasure one gets by taking a refreshing bath in the cool waters of river Saryu. Both are rejuvenating and refreshing—one the spirit and the other for the body respectively.]

The huge assembly of people representing all walks of life (such as the citizens of Ayodhya, the monkeys, bears and demon friends of Lord Ram who came with him aboard the plane from Lanka, the large number of sages, seers, saints and ascetics who came to bless the Lord, the invited princes and nobles of the realm, etc.), and the mass celebrations that were organized at the time of coronation of Lord Ram as the King-Emperor of Ayodhya<sup>1</sup>—they represent the large crowd of travelers who have arrived on the banks of this symbolic river from all corners of the realm when they heard of its rare beauty and singular charm, as well as of its mystical ability to remove weariness, provide solace, and grant refreshment, rejuvenation and immense pleasure to all those who come to take a bath in its waters<sup>2</sup>. (7)

On the other hand, the evil and selfish nature as well as the corrupted mind of Kaikeyi that prevented Lord Ram from being anointed as the prince-regent of Ayodhya and forcing him to go to the forest (for 14 years)<sup>3</sup> is like the moss and scum that gather on the bank of the river, not only polluting the surrounding water but also causing stink and filth on the banks, making it revolting for the senses of those who come to the river<sup>4</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 10—Doha no. 12-a; and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 15—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 16.

<sup>2</sup>When the good news spreads about a certain river or pond or lake or spring having some unique quality, such as the healing powers of their waters as it often is the case with hot-water springs, or about their natural beauty, or any other factor that makes them unique and different from other such water bodies, large numbers of people flock to them, overcoming all obstacles and inconveniences.

Likewise, as soon as the glory of Lord Ram was established by his devotees who first convinced themselves about the divinity of the Lord, and then spread the good news far and wide to the places they visited and traveled to, large numbers of people, spiritual aspirants and seekers of deliverance, as well as the laity and ordinary people, were motivated to come and hear this divine story of Ram Charit Manas, and benefit from it.

<sup>3</sup>This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 29.

<sup>4</sup>It is the most reprehensible episode in the whole story, more so because, surprisingly, Kaikeyi used to love Lord Ram as much as she loved her own son Bharat. But driven by wrong advice given by her trusted maid Manthara, and also driven by selfishness and corrupted intellect, she played the role a devil, inviting condemnation and all round infamy for herself for all times to come.

This is in sharp contrast with the good fame that Lord Ram got by remaining calm and cool in the face of such adversity and an unexpected, unfortunate turn of events—when his own step-mother became his enemy by depriving him of the crown of a great kingdom to which he was rightfully entitled, and making him suffer for fourteen long years in the forest where his wife Sita was abducted by the demon king

Ravana and the Lord had to fight the bloody war of Lanka to free her. Yet, inspite of all these things, Lord Ram never harboured any ill-will against Kaikeyi; he showed her the same respect as if nothing had happened—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 244.

The episode of Kaikeyi is like the dirt and filth that accumulate near the bank of a river, which starts stinking and polluting the water. No traveler would like to go here to take a bath; everyone would avoid it.

The sharp contrast between the two events—one of Lord Ram being crowned as the King-Emperor and mass celebrations that attended it, and the other of Kaikeyi preventing the Lord's coronation and forcing him to the forest—are like the two extreme facets of life: a time which is full of happiness and joy, and another time that is full of sorrows and despair.

These are representative of the two extreme sorts of conditions found on the banks of the river Saryu, or from a broader perspective, of the two kinds of people who live in this world whom the devotee encounters. One sort of people will give the devotee joy by their company, and the other sort of people would cause confoundedness and despair in him.]

दो०. समन अमित उत्पात सब भरतचरित जपजाग ।

The excellent character of Bharat is like practicing auspicious virtues that lead to success in one's spiritual pursuit, such as the virtues of selflessness, self-restraint, righteousness, probity, propriety, renunciation, dispassion, devotion, austerity and penances et al<sup>1</sup>, as these virtues help to calm down all agitations and overcome all sufferings in the life of a devotee<sup>2</sup>.

Meanwhile, the narration of the many vices of Kaliyuga, the present era of corruption and moral degradation, and the sinful deeds done during this era<sup>3</sup>, are like the scum as well as the many evil and wicked birds of prey, such as crows and herons that live either on the bank of river Saryu or in its water. (Doha no. 41)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Bharat's character stands out as being exemplarily auspicious, most excellent and highly praise-worthy in the entire story of the Ramayana. He refused the crown of Ayodhya because it meant suffering for his beloved brother Lord Ram, and he led a life of a hermit all through the period of fourteen years that Lord Ram spent in the forest. Glorious tribute has been paid to him on more than one occasion.

<sup>2</sup>If a devotee follows the example set by Bharat, then it is sure and certain that he too will get as much credit and good fame as Bharat got by his meritorious life and auspicious deeds.

<sup>3</sup>The evil character of Kaliyuga have been enumerated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 97—to Chanda line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 102.

<sup>4</sup>The evil character of Kaliyuga have been compared to wicked birds such as crow and heron, as well as to the scum and filth that are found on the banks of the river Saryu. Once again, the contrast between the good and the bad has been made sharp here. On the one hand we have the exemplary character of Bharat, and on the other side we have the loathsome character of Kaliyuga. A wise devotee uses Bharat as his role model, and shuns that of Kaliyuga and the birds used to symbolize it, such as the crow and the heron.]

चौ०. कीरति सरित छहूँ रितु रूरी । समय सुहावनि पावनि भूरी ॥ १ ॥

hima himasailasutā siva byāhū. sisira sukhada prabhu janama uchāhū. 2.

This symbolic river (of Lord Ram's glory, holiness and divinity—i.e. the story of Ram Charit Manas) is magnificent, pleasant and most charming throughout the year, in all the six seasons<sup>1</sup>. Indeed and forsooth, it is very soothing for the senses and highly purifying for the spirit at all times, under all circumstances, and for everyone<sup>2</sup>. (1)

{Now, in this and the following verses, various episodes in the story of Ram Charit Manas are compared to the 'six seasons' mentioned herein above.}

The episode that describes the marriage of Lord Shiva with Parvati<sup>3</sup> is like the early winter season, the onset of cold season known as 'Hima'.

The story of the birth of Lord Ram, and the celebrations and festivities that followed<sup>4</sup>, is like the period marking the end of the winter season and the onset of spring, and known as the pleasant 'Sisira' season. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The six seasons are the following—early winter (Nov.-Dec.), late winter or the season of snowfall (Jan.-Feb.), spring (March-April), summer (May-June), rainy (July-August) and autumn or fall (Sept.-Oct.).

The Prashna Upanishad of Atharva Veda, Canto 1, verse no. 11 says that the Sun God is like a wheel having six spokes. These refer to the six seasons of the year.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, the story of Lord Ram is evergreen, abiding and eternal; it grants joy and bliss to everyone at all times and circumstances. People of all ages and genders, of all denominations and diverse interests, having different likings and inclinations, of varying mental abilities and intelligent quotient, of different emotional setups and varying outlooks to life—i.e. one and all, without exception or discrimination, whether they be devotees of the Lord or are skeptical and secular in disposition, would benefit by reading and hearing the glories of Lord Ram as narrated in this story of Ram Charit Manas.

The appeal of Lord Ram's divine story remains uniform in all ages and situations; its ability to grant spiritual peace, bliss, joy and beatitude is steady and abiding. It is therefore like a river that does not dry up during the summer season, nor does it ever cause annoyance to anyone like a river in spate during the rainy season that creates havoc all around it in the form of floods. The story is uniformly heart warming and soothing for the mind and the spirit just like a great river whose water remains cool in summer and warm in winter.

It is to be noted here that a remarkable simile has been employed by the learned poet Tulsidas while comparing the marriage of Lord Shiva and Parvati with the name of the season—i.e. the 'Hema season'. Parvati was the daughter of 'Hima', the King of the snow-covered mountain range called the Hingiri, the mountain of snow, or the Himalayas. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 65; Doha no. 102 and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.}

Lord Shiva is also the Lord of the Mountains because he has his abode at Mt. Kailash, the best amongst the summits of the range known as Himalaya.

Hence, the similarity in the 'name of the mountain' where the entire event took place and the 'name of the season' that is used to compare it are striking—the word 'Hima', meaning snow.

<sup>4</sup>This episode is described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 192—to Doha no. 200.

The birth of Lord Ram was marked by celebrations and festivities that is a metaphoric way of saying that the world rejoiced the arrival of spring when new flowers bloomed on trees, new leaves sprouted, the chill of winter ended, paving the way for sunshine and warmth, and the land became green all around once again after the frosty winter season. This brings cheer and happiness to the people.]

बरनब राम बिबाह समाजू । सो मुद मंगलमय रितुराजू ॥ ३ ॥

baranaba rāma bibāha samājū. sō muda maṅgalamaya riturājū. 3.
grīṣama dusaha rāma banagavanū. panthakathā khara ātapa pavanū. 4.

The narration of the episode describing the marriage of Lord Ram (with Sita)<sup>1</sup> is like the most pleasant and auspicious (maṅgalamaya) season known as spring, which is called the ‘king of seasons’ (riturājū)<sup>2</sup> (3)

The episode that relates to Lord Ram going to the forest<sup>3</sup> is like the summer season which is very harsh and unbearable, and the troubles that the Lord had to endure there<sup>4</sup> are like the rays of the scorching sun and the hot air that blows during this season<sup>5</sup>. (4)

<sup>2</sup>This episode is the most charming one in the whole story of Ram Charit Manas, and the poet Tulsidas has skillfully employed all his writing talent to wonderfully describe the beauty and magnificence of this event in an inimitable way. The lyrics and the melody of the verses that describe the marriage of Lord Ram are exceptionally charming.

It is compared to the ‘spring season’, the ‘king of all seasons’, because this season is the most pleasant one in the year. Prior to it was the frost and chill of winter, and it is followed by the heat of summer. Even Mother Nature celebrates this season by turning the land green and turning the trees into a riot of colour.

In India, the festival of colour, known as ‘Holi’, too is celebrated at the beginning of this season to herald its arrival.

<sup>4</sup>The sufferings endured by Lord Ram in the forest can be gauged by reading the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand: (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 62—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 63 (where Lord Ram tries to dissuade Sita from accompanying him to the forest); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 112 (the humble women folk in the roadside villages rue at the sufferings that Lord Ram and Sita would have to endure in the forest); (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 105; and Doha no. 114 (Lord Ram sleeps on bare earth under a tree, or rests under the shade of a tree); (iv) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 119—to Doha no. 120 (the villagers and forest dwellers regret at the sufferings that Lord Ram will undergo in the forest); (v) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 124 (which say how Sita used to feel tired walking, how Lord Ram took some rest under a tree, brought cool water from a stream, and ate edible roots and fruits, rested for the night, and then moved ahead the next day).

One has to close one’s eyes and see the events unroll on the canvas of the mind to fathom the depth of the sufferings that the Lord had to undergo in the forest. Remember: He was born in comfort and luxury, being the prince of a mighty empire. Suddenly he was tossed overboard to lead a harsh life in the forest: enduring the vagaries of nature and seasons, the roughness and harshness of uncharted terrain, the uncertainties of what lay ahead, living a life of a hermit to which he was not accustomed, and compounding his sufferings was the fact that he had to care for his young wife Sita and brother Laxman who depended upon him and who had never experienced the horrors of life in the forest. Besides the physical sufferings there was the fear of the ferocious demons who wandered in the forests, killing and eating all human beings they could lay their hands on. Eventually, the Lord had to face the wrath of the demons head on when their king Ravana abducted Sita, after which the Lord had to search for her and free her by waging a war with the help of an unconventional army of monkeys and bears—all done without any help from anyone in his family or kingdom.

Lord Ram endured everything with a smile and courage and resilience; he harboured ill-will against none. The sufferings undergone by Lord Ram would wring the heart of any man who has any trace of compassion in him. Frankly speaking, the remembrance of the harsh life of Lord Ram during his days in the forest, the imagination of the Lord's sufferings there, are so agonizing and painful to think of that they make the author of this book sad and moved to tears.

<sup>5</sup>While the spring season is very pleasant, the summer is very harsh and tormenting. Hence, the sufferings of Lord Ram during his days in the forest are compared to the harsh conditions of the summer season.]

बरषा घोर निसाचर रारी । सुरकुल सालि सुमंगलकारी ॥ ५ ॥

राम राज सुख बिनय बड़ाई । बिसद सुखद सोइ सरद सुहाई ॥ ६ ॥ baraṣā ghōra nisācara rārī. surakula sāli sumaṅgalakārī. 5.

rāma rāja sukha binaya baṛā'ī. bisada sukhada sō'i sarada suhā'ī. 6.

The ferocious battles that Lord Ram fought with the demons<sup>1</sup> are like the heavy rains of the rainy season, but these battles were very auspicious for the gods and the rest of the creatures of the world just like the rains are good for the crop and the land<sup>2</sup>. (5)

The glorious reign of Lord Ram when he ascended the throne of Ayodhya, the reign that was marked by righteousness and practice of the laws of Dharma (rightful conduct), with abundance of happiness and joy all around<sup>3</sup>, is like the pleasant autumn season which is very comforting<sup>4</sup> as it symbolizes the reward one gets by practicing Dharma and a noble way of life as done during the reign of Lord Ram. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram fought a number of independent battles with the demons, and then there was the major conflict that culminated in the epic war of Lanka.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 209 (battle with the female demon Tadka); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 210 (battle with demons Marich and Subahu); (b) Aranya Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 7 (battle with the demon Viradha); (iv) Chaupai line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 18—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 21 (battle with the demon Khar and Dushan); (v) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 33 (battle with the demon Kabandha); and then finally (c) Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Chanda line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 103 (the epic War of Lanka).

<sup>2</sup>If we examine these individual battles and the final war of Lanka, we will discover two things: One, that all the demons who died fighting Lord Ram found deliverance, emancipation and salvation for themselves. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 45; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7, 9-10 that precede Doha no. 114.}

Two, that after each victory of Lord Ram over the demons the gods and sages felt very glad and contented, because it was for this very purpose—i.e. elimination of the demons—that Lord Vishnu had come down to the mortal world as Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 186 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that follow it. }

So therefore, the gods, sages and saintly people were glad that Lord Ram not only saved them from the tyranny of the demons, but he also showed his merciful and forgiving nature by granting deliverance, emancipation and salvation to all the demons inspite of their sinful lives.

<sup>4</sup>Before the autumn season was the harsh period of summer; so the arrival of autumn is very pleasant because the heat of the sun abates and the environment becomes cool.]

The immaculate character of Sita, her loyalty towards her husband Lord Ram, and her exemplary life marked by righteousness, probity and nobility in thought and conduct<sup>1</sup> are like the holy water of the symbolic river (representing the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas). (7)

Similarly, the excellent character of Bharat and his upright nature, his devotion for Lord Ram and practice of the laws of Dharma (righteousness and probity in conduct and thought), were stellar in nature and steady<sup>2</sup>. They are like the supreme peace and tranquility that reigns over the waters of this symbolic river<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 5—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 6. Here, Anusuiya, the wife of sage Atri, advises Sita about the chief points of an auspicious way of life that a loyal and chaste wife must practice.

There are other occasions also where Sita has been blessed with grace. For instance, (a) by the deity of holy river Ganges—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 103 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it; (b) by the ordinary women folk who met Sita on the way to the forest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 117 along with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.

Sita's immaculacy, chastity and unblemished character was ultimately proved and established by her undergoing the 'fire test of purity' at the end of the war of Lanka—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 109 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>The excellent nature and righteous character of Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, has been extolled in laudatory terms at a number of places in the story of Ram Charit Manas. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Doha no. 168 and Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow it (by mother Kaushalya); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 184 (by ministers, courtiers, guru Vasistha, and citizens of Ayodhya); (iii) Doha no. 205 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede it (by the presiding deity of Triveni); (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 206—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 210 (by sage Bharadwaj); (v) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 231—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 233 (by Lord Ram and the gods); (vi) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 257, and Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 258 (by sage Vasistha and others who had assembled in Chitrakoot); (vii) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 266 (by the Guru of the gods); (viii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 283 (during a meeting between Kaushalya, the mother of Lord Ram, and Sunayana, the mother of Sita in Chitrakoot); (ix) Doha no. 304 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it and Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow this Doha (by Lord Ram who expresses his confidence in the wisdom of Bharat); (x) from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 324—to Doha no. 326 (which describes Bharat's penances, austerities, sacrifice and self-control).

<sup>3</sup>Amid the turmoil of life and its various exigencies and transient nature that seem to rock the boat of a person's life, the way Bharat led his life acts as a lighthouse that helps the perplexed person to navigate through the rough water of the river representing the events in his life. Bharat practiced all the principles of Dharma, such as self-restraint, renunciation, dispassion, austerity, penance, righteousness, probity, propriety, ethics, morality, and nobility of thought and conduct, as well as having devotion for Lord Ram.

The example of Bharat serves as a beacon of hope for a person seeking guidance to lead a peaceful life amidst the turmoil, sufferings, temptations, despair and contradictions of life that perplex him. Bharat's example gives steadiness and calmness to the person who is unable to decide what to and what not to do when torn between bewildering and complex situations in life.

To wit, taking the analogy of the boat cited earlier in this discussion, Bharat acts as a keel of the boat to give it steadiness so that it can continue with its journey without turning over.]

bhāyapa bhali cahu bandhu kī jala mādhurī subāsa. 42.

The sweet and friendly relationship, and the strong and inviolable bond of brotherhood that existed between the four brothers (Lord Ram, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan)—the affectionate way they looked at each other, the endearing way they talked, met and expressed their love for each other—was exemplary. Indeed and without gainsay, the cordial relationship that existed between the four brothers was extremely profound, sublime and divine by its nature<sup>1</sup>.

This warm and amiable relationship marked by sweetness and mutual affection for each other is like the sweet and scented water of the symbolic river (Saryu, representing the story of Ram Charit Manas)<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 42)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are ample verses in the story of Ram Charit Manas that prove the strong and inviolable bond of brotherly love and affection that existed between the four brothers, and the mutual respect they had for each other, right from their infancy. They played together, ate together, grew up together, were taught together by sage Vasishtha, and were married together.

Childhood days: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 198; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 203; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 204; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1, 4, 6 that precede Doha no. 205.

Marriage: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 325 along with Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 326; (iii) Chanda line nos. 13-16 that precede Doha no. 327 (gods blessing all the four couples during the marriage rituals); (iv) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 328 (king Janak washing the feet of all the four brothers simultaneously as part of the marriage ritual); (v) Doha no. 334 along with Chaupai line no.1 that follows it (Lord Ram and his three brothers visited the city of Janakpur and then to king Janak to bid good bye to all before departing for home, i.e. to Ayodhya, with their brides and the marriage party); (vi) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 341, and Doha no. 342 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it (king Janak blesses the four brothers who were now his sons-in-law); (vii) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 348; Doha no. 349 along with Chaupai line nos. 3, 7 that precede it, and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow this Doha; and Chaupai line no. 4 that precede Doha no. 353 (welcome ceremony of the four brothers and their brides in Ayodhya).

Lord Ram regretting that he would alone be asked to become a king when sage Vasistha went to inform him about it, whereas it would be correct that the crown be equally shared by all the four brothers in turn as they had hitherto shared everything together—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 10.

Laxman decided to accompany Lord Ram to the forest as he could not live without him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 73.

When Bharat and Shatrughan came to know that their mother Kaikeyi had sent Lord Ram to the forest, they vented their wrath on her and her maid Manthara who had instigated Kaikeyi. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 161—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 163.

Later on, Bharat had expressed his excess of anguish and lamented regretfully that he had been the cause for Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman having to come to the forest, asking Lord Ram to forgive him and return home, and let him go to the forest in his place, telling the Lord that the final decision would be his and whatever he orders would be acceptable to Bharat. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 267—to Doha no. 269; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 297—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 301; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 313.

When Bharat and Shatrughan met Lord Ram and Laxman in Chitrakoot, their mutual love and affection overflowed and made everyone who was present there emotional. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 240—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 242.

During the conference held in Chirakoot, Bharat had stressed the fact that Lord Ram had loved him so much ever since their childhood days that he would voluntarily lose a game so that Bharat could win it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 260.

Finally, we read about the meeting of the four brothers when Lord Ram came back to Ayodhya at the end of his fourteen years of forest sojourn. It was a most emotional union, marked by unprecedented warmth and bonhomie, with tears and sobs and warm embraces by all the four brothers. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 5—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 3.

<sup>2</sup>In short, all the four brothers were like the same soul having four bodies.

In this Doha, the sweetness of the waters of the symbolic river represented by the story of Ram Charit Manas has been compared here to the fact that there was exceptional sweetness and love in the relationship between the four brothers, and it stood firm and inviolable even during testing times and circumstances.

To wit, the simple and obvious meaning of this comparison is that inspite of the many unpleasant narrations in the story that seem to be harsh and not so divine, such as the delusions of Narad, the birth of the demon race, the many battles and the epic war of Lanka that were bloody and horrendous, and even the palace intrigue that led to Lord Ram going to the forest, and other such things, yet the story does not lose its inherent sweetness, charm and spiritual beauty.

This fact has been reiterated by Lord Shiva to Paravati in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 129 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it; and by Goswami Tulsidas in his own observation in Doha no. 130 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-12 that precede it.]

चौ०. आरति बिनय दीनता मोरी । लघुता ललित सुबारि न थोरी ॥ १ ॥

अदभुत सलिल सुनत गुनकारी । आस पिआस मनोमल हारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

ārati binaya dīnatā mōrī. laghutā lalita subāri na thōrī. 1.

adabhuta salila sunata gunakārī. āsa pi'āsa manōmala hārī. 2.

[Poet Tulsidas, who has written this book Ram Charit Manas, says—] ‘My longing for receiving Lord Ram’s grace, my humble prayers and my humility, which are immense by nature, are like the lightness and cleanliness of the water of this symbolic river (representing the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Verily indeed, forsooth and without gainsay, this marvelous water (i.e. the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas) has very rare qualities in it—for it can heal the spirit of the hearer who hears it; it can purify the mind of all its impurities, it can clean the inner self of all dirt, and it quenches the thirst of all sorts of worldly desires that the devotee may have<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas says that his heart is honest and his mind is pure, he has no trace of deceit or conceit, nor pretensions of being a great poet or of any kind of boastfulness when he says that he has written this holy book as a remembrance of his beloved Lord Ram, as a tribute to him, as a means of offering his worship to Lord Ram, as an offering at his holy feet, and not to show off his poetic or writing skills. He writes this holy book with all humility at his command, and with a humble prayer to the Lord to bless him with the boon of having abiding devotion and love for him. Tulsidas wants nothing else; he seeks no worldly boons or blessings for material gains. He does not either seek fame and name, nor honours and titles for his composition. He has made these points abundantly clear in earlier verses. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 8 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-14 that precede it; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 8-11 that precede Doha no. 9; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 10; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 12; (v) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Chaupai line nos. 1, 6 that precede Doha no. 14; (vi) Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 14; (vii) Chaupai line nos. 7-11 that precede Doha no. 15; (viii) Doha no. 29 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede it.}]

So therefore, just as this attitude of simplicity, humility, submission, supplication and modesty neutralizes any trace of grossness that Tulsidas may have had before he started writing Ram Charit Manas, the story would lighten the heart and purify the mind of all those who listen to it and read it, removing the burden of worldly worries and consternations that rob the spirit of its peace and tranquility.

The lightening of the devotee's heart and mind of their worldly burden is likened to the water of this symbolic river being light and pure in the sense that even as waters of some springs and rivers are nectar-like and naturally beneficial for the health of a person as they are easy on the stomach and do not make the drinker bloat up, this holy story of Lord Ram will be easily understood by one and all, and it will spiritually benefit even the uninitiated person as much as it would do to a learned person.

Another point is that just like the case of the water of a sacred river that looks dirty from the outside not losing its inherent holiness and sanctity, the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas remains spiritually evergreen and eternally holy inspite of its story line appearing to be worldly in its appearance, and even if it is read or listened to by non-believers and skeptics who have no faith in Lord God.

The water of this symbolic river representing the divine story of Lord Ram is 'light' in the sense that it lifts the spirit from a gross plane to a higher level of existence, and it is 'pure and clean' because it cleanses the inner self of a devotee of all his spiritual faults, making him pious and saintly. When we need to clean our bodies we take a bath in clean water, and not in dirty water.

<sup>2</sup>The benefits of hearing the divine story of Lord Ram has been enumerated in this verse. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 31—to Doha no. 32; (ii) Doha no. 35 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-13 that precede it; (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 126—to Doha no. 130.]

राम सुप्रेमहि पोषत पानी । हरत सकल कलि कलुष गलानी ॥ ३ ॥

भव श्रम सोषक तोषक तोषा । समन दुरित दुख दारिद दोषा ॥ ४ ॥

rāma suprēmahi pōṣata pānī. harata sakala kali kaluṣa galānī. 3.

bhava śrama sōṣaka tōṣaka tōṣā. samana durita dukha dārida dōṣā. 4.

The water of this symbolic holy river (representing the divine story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas) enhances and reinforces one's love and devotion for Lord Ram, while at the same time it eliminates and neutralizes all sorts of sins and their harmful effects that are prevalent in the corrupt and dark age known as Kaliyug (the present age), and which cause a lot of distress and perplexities for a person<sup>1</sup>. (3)

This ambrosia-like water is able to relieve fatigue of the soul due to its seemingly endless journey through the cycle of transmigration (i.e. it grants liberation and deliverance to the soul, and emancipation and salvation to the devotee).

It gives contentedness to content itself (i.e. it is a provider of the best kind of contentedness to the seeker, leaving him fully satisfied and in want of nothing more to give him peace and happiness).

It eliminates all sorts of distresses and pains and grief and torments caused by sins and their consequences; nay, it vanquishes sins themselves (i.e. it removes the cause of all kinds of distresses, pains, grief and torments by eliminating 'sin' itself)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The holy story of Lord Ram has a two-fold benefit—one, it develops positive spiritual virtues of devotion and love for Lord God in a person who listens to it and reads it, and two, it helps to clean one's inner self of all spiritual impurities and taints that cover a person's Atma, his 'pure self', which tend to cause a lot of distress and agitation in him. The story of Lord Ram gives a devotee internal peace and bliss; he finds solace and succour in it; his mind finds rest and his heart emotional stability. It is like the case of a thirsty person finding an oasis in a hot desert—this discovery gives him the joy of his life; he would have given anything demanded just for a sip of water to save his life, but now he has an entire water-hole of cool and sweet nectar-like water all for himself to drink as much as he wants. So is the case with Ram Charit Manas—it nourishes the soul, uplifts the spirit, removes agitations by calming the nerves, and it grants peace to the mind and heart.

In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 31.

<sup>2</sup>How does the divine story of Lord Ram remove sins? It does so by purifying the inner-self of the devotee and motivating him to follow the path of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, and nobility in conduct and thought, i.e. the Laws of Dharma, and shun the opposite path, i.e. the path of sin.

In this context, see verse no. 5 herein below.

A person suffers and loses his peace of mind and heart because he goes against the Laws of Nature and Dharma, and becomes indulgent in the gross world and its material things. He develops various passions, longs for this and that, and is never at peace with himself because he pursues his dream and expects to realize imaginary goals that always elude him in a world full of contradictions, mirages and delusions. The situation is like a boat caught in the turbulent currents of a river, which makes the boat toss and rock, making its passengers terrified and agitated. In this situation, Lord Ram's story acts as a strong boat with a good boatman, a sturdy keel and navigation system—that instill confidence in the mind of the passengers and calms their nerves.

The devotee is now certain that inspite of his many failings and faults, at last he has a means to find deliverance from his problems. And the best thing is that this 'means' is easy and uncomplicated, something that does not require elaborate rituals and practicing of many difficult methods as prescribed in the scriptures—such as Yoga (meditation), Japa (repetition of Mantras or spiritual formulas), Tapa (austerity and penance), Dhyan (contemplation), Tirtha (visiting pilgrim places), Yagya and Vrat (sacrifices and vows) et al.

The path of devotion and love for Lord Ram as prescribed in the story of Ram Charit Manas is a very simple and hassle free path for attaining spiritual bliss and happiness. It is uncomplicated and free of dogmas. From a practical point of view too, an interesting story, especially one that is told by the way of a song or poetry that can be sung and recited melodiously, appeals to both the mind and the heart of a weary person, for it gives peace to him and removes his weariness, diverting his attention from the problems of life that burden his mind and heart. But when this 'story' is told with the assurance to a weary person that it is certain to grant deliverance from all worldly torments and give him peace and solace, it acquires a special value for him, for he is anxious to find a way out from the quagmire in which he is trapped. Ram Charit Manas is the perfect remedy for him; it is the kind of story that he has been searching for, something that would be easy on his mind and unburden it of its baggage of worries about how to find liberation and deliverance from the net of problems in which the soul seems to be trapped.

The glories of the story of Lord Ram have been extolled and enumerated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 32 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-14 that precede it.]

काम कोह मद मोह नसावन । बिमल बिबेक बिराग बढ़ावन ॥ ५ ॥

सादर मज्जन पान किए तें । मिटहिं पाप परिताप हिए तें ॥ ६ ॥

kāma kōha mada mōha nasāvana. bimala bibēka birāga baṛhāvana. 5.
sādara majjana pāna ki'ē tēm. miṭahiṁ pāpa paritāpa hi'ē tēm. 6.

On the one hand it removes or eliminates Kaam (worldly passions), Krodha (anger), Mada (arrogance and haughtiness) as well as Moha (delusions and attachments), and on the other hand it enhances and reinforces the virtues of purity of thought that fosters wisdom, and purity of conduct that fosters the virtues of renunciation, dispassion and detachment (Vairagya)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Indeed and in all sooth, if a seeker has faith in this story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, listening to it and hearing it attentively and with due reverence, then it would be like his taking a bath and sipping the water of the holy river that symbolizes this story, and even as a weary traveler finds immense joy, feeling refreshed and rejuvenated with this bath and drinking of the water of the river, the devotee too would find that his countless torments and grief, that were caused by sins, have been eliminated, and his inner-self is refreshed and rejuvenated<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse answers the question: ‘How would the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas remove sins and neutralize its consequences while giving peace and deliverance to a devotee?’ It does so by removing sinful nature and replacing it with good character.

<sup>2</sup>When a tired traveler reaches a river and takes a bath in its cool water, all his tiredness goes away. Similarly, when a person reads and listens to this holy story, his inner-being finds joy, happiness, peace and bliss.

जिन्ह एहिं बारि न मानस धोए । ते कायर कलिकाल बिगोए ॥ ७ ॥
तृषित निरखि रबि कर भव बारी । फिरिहिं मृग जिमि जीव दुखारी ॥ ८ ॥ jinha ēhiṁ bāri na mānasa dhō'ē. tē kāyara kalikāla bigō'ē. 7.

tr̥ṣita nirakhi rabi kara bhava bārī. phirihahiṁ mṛga jimi jīva dukhārī. 8.

Surely indeed, those unfortunate ones who have not washed their Mana (inner-self; the mind and heart complex) with the purifying water of this symbolic holy river have definitely been cheated by Kaliyug<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Verily indeed, those unfortunate ones who have fallen in the trap of delusions created by Kaliyug are like a deer that runs behind the mirage of water created by the heat of the sun in the desert, without actually finding the water to quench its thirst. Likewise, these poor deluded fellows would spend their lives running hither and thither seeking solace and comfort for their tormented self, and searching for a means of deliverance, but would find none<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 112.

Kaliyug is very cunning and crafty; it throws its net of delusions to trap an unsuspecting creature just like a fishmonger catches fish by throwing his net to trap the poor fish. Only fools who are greedy for the charms of this material world—which though illusionary yet looks surreal due to the veil of delusions thrown by Kaliyug over his mind and wisdom—would take the bait just like a greedy fish, not realizing that it is a trap to ensnare him.

But those who are wise and intelligent see through the trick, and take refuge under the shade of Lord Ram's grace.

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea has been expressed by Tulsidas in his classical book of prayers called Vinai Patrika, in its verse nos. 88, 116, 136, 138 and 188.

To wit, if a person truly seeks to find a way out of his spiritual dilemmas and perplexities that confound his mind and make him feel out of his wits in Kaliyug, then he need not search anywhere but take recourse to the story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, and follow the guidelines outlined in it. He will surely and certainly see the light at the end of the dark tunnel.

Let us take an example to understand the great import of these verses, viz. Chaupai line nos. 1-8, which we are currently reading. In essence they say that a person who is fortunate enough to have come to this lake symbolized by the divine story of Lord Ram, known as Ram Charit Manas (apropos: Doha no. 36—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 38), should waste no time in drinking this nectar-like water that is rejuvenating for the spirit and a destroyer of all torments associated with life in this mortal world, but if by chance one is not so fortunate to use this opportunity, if he misses it, then surely he is under the influence of Kaliyug which has deluded his wisdom and undermined his sense of right thinking.

It will be easy to understand this point with the help of a simple and straightforward example. Suppose a thirsty and tired man comes to a water body. Would he first and foremost think of drinking water to quench his thirst and save his life, or would he waste precious time in fruitless debating and contemplating on things that do not serve any worthwhile purpose to him? For instance, would it be not a height of stupidity on his part to stand by the side of the water body to first find out its origin and history, the geography and geology of the place, who drank that water before him or has some outcaste washed his hand in it prior to his coming to it himself, what is the flora and fauna of the water body, or what kind of fish live in it, and whether or not some of them may have died and still lying in the water, thereby polluting it, is the water crystal clean or dirty and covered by moss, and so on and so forth. Then, at the end of this doubting and contemplating, being unable to arrive at a conclusion about the purity, holiness, sanctity and cleanliness of the water, turns and goes away thirsty and tired. Say, what would you call this person?

The same thing applies to a person who wastes his time into delving in futile arguments as to the authenticity of the story of Lord Ram, its particular history, spying out some minor inconsistencies here and there in order to upend it and prove it's an imaginary myth, forgetting that it has come down to us from generations after generations of learned sages and seers in an oral tradition, for writing came much later, and therefore some minor divergences from the main structure and flow of events is but natural and in order of things—for this person who engages in such academic debates has lost the chance to imbibe the nectar that is right before him and enjoy its bliss in an attempt to show-off his intellectual muscle.

The idea is, one must approach the story of Lord Ram with an element of devotion and faith in his heart if he wishes to benefit from it, for otherwise he would have lost the fruit while examining the tree that bears it.]

Having thus enumerated the glorious virtues of this symbolic water (of the holy river representing the story of Lord Ram) to the best of his intellectual abilities and wisdom, and having purified his own mind and intellect by washing them in it, this humble poet (i.e. Goswami Tulsidas) pays his obeisance and respects to Lord Shiva and goddess Bhavani (Parvati, Shiva's consort)<sup>1</sup>, as he now begins to narrate this beautiful and most charming story (of Ram Charit Manas). (Doha no. 43-a)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The divine story of Lord Ram known as 'Ram Charit Manas' as narrated by Tulsidas was first conceived in Lord Shiva's Mana (mind and heart). So therefore, Lord Shiva is deemed to be the one who is the progenitor of this story, he is its creator, and hence he is given honour first by offering respects by the poet Tulsidas before commencement of the narration. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 35 along with Chaupai line nos. 6-13 that precede it where the same idea is expressed.]

kaha'um' jugala munibarja kara milana subhaga sambāda. 43 (b).

Invoking the grace of Lord Ram and seeking the Lord's blessings by enshrining his holy lotus-like feet in my heart, I (Tulsidas) now commence with the narration of this exceptionally magnificent story by describing the meeting of two great sages of their time (i.e. sages Bharadwaj and Yagyawalkya)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 43-b)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Till this point the saint-poet Goswami Tulsidas has enumerated the glories and divinity of Lord Ram, his holy name and his divine story as he would soon narrate it in his book Ram Charit Manas. To remove any doubt about its authenticity and holiness, the poet has already said that it is not his own composition but that of Lord Shiva, and brought down to him through a chain of great sages who had first heard it and then retold it for the good of others—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 30 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede it; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35.

So Tulsidas says that what he is narrating is not something new, but a retelling of a holy story already popular with great souls. As to the reason why he is 'retelling it again', he says that he is doing so for his own spiritual peace and beatitude, for his own happiness and joy, as well as to make this story accessible for the ordinary folks who are comfortable with their native language. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 31; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 33; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 8; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 9—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 14.]

Sage Bharadwaj<sup>1</sup> lived in Prayag<sup>2</sup> and he had immense affection (and devotion) for the holy feet of Lord Ram. (1)

[Now his qualities or virtues are listed.] He was steeped in Tapa (observed austerities and did penance), practiced the eclectic spiritual qualities of composure of mind and evenness or stability of thought, self-restraint over the sense organs of perception and action, and was an embodiment of the virtues of compassion and mercy. He was a wise and enlightened traveler on the path of liberation and deliverance, and had all the excellent qualities that one ought to possess<sup>3</sup>. (2)

Sage Bharadwaj is regarded as one of the seven celestial sages known as Sapta Rishis. Ironically, we find many ancient sages with this name, and therefore it is clear that this word was used more as a surname or title rather than the name of an individual sage or seer. Bharadwaj is regarded as a Vedic sage after whom a lineage of sages and seers of the highest order was established. His disciples assumed their teacher's name as their title, and came to be known as Bharadwajs.

Sage Bharadwaj Baarhasptya is the seer of several hymns of the Rig Veda, Mandal no. 6. He is the son of Brihaspati, the moral preceptor of the Gods. He was the father of Dronacharya of the Mahabharata who has taught Arjun the science of archery.

The story of the Ramayana as narrated in Adbhut Ramayana, said to be written by sage Valmiki, it is mentioned that sage Bharadwaj was the disciple of sage Valmiki. He lived near the banks of river Ganges in Prayag, the pilgrim city known as Allahabad in modern India. According to epic story of the life and times of Lord Ram that was written by the legendary poet Goswami Tulsidas, the book titled “Ram Charit Manas”, it is mentioned that sage Bharadwaj lived in Prayag, the confluence of three holy rivers, viz. the Ganges, the Yamuna and the Saraswati. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44.

Later on in the narration of Ram Charit Manas we read that Lord Ram had visited the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj during his forest sojourn—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 106—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 109. It was at his advice that Lord Ram stayed at Chitrakoot during the first phase of his forest exile.

Sage Yagyavalkya had preached the divine story of Lord Ram, known as the ‘Ram Charit Manas’, to him when sage Bharadwaj had earnestly requested him to do so during one of the great congregation of holy men at Prayag. It was from here that this glorious story of Lord Ram spread across the world in its present form. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 7 that precede Doha no. 30; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Doha no. 47.}

Sage Bharadwaj is credited with two great works—viz. Bharadwaj Shrauta-Sutras consisting of ten sections, and Bharadwaj Griha-Sutras.

The profound philosophy pertaining to the divine nature of Lord Ram and him being the Tarak Brahm himself personified is preached to sage Bharadwaj by sage Yagyavalkya in Ram Uttar Tapini Upnishad of the Atharva Veda, Canto nos. 2-3.

In addition to this, the story of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati was narrated to sage Bharadwaj by sage Yagyavalkya in Ram Charit Manas. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 104.}

<sup>2</sup>Prayag is a holy pilgrim place that has the confluence of three holy rivers, viz. Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati. Its present-day name is Allahabad, and it is situated in the state of Uttar Pradesh in India.

The glory of Prayag has been eulogized in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 106.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram had visited sage Bharadwaj during his journey into the forest. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 106—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 109.

Later on, Bharat, Lord Ram's younger brother, too had visited the sage when he was on his way to search Lord Ram in the forest and try to bring him back to Ayodhya. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 206—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 216.]

In the Hindu month of Magha when the sun enters the sign of Capricorn, everyone (i.e. sages and seers as well as ordinary people) visit the holiest of holy places (i.e. Prayag). (3)

The Gods, the Demons, the Kinnars (celestial dancers and singers), and all classes of human beings come to Prayag and reverentially take a purifying bath in the Triveni (literally meaning the confluence of three holy rivers—Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>All these three rivers are holy in their own right. So by taking a dip at a place where the three meet gives a three-fold religious merit to the pilgrim.

An important to note here is that doing any religious deed, such as taking a bath in a sacred river or going on a pilgrimage or visiting shrines etc. are fruitful and rewarding only if one has faith and undertakes these exercises with reverence. Merely dipping in a river, visiting temples or holy places, without having faith in them and belief in their spiritual importance, or devoid of reverence for them, will be a wasted effort. Lord Krishna has said this in clear terms in his famed Geeta, Chapter 17, verse no. 28.

In Ram Charit Manas too, stress has been laid on having faith, belief and respect for a holy entity if one were to expect any spiritual gain from it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 11-13 that precede Doha no. 2 where a specific reference to Prayag has been made in this context; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 43 where the importance of firm faith in the redeeming powers of the holy river have been stressed, albeit in the context of river Saryu that is used as a metaphor for the flow of the divine story of Lord Ram as narrated in this book called Ram Charit Manas.}]

While going through the rituals, the visitors and pilgrims worship the holy feet of Lord Veni-Madhav (a form of Lord Vishnu who is the patron and presiding deity of this particular religious place called Triveni), and they feel blessed and thrilled in their bodies by touching the sacred tree of immortality known as 'Akshaya Vat'. (5)

The hermitage of sage Bharadwaj is located here. It is holy and auspicious, and free from any kind of deceit and corruption of the gross material world. [To wit, it has a holy atmosphere around it that is conducive to spiritual pursuits, and corruptions, such as falsehood and cunning, do not enter its precincts.]

It is exceedingly charming and attractive so much so that it appeals to the hearts of great sages and seers who go there<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a characteristic feature of places where noble, pious and holy persons live. They are auspicious themselves, and the environment around them too acquires these virtues by being associated with them. It is like an incense stick that burns in a corner of a large room, but its sweet fragrance fill the whole place. When a guest visits a place where a holy man lives, he cannot miss the auspicious atmosphere and an aura of holiness that prevails there. This situation can be compared to a visit to a place of vices, and one would immediately feel uncomfortable.]

All the great sages, seers, hermits and other pious people who go to bathe in the holy rivers of Prayag, which is like a King amongst holy places, stay in large numbers in the hermitage of sage Bharadwaj (who cheerfully hosts them all). (7)

These groups of holy men enthusiastically take a purifying dip in the holy rivers early in the morning, and thereafter they spend their time discussing the countless glories of the Lord God and talking about him<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this verse, a general guidance is given regarding what one should do if one visits a holy place. One should wake up early in the morning, take a purifying bath in the river or other water body available there, and then spend one's time talking about Lord God and discussing spiritual matters. Special attention ought to be paid here that one should not waste time in discussing matters of the gross material world during the time spent at a holy place, but unfortunately, this is usually what happens nowadays.]

These holy men discuss about the nature and truth of Brahm (the pure cosmic Consciousness and the Supreme Being), about the various aspects of Dharma (laws that govern righteousness, probity, propriety and noble conduct and thought in life), and the finer nuances of the different principles of metaphysics.

They discuss and expound upon the various aspects of Bhakti (devotion) for Lord God in conjunction with the virtues of Gyan and Vairagya (spiritual wisdom and renunciation respectively) that are associated with it.

[To wit, they discuss how Bhakti is related to Gyan and Vairagya, and how the latter leads one to the former.]<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 44)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to Tulsidas' Book of Prayers called 'Vinai Patrika', verse no. 205 where what Bhakti, Gyan and Vairagya are, and what their relationship is, have been briefly narrated. This book has been published separately by this author in English, and is available on the same internet platform from where the reader had accessed the present book Ram Charit Manas.]

In this way it was a usual practice that all great souls took religious baths during the whole month of Magha<sup>1</sup>, and then they went back to their respective hermitages. (1)

Every year there was great rejoicing when the time came for this assembly, and every year the assembled sages and seers and other holy men went back to their places after bathing in the holy rivers while the sun stayed in the asterism of Capricorn. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Magha is the eleventh month of the Lunar calendar. It is so called because the etymology of the word means “don’t commit sins”. To wit, this is a holy month when one ought to be very careful not to do any unrighteous deed.]

[Once upon a time as was usual, all the sages and seers had assembled at Prayag, a place where three holy rivers, viz. the Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati, have their confluence. They used to come here every year on the auspicious occasion of “Makar Sakranti”<sup>1</sup>. They stayed at the place for the whole month, and on the final day took a bath at the confluence of the rivers before heading back to their respective hermitages.

However, on one such occasion, sage Bharadvaj, who lived permanently at Prayag, requested sage Yagyavalkya<sup>2</sup>, one of the greatest sage and seer of his time, to stay back for some more days and enlighten him about the secrets of Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being. It was during this long and elaborate discourse that unfolded now that sage Yagyavalkya narrates the story of Lord Shiva’s marriage.]

Once upon a time, all the sages and seers who had performed religious rites during the entire holy month of ‘Makar (Sakranti)’<sup>1</sup>, including taking purification baths and doing other rituals daily, did their ablutions on the final day of the month and then cheerfully went away to their respective hermitages. (3)

Sage Yagyavalkya<sup>2</sup> was one amongst them. He was a very wise, learned and enlightened seer. Sage Bharadvaj (who used to live permanently at the place where the sages and seers assembled to spend the holy month of Makar, a place known as Prayag), fell at the feet of Yagyavalkya and earnestly requested him to stay back for some more time. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Makar Sakranti—The tenth sign of the zodiac known as Capricorn is called “Makar”, and the word “Sarkanti” means a union, the solstice, a planet’s transition from one zodiac to another. In the context of Hindu religious practices, “Makar Sakranti” is the transition of the sun into the tenth zodiac sign of Capricorn. It falls roughly on the 14th of January of each year. It is also known as “Uttaraayan” as the sun moves in the northern direction.

Since “Makar” coincides with the eleventh month of the Hindu lunar year known as “Maagha”, both “Makar” and “Maagha” are commonly used as synonyms.

During this whole month, it is regarded auspicious to take a dip in holy rivers. Since three great rivers, i.e. the Ganges, the Yamuna and the Saraswati, have their ‘union’ or confluence at Prayaag (also known as Allahabad in modern India), it is the place deemed most suitable for performing religious rites as the benefits are symbolically multiplied three times due to the confluence of three rivers here.

A great congregation of sages and seers is held every year during this period when they take holy dip in the rivers, perform various rites and hold discourses—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 44—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 45.

<sup>2</sup>Sage Yagyawalkya/Yagyavalkya—He belonged to that Vedic period when people had an integral and holistic view of life and the reality behind existence, and all-activities, secular or religious, were regarded as one big, wholesome and composite religious sacrifice called a Yagya. Life itself was consecrated and devoted to the realization of the transcendental and supreme truthful Reality. There was no distinction between renunciation and involvement in life's chores. There was no dichotomy between the two, and the various debates arising in Indian spiritual practices due to different interpretations and re-interpretations of the Vedic and Upanishadic tenets was a product of the later period. One such exemplary sage and seer belonging to that golden period was Yagyavalkya—he was an enlightened wise man who was not only a self-realised householder but an ardent ascetic, an acclaimed scholar and an exemplary renunciate man par-excellence, all at the same time.

It is believed that Yagyavalkya was an incarnation of Lord Brahma, the creator, when he was cursed by Lord Shiva. [Skand Puran, Nagar Khand, 1-9.] His father was named Brahmabahu (literally, the limbs of Brahma, because the latter's limbs had manifested as this person). [Vayu Puran, 61.] But according to a book of religious law written by Yagyavalkya himself known as 'Yagyawalkya Sanhita', his father also had the same name. So, our Yagyavalkya was, in effect, 'Yagyavalkya, the second'. [Yagyavalkya Sanhita, 1.]

Yagyavalkya's teacher in the science of Yoga (meditation) and the knowledge of the self (metaphysics and philosophy) was sage Vasistha, son of Hiranyanabha Kaushalya, a king of the Raghu dynasty which ruled Ayodhya in ancient times. [Vayu Puran, 88; Bhagwat Mahapurana, 93/106.] The sage performed severe penances and austerities, known as Tapa, at Mithila, the birth place of Sita, the divine consort of Lord Ram. [Skandpuran, Reva Khand, 42.]

He used to attend the court of great ancient wise kings, such as king Janak (the father of Sita—Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, canto 3-4) and Yudhisthir (of the Mahabharat fame—Mahabharat, Sabha Parva, 4/32). It was in the court of king Janak that Yagyavalkya had defeated all the assembled scholars of the time on various metaphysical and theological concepts. He is also believed to be a chief priest in Yudhisthir's Rajsu Yagya.

Sage Yagyavalkya was one of the greatest, most erudite, wise and renowned seers of his time. He was a senior and enlightened man, so wise and learned a scholar that even king Janak, who himself was a most self-realised and enlightened king of his era, was so much bowled over by his erudition, depth of knowledge and scholarship that he accepted the sage's discipleship (refer Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, Canto 4, Brahmin 2, verse nos. 1, 4). He was proclaimed the undisputed champion and winner in a metaphysical and theological debate held in the court of Janak during the course of a great fire sacrifice held where great scholars, seers and sages from far and wide had assembled (refer Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, Canto 3, Brahmin 1-9).

He was a much sought after teacher and an honoured exponent of the eclectic Advaita Vedanta philosophy of non-duality. This basically propounds, inter alia, that everything in existence, visible or invisible, minute or colossus, important or unimportant, are all fundamentally the same singular unit called Brahm manifested in myriad and diverse ways, that therefore nothing that exists which is not Brahm is not true, that this Brahm is the only supreme Authority and Divinity in the entire creation, that this Brahm and the individual Atma or pure consciousness of the creature are one and the same, and not two independent units, that this Atma is the pure self, etc. Anything contrary to this is false and fallacious.

It is believed that all major Upanishads belonging to the Yajur Veda tradition are either directly or indirectly expounded and enunciated by and elucidated upon by Yagyavalkya or any one of his long line of disciples who had acquired this eclectic knowledge from him. (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 2/6/1-3, 4/6/1-3 and 6/5/1-3.)

One such example is the Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition in which sage Yagyavalkya has taught even the teacher of the Gods, i.e. Brihaspati, about the esoteric secrets and the profound spiritual importance as well as the significance of the Tarak Mantra, and about the divine nature of Lord Ram and his great Mantras that can provide a creature with Mukti (spiritual liberation and deliverance) once and for all.

The high spiritual prowess and reach of Yagyavalkya can be judged from the fact that he could communicate directly with the Supreme Being called Mandal Purush in his visible manifestation as the brilliant and splendorous Sun as described in Mandal Brahmin Upanishad of Shukla Yajur Veda tradition. The fact that Yagyavalkya had a repeated communion with the Sun God, at least on four occasions is clearly marked out in Mandal Brahmin Upanishad, 1/1/1-2; 2/1/1-2; 3/1/1-2; 4/1/1-2.

Yagyavalkya was a rich householder sage and seer. This is borne out by the fact that (a) on each occasion when he attended great debates he was showered with huge largesse by king Janak in the form of immense quantity of gold and thousands of cows (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 3/1/1-2, 4/1/1-7, 4/3/33, 4/4/23), and (b) when he asks his wife Maitreyi to partition his vast estate before he went on to take Sanyas (Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 2/4/1-2, 4/5/1-2).

The creation of Yajur Veda's two branches:- The word 'Yajus' means a liturgy of hymns chanted during the fire sacrifice. The Yajur Veda has been classified into Krishna and Shukla branches. It would be pertinent and interesting to add a brief note here on why the Yajur Veda has come to be known as Krishna and Shukla, meaning 'black' and 'white' respectively. The Yajur Veda Samhita (a collection of Mantras or hymns) is classified into these two types for a variety of reasons. One of the probable reasons for this Yajur Veda having two names is that the collection in the Samhita that came to be known as 'Krishna' had a mixture of prose and poetry, and hence considered 'impure and corrupted'. This is because primarily the Vedas were composed in poetry form with the verses structured according to one or the other methods of poetical composition called 'Chandas'. Prose as a style of composition came later on and was regarded as an interpolation, interposition or juxtaposition which is all tantamount to corrupting the original method. Hence, that text which had both the poetry and prose was deemed to be 'corrupted and impure form of the Vedic text', and therefore called 'Krishna'—the dark one. On the other hand, the Samhita which had only poetry was considered un-adulterated and pure form of the Vedic text, and hence called 'Shukla' or the white one, the colour 'white' being the colour of purity, immaculacy, divinity and holiness.

Since the primary use of the hymns of the Vedas in earlier times was for incantatory chanting during religious fire sacrifices, the poetical mode of composition was more suitable than the prose model. That is why these hymns were composed in 'Chandas' which are the different styles in which Sanskrit verses are composed. Later on, when these verses were also being used for purposes other than the fire sacrifices, the prose model evolved and developed. The Upanishads are mainly in the prose model because they are philosophical treatises and not ritualistic incantatory chanting.

Another plausible reason is that the verses of the Krishna Yajur Veda are more difficult to understand than those of the Shukla Yajur Veda. Hence, the former were called 'dark' or Krishna because of the difficulty in their comprehension and explanation as compared to the more easier ones classified as 'white' or Shukla. The Krishna Yajur Veda Samhita was more prevalent in the south of India while the Shukla was more common in the north of the country.

The third reason is that the original classifier of Vedas was 'Krishna Dvaipaayana Veda Vyas' who taught the text of the Yajur Veda to his disciple called Vaishampaayana. Hence, the original version of the text was named 'Krishna' in order to commemorate this fact.

There is a fourth probable reason as outlined here. The chief exponent of the Yajur Veda is regarded as the ancient sage Yagyavalkya. He was one of the several disciples of sage Vaishampayana. Once the teacher asked his disciples to perform the 'Brahmavadhya' sacrifice (a type of elaborate penance) for him. Yagyavalkya was so confident of himself, his knowledge and competency that he offered to do it all by himself for his teacher. The teacher thought that he was haughty and boastful. So, disowning or disinheriting him from his line of disciples, he commanded that Yagyavalkya should return all that he had learnt from his teacher. The sage returned all the Mantras of the Yajur Veda that he had learnt from his teacher by 'vomiting' them out. The rest of the disciples were very cunning; they transformed themselves immediately into partridges, called Tittars, and gobbled up everything. From that developed the Krishna Yajur Veda's Taitirīya branch. It is called 'Krishna' after the teacher and 'Taitirīya' after the partridges. Also, since they were 'vomited products' they were regarded as polluted and impure. Such body of knowledge came to be known as 'Krishna'—the impure one.

Now, not to be demoralized so easily and determined to get back his lost knowledge and wisdom, Yagyavalkya worshipped the Sun God who blessed him with a fresh set of Mantras of the Yajur Veda. Since it came from a 'bright source' represented by the sun, this set of Mantras was called the 'Shukla Yajur Veda'. [The word 'Shukla' means 'bright or light or illuminated'.] The sage revised this into fifteen sub-texts, called the Vaaj-sanei, i.e. those belonging to the horse race. This is because the Sun God had assumed the form of a 'horse' to teach him, and the word 'Vaajis' means a horse. The teaching was done in the form of the cosmic neighing. This form of the Sun God came to be worshipped as 'Hayagriva', the Lord with the neck of a horse. An entire Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition is named after this God, and it is called 'Hayagriva Upanishad'. It is the 29th Upanishad of this Veda.

Yagyavalkya had fifteen disciples (e.g. Kaanva, Maadhyandin etc.) who mastered one each of these fifteen sub-text created by Yagyavalkya. [Vishnu Puran, 3-5; Vayu Puran, 60-1.] The list of sages and seers who excelled in the Shukla Yajur Veda branch has been given in Brihad-Aaranyaka Upanishad, Canto 2, Brahmin 6, and Canto 4, Brahmin 6.

The Yajur Veda is divided into two major types—viz. the Shukla (white) and Krishna (black or dark). The Krishna Yajur Veda has only four branches existing at present out of the earlier eighty-five—Taitirīya, Maitraayani, Katha, and Kapisthal. Its Brahman is known as Taitirīya Brahman. The Shukla Yajur Veda, also known as the Vaajsaneyi Sanhita, originally had seventeen branches, but now only following two branches exist—Kaanva and Maadhyandeen. Its Brahman is known as Shatpath Brahman.

The sub-Veda of the Yajur Veda is known as Dhanur-Veda which deals with the science of archery and warfare.

The Aaranyakas of the Yajur Veda are—Taittiriya (of the Krishna Yajur Veda) and Brihad-aaranyak (of the Shukla Yajur Veda).

There are 19 principal Upanishads of the Shukla Yajur Veda, and 32 principal Upanishads of the Krishna Yajur Veda—such as Taittiriya, Swetaasvatar, Katha, Brihdaaranakya, Maitri, Ishavasya Upanishads etc.

The priests who used the hymns of the Yajur Veda during fire sacrifices were called ‘Yajus’ or ‘Adhwaryu’.

Family—He had two wives. The elder was named Katayani, and the second was called Maitreyi. From the elder wife, he had a son named Katyanana. [Skandpuran, Nagar Khand, 130; Brihad Aranya Upanishad, 4/5/1.] According to ‘Yogi Yagyavalkya’, a hand book on Yoga, his third wife was Gargi, though she is depicted as a rival interviewer who tested the sage’s erudition and scholarship in Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad. [Yogi Yagyavalkya, edited by Upendranath, Vasumati—Calcutta, 1-5.]

Sanyas—Though Yagyavalkya was externally a householder sage and seer, he was internally (i.e. mentally; intellectually and emotionally) a highly self-realised and an exceptionally enlightened man, a sincere ascetic and a renunciate monk who knew the futility of worldly pursuits. He was not preaching what he did not believe in. So he finally took to the eclectic path of Sanyas as clearly mentioned in Brihad Aranyaka Upanishad, 4/5/15.

Works—Yagyavalkya wrote great texts on Yoga, metaphysics and law pertaining to daily life, much like Manu’s Smiriti Law. (i) Yagyavalkya Sanhita contains religious laws; (ii) Yog Sanhita was composed in the hermitage of sage Upmanyu [Kurma Puran, 25.]; and (iii) Yogi Yagyavalkya on Yoga philosophy.

Yagyavalkya was a great and acclaimed Yogi (an ascetic) as well as a philosopher and a preacher par-excellence in the field of metaphysics, one who was well-versed in the knowledge of Brahm and the Atma.]

Sage Bharadwaj reverentially washed the feet of sage Yagyavalkya and seated him respectfully on a very clean seating-mat. (5)

Then after duly worshipping the great sage, praising his glories and reputation as a wise, learned and enlightened sage, he (Bharadwaj) said most politely and in a reverentially tone<sup>1</sup>—(6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When a person wants to learn anything and is sincere about it, he is very polite and humble while approaching the teacher for knowledge and removal of doubts. The teacher whom he approaches for an answer is a wise man, and so he senses the seekers earnestness. A good teacher cannot refuse, but feels that it is his moral duty to enlighten the other person and impart the knowledge he seeks. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 48.

The same thing has happened when Uma, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, approached the Lord to remove certain doubts she had in her mind regarding the divinity of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 111. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 64 where we learn that it was on the most polite and humble request of Garud, the celestial eagle which is the mount of Lord Vishnu, that the crow-saint Kaagbhusund narrated the story of Lord Ram for his benefit.

Earlier, Garud had bowed his head before Lord Shiva and had very politely asked him to remove his doubts about the divine reality of Lord Ram, but the Lord sent him to Kaagbhusund because a bird would better understand the language of another bird—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (a) Chaupai line no. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 61; (b) Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 62.]

kahata sō mōhi lāgata bhaya lājā. jaurm na kaha'um' barā hō'i akājā. 8.

‘Oh Lord! I have a grave doubt which perplexes me<sup>1</sup>, and I know that you are well-versed in all the essential knowledge of the Vedas (scriptures). [Hence, by inference, you are the most suitable seer who can remove my doubts and explain the reality to me. That is why I have approached you, and request you to please be kind to enlighten me.] (7)

I am afraid (or ashamed and feeling shy) to divulge my ignorance (or lack of knowledge)<sup>2</sup> and ask you to remove my doubts (as it may annoy you that being a great sage myself how come I harboured such ridiculous doubts in my mind; it would seem incongruous to you). But at the same time if I don't say anything about my doubts and confusions, it would be very harmful for me (as it will rob me of my mental and spiritual peace, and cast a dark shadow on my wisdom and my ability to preach others). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The reason for having any doubt is ignorance; it eclipses the wisdom of even great sages and seers. Ignorance does not even spare the Creator from being deluded. These things are clearly stated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (a) Chaupai line nos. 1, 5-7 that precede Doha no. 59; (b) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 60; (c) Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 62.

Lack of wisdom and prevalence of ignorance creates a lot of heartburn, doubts and irrational thoughts—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (a) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 58; (b) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 59.

There is no wonder that sage Bhardwaj had some doubts and confusions regarding Lord Ram, for even goddess Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva, too was overcome with similar doubts and confusions. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 51.

And, like sage Bharadwaj here confiding in sage Yagyavalkya his mental vexations, requesting the great sage to be graceful upon him and remove his confusion by enlightening him about the truth and reality of Lord Ram, Parvati too had confided in her husband Lord Shiva, asking the Lord to remove her confusions. It was as a result of this that the great story of Lord Ram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas came to be told. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Doha no. 111.

<sup>2</sup>As for being afraid to ask someone, who is very senior and exalted, a question which seems ridiculous because its answer is very obvious, and such ignorance is unexpected from a person who is otherwise regarded highly knowledgeable and wise, as was the case with sage Bharadwaj presently, we have other instances in Ram Charit Manas where the person wanting some of his doubts removed is afraid to ask questions out of hesitation. For instance, in Ram Charit Manas we shall read that even Bharat, the dear brother of Lord Ram, had felt hesitant and afraid to ask the Lord about the characteristic features of saints—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 36—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 37. This obviously is because Bharat was supposed to know the qualities of saints, and his wanting to know about them seemed incongruous on the face of it.

Then of course, we have the example of Parvati herself who was quite hesitant in asking Shiva to tell her the story of Lord Ram in detail so that she finds peace of mind and able to dispel her doubts. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 108.]

Oh Lord! It is proclaimed by saints and also declared by the scriptures such as the Vedas and Purans that true and pure form of wisdom cannot be expected in the heart of someone who conceals his ignorance from his guru (teacher). [And that is why I have gathered courage to express my lack of knowledge to you so that true and pure form of wisdom can sprout in my inner-self, and I can become enlightened.] (Doha no. 45)

[Note—Sage Bharadwaj wishes to be enlightened about the divinity of Lord Ram, and unless one has pure form of wisdom firmly established in his heart, this knowledge would elude him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 122.

Without proper wisdom no one can expect to cross over this huge ocean-like world and find liberation and deliverance from its horrors—refer also to Vinai Patrika of Tulsidas, (a) verse no. 115, line no. 2 of stanza no. 5; and (b) verse no. 123.]

Considering all the aforesaid facts I have decided to reveal my ignorance. Oh Lord, please be kind to remove it, please dispel my doubts and fears by enlightening me about the truth and reality, and be kind to be gracious upon me as I am your follower (or your disciple) (1)

That the holy name of Lord Ram has astounding and unlimited potentials is reiterated by saints and sages, as well as by the Purans and Upanishads which eulogize the holy name's powers and effects in no uncertain terms<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The immensity of the glory, the stupendous spiritual importance and the significance as well as the astounding mystical powers of Lord Ram's holy name have been enumerated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 19—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28.

As for the Upanishads, the divinity, holiness and glory of the name of Lord Ram have been enumerated in the following Upanishads:

(i) Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 4/1 to 4/47; (ii) Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse nos. 43-63; (iii) Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad, Canto 5, verse no. 7; (iv) Ram Rahasya Upanishad, Canto 2, verse nos. 1-106; (v) Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 1; and (vi) Kali-Santaran Upanishad, verse no. 2.

The following Puran and Ramayan too extol the glories of Lord Ram's holy name:

(i) Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 281, verse nos. 30-48. They were pronounced by Lord Shiva for the benefit of his divine consort goddess Parvati.

(ii) Anand Ramayan, Purva Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 32-51.

This author has written a book in English titled 'Glory of Lord Ram's Holy Name, Sacred Mantras, Stotras, Hymns & Prayers' that has an exhaustive presentation of a wide variety of classical books and scriptures on the subject of holiness of Lord Ram's divine Name. This book is available on the same internet platforms from where the learned reader has accessed the present book 'Ram Charit Manas'.]

santata japata sambhu abināsi. siva bhagavāna gyāna guna rāsi. 3.
ākara cāri jīva jaga ahahīm. kāsim marata parama pada lahahīm. 4.

Lord Shiva—who is the eternal Lord God, a treasury of bliss and joy, and an embodiment of Gyan and Gunas (spiritual wisdom, enlightenment and auspicious virtues respectively)—constantly and without a break repeats this holy name (of Lord Ram)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

There are four categories of Jivas (creatures; living beings)<sup>2</sup> in this world, and all of them attain emancipation and salvation if they leave their mortal coil (i.e. die) at the holy place known as Kashi (Varanasi)<sup>3</sup>. (4)

<sup>2</sup>From the perspective of this physical world where a living being is recognized by its physical gross body, there are said to be four types or categories of Jivas (living beings). They are the following:-

(i) Udbhij—these are those life forms that are born from seeds, such as members of the plant kingdom. These have only one Kalaa or aspect of the Atma called Anna Maye Kosh or Kalaa. In other words, they depend on food and become food for others higher up in the evolutionary ladder.

(ii) Swedaj—they are those which are born from dampness and sweat, such as fungi, algae, bacteria, germs, mosquito, lice, flies etc. They have two Kalaas, viz. Anna Maye and Pran Maye. That is, they are formed from food, they live for food and they die as food. Besides this, they also exhibit signs of life, e.g. the mosquito and lice have life like any other member of the animal kingdom.

(iii) Andaj—they are placed higher up in the evolutionary ladder, and are born from eggs, whether inside the mother's womb or outside. Such birds as pigeon, sparrow, parrot, peacock etc. come under this category. They have three Kalaas which are Anna Maye, Pran Maye and Mano-maye. The last Kalaa refers to the fact that such creatures have a mind and heart which enables them to think, albeit in a primitive level.

(iv) Jaruyuj—these are the creatures that are born as embryo that develops inside the mother's womb. Under this class come the animals such as horses, cows, dogs, elephants etc. They have four Kalaas, such as Anna Maye, Pran Maye, Mano-maye and Vigyan Maye. The last Kalaa refers to their ability to have a higher level of thinking ability called intelligence. The human being comes under this last category with the added benefit of having five Kalaas. Besides the four Kalaas mentioned above in other creatures of this category, the man has the fifth one and it called the Anand Maye Kosh. It is only possessed by a man and not by other creatures in the sense that the man can realise the true meaning of the terms 'bliss and happiness that is eternal and substantial' by the virtue of his attaining higher level of intelligence and his ability to delve into the secrets of the concept of truth itself and then realising that kind of happiness and bliss that is not superficial and which is not limited to enjoyment of the sensual pleasures of the body and the material comforts of the world, but which has a holistic and all-inclusive dimension that incorporates the spirit or the soul.

<sup>3</sup>Those who die at Kashi find liberation and deliverance for their souls because Lord Shiva, the presiding deity of this holy place, utters the holy name of Lord Ram in the dying creature's ears. This holy name is so powerful that once the creature hears it, it is sure to find salvation for itself. This fact is mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 119.]

सोपि राम महिमा मुनिराया । सिव उपदेसु करत करि दाया ॥ ५ ॥
रामु कवन प्रभु पूछउँ तोही । कहिअ बुझाइ कृपानिधि मोही ॥ ६ ॥ sōpi rāma mahimā munirāyā. siva upadēsu karata kari dāyā. 5.

rāmu kavana prabhu pūcha'um' tōhī. kahi'a bujhā'i kṛpānidhi mōhī. 6.

[Sage Bharadwaj said—] Oh the most exalted sage (Yagyavalkya)! This supreme form of death that a creature gets if it dies at Kashi (i.e. the reward of spiritual liberation, deliverance, salvation and emancipation) is also due to the divine glory and mystical powers of Lord Ram. It is because Lord Shiva utters the holy and salvation-providing name of Lord Ram in the ears of the dying Jiva, thereby providing it with immediate liberation and deliverance from the cycle of transmigration, which in effect gives its soul the benefit of salvation and emancipation. (5)

But I am confused (by the worldly deeds and acts of the Lord on the one hand, and these mystical powers and glories of the Lord as espoused by the Purans, the Upanishads and Lord Shiva himself; they seem to be contradictory and do not seem to add up). Therefore, I most humbly ask you this question: “Who really is Lord Ram?”<sup>1</sup>

Please be gracious and kind enough to explain this mystery to me properly. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Similar confusion was experienced by goddess Parvati, and Garud, who is the mount of Lord Vishnu. Both had doubts about two aspects of Lord Ram—whether he indeed was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being, and if it is so then why did he behave like an ordinary human being; why didn't he know who has stolen his wife, why did he wail for her, and why couldn't he kill her abductor by his simple wish instead of going all the way barefoot to Lanka and waging a bloody war to gain her freedom? Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 50; (ii) Doha no. 108 along with Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede it—with respect to Parvati, and (b) Uttar Kand, (iii) Doha no. 58 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it; (iv) Doha no. 68-b—with respect to Garud.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 66.

Whereas the doubts of Parvati were dispelled by her husband Lord Shiva, that of Garud by the saintly crow Kaagbhushund. In both the cases, the story of Ram Charit Manas was told and explained to them.

One 'Ram' I am aware of is the son of the King of Ayodhya (i.e. Dasrath). His life and deeds are well known in this world<sup>1</sup>. [It is because they have been repeatedly described in the many versions of the story of his life and time that is known as the Ramayan.] (7)

This 'Ram' had suffered a lot and wailed and grieved for his wife Sita<sup>2</sup> (when the Lord was sent to forest exile by his father on the behest of his step-mother, and where his wife was abducted by the demon king Ravana). He was so angry with her abductor, i.e. Ravana, that he killed him (in the famous war of Lanka)<sup>3</sup>. (8) the ‘Ram’ I have cited herein above (in the foregoing verses), or is he a different ‘Ram’?

You are truthful and a repository of true knowledge. [Therefore, there is no one better qualified and competent to answer my questions than you are.]

So please give due thought to my query and tell me about it to quell all my doubts and confusions. (Doha no. 46)

so oh gracious Lord, in whatever way my ignorance and delusions can be removed, please be kind enough to tell that story to me in detail.<sup>1</sup> (1)

Sage Yagyavalkya smiled in amusement<sup>2</sup> at Bharadwaj’s poser. He replied—‘You are aware of the majesty of Lord Ram. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati had also praised Lord Shiva as being all-knowing and truthful when said had asked Lord Shiva to tell her the divine story of Lord Ram in detail to remove her doubts, and explain all intricacies of the story to her along the way. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 107—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 108.}

A similar thing happened in the case of Garud too when he went to the saintly crow Kaagbhusund to ask the latter to remove his doubts about Lord Ram by telling the story of the Lord and explain all its intricacies in detail. First Garud praised Kaagbhusund, then asked the latter to tell him the story of Lord Ram, and at the end of this narration Garud thanked Kaagbhusund for removing all his doubts about Lord Ram. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Doha no. 63—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 64; and (ii) Doha no. 68—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 69.}

<sup>2</sup>Why did Yagyavalkya smile? Well, he thought to himself “I know that you, Bharadwaj, are an acclaimed sage of great wisdom and enlightenment. So it is obvious that you pretend to be confused, but I am sure you are not. I’ll explain why herein below in the following verse nos. 3-4! But nevertheless I am glad you asked this question, for it gives me an opportunity to dwell in depth and at length in the holy story of Lord Ram which will give peace to me as well as to you, and to all others who would hear it subsequently. It’s a privilege and an honour bestowed upon me to be a preacher of the divine story of Lord Ram; surely it is the Lord’s grace upon both you and me that he has inspired you to ask me this question, and has chosen me to be the narrator of the Lord's holy story. Thank you Bharadwaj for it; I bless you profoundly.”] cāhahu sunai rāma guna gūṛhā. kīnhihu prasna manahum̐ati mūṛhā. 4.

You are a devotee par-excellence of Lord Ram by your Mana (mind and heart), your Karma (deeds) and your Vaani (words; speech). [There is no doubt about it.] I have realized your ploy; you are indeed very clever! (3)

Actually, you want to hear in detail and in depth about the astounding glories, the holiness and divinity of Lord Ram that have profound meaning and implications. That is why you are pretending to be naïve and ignorant about it<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is because you feel that if you do not pretend to be ignorant and eager to learn about something few people know, then I may not preach and unfold this profound secret to you. You think that if you do not show eagerness and earnestness to know about Lord Ram's truth, I may think you are joking with me and teasing me, and so I may ignore you. That's why presumably you have assumed a face of utter ignorance and confusion that is just enough to sufficiently encourage me so that I would expound about this mystical theme for your spiritual benefit. Well, I understand, but I would have told you everything nevertheless as it is great privilege to remember and speak about the glories of Lord Ram, for this exercise in itself is a provider of extreme bliss, joy, happiness and peace to both the narrator as well as the hearer.]

तात सुनहु सादर मनु लाई । कहउँ राम कै कथा सुहाई ॥ ५ ॥

महामोहु महिषेसु बिसाला । रामकथा कालिका कराला ॥ ६ ॥

tāta sunahu sādara manu lā'ī. kaha'um̐ rāma kai kathā suhā'ī. 5.
mahāmōhu mahiṣēsu bisālā. rāmakathā kālikā karālā. 6.

Therefore dear (tāta), listen to it attentively with reverence and faith in your heart<sup>1</sup>. I shall narrate the story of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>, which is exceedingly pleasant and wonderful<sup>3</sup>. (5)

In this world, the great delusions, and its attendant confusions and doubts that overwhelm a creature (mahāmōhu), are like the huge demon that had the form of the great he-buffalo (mahiṣēsu bisālā). Lord Ram's sacred, divine and holy story (rāmakathā) is like the ferocious goddess Kali (kālikā karālā) who had slayed this horrifying demon<sup>4</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The importance of having faith, belief and reverence that are accompanied by the virtues of dispassion, self-restraint over passions, renunciation and other such spiritual practices has already been emphasized and explained earlier with reference to taking a bath in a holy River symbolizing the story of Lord Ram, as well as in Triveni, the confluence of three holy rivers in Prayag. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 43; and (ii) Doha no. 44 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva has also told a similar thing to Parvati when he told her the story of Lord Ram—that he is narrating it to her as he has found that she has great devotion and affection for Lord Ram, for it is evident from the fact that she wishes to remove all her doubts about the Lord so that her devotion and faith in him remains firm and steady, because doubts and skepticism create a crack in this foundation. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 128.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 52-b which explicitly reiterates this fact that Lord Ram's story is like nectar that is exceptionally refreshing for the mind and heart, and the ears are never satisfied by hearing it for they want to hear more and more of it.

<sup>4</sup>To wit, just like the case of goddess Kali easily killing this ferocious demon, Lord Ram's story too can easily eliminate all sorts of delusions that cause so much emotional suffering and spiritual misery for the creature.]

रामकथा ससि किरन समाना । संत चकोर करहिं जेहि पाना ॥ ७ ॥
ऐसेइ संसय कीन्ह भवानी । महादेव तब कहा बखानी ॥ ८ ॥

rāmakathā sasi kirana samānā. santa cakōra karahim jēhi pānā. 7.
aisē'i sansaya kīnha bhavānī. mahādēva taba kahā bakhānī. 8.

Verily, Lord Ram's divine story is like the soothing rays of the moonlight. Just as this moonlight gives immense joy to the bird known as Chakor (the Indian red-legged partridge) which finds immense joy and solace while it is surrounded by its rays, saintly souls too enjoy and feel exhilarated when they hear the story of Lord Ram and imbibe its spiritual nectar. (7)

A similar type of doubt about the reality of Lord Ram, the question 'who Lord Ram actually is', was expressed by goddess Bhavani (i.e. Parvati, the consort of Lord Shiva who is also known as 'Bhava'). At that time, Lord Mahadeva (Shiva, the Great God) had explained the reality (of Lord Ram) to her. (8)

दो०. कहउँ सो मति अनुहारि अब उमा संभु संबाद ।

kaha'um̃ sō mati anuhāri aba umā sambhu sambāda.
bhaya'u samaya jēhi hētu jēhi sunu muni miṭhi biṣāda. 47.

Now I shall tell you to the best of my ability about that conversation between Uma (another name of Bhavani) and Shambhu (Lord Shiva) in great detail.

I shall narrate for you when that conversation took place, and the immediate reason for this discourse<sup>1</sup>. Oh Sage, listen to it carefully, for it has the potential to remove your vexations and the cause of all your perplexities<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 47)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When did the conversation between Lord Shiva and Parvati take place, and what was the immediate cause of Parvati's bewilderment? These two questions are answered in the verses that follow herein below—i.e. from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 51.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, Lord Shiva's consort Uma was confused in the same way as sage Bharadwaj was about the reality of Lord Ram: whether the Lord was an ordinary human prince who went to the forest where he lost his wife Sita, and then he wondered here and there searching for her. Uma had asked Shiva a similar question as Bharadwaj has asked Yagyvalkyā here.

So, in order to reassure Bharadwaj and comfort him that he need not be ashamed at his confusion about the reality of Lord Ram which shows him in poor light because he is reputed to be an enlightened and wise sage, Yagyavalkya cited the example of Uma, who is a goddess and the consort of Lord Shiva. If she can be confused and deluded, then after all Bharadwaj is a human being, and so therefore there is nothing to feel guilty about and be ashamed of.

The story of how Uma got deluded about the truth and divinity of Lord Ram, the evil consequences of this delusion, and how Lord Shiva later helped her overcome this delusion and its attendant doubts and perplexities has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 121.]

चौ०. एक बार त्रेता जुग माहीं । संभु गए कुंभज रिषि पाहीं ॥ १ ॥
संग सती जगजननि भवानी । पूजे रिषि अखिलेस्वर जानी ॥ २ ॥

saṅga satī jagajanani bhavānī. pūjē riṣi akhilēsvara jānī. 2.

Once upon a time, during the age of Treta<sup>1</sup>, Lord Shiva went to the hermitage of sage Kumbhaj (or sage Agastya)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

The Lord (Shiva) was accompanied by Sati, his divine consort who is also known as Bhavani, and who is the great Mother of the entire creation. The sage reverentially worshipped him, knowing that he (Shiva) was the Lord of the entire creation. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Trētā juga:- This era is equivalent to 3600 divine years of Gods, and 12,96,000 human years. It is second era of the 4-era Hindu cycle of creation and destruction. It was during this Yug that Lord Ram manifested on earth as an incarnation of Vishnu, and it concluded when the Lord left the earth for his heavenly abode.

<sup>2</sup>Why did Lord Shiva choose to go to sage Agastya's hermitage to hear the divine story of Lord Ram and discuss the Lord's glory with him? Well, the plausible reason is that this sage was a great devotee of Lord Ram, no less than Lord Shiva himself. Agastya's devotion and faith in Lord Ram was exemplary, and Lord Ram had himself fell at the sage's feet to pay obeisance to him when they met in the forest during Lord Ram's visit to his hermitage. At that time, the sage has acknowledged that he is somewhat acquainted with the divinity and glory of Lord Ram, of course due to the Lord's grace upon him, but he had then asked the Lord to bless him with the ability to be able to narrate his divine glories to others. These facts are clear in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1, and 9-12 that precede Doha no. 12; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-13 that precede Doha no. 13.

So obviously therefore, Lord Shiva thought that amongst all the great sages of the time, sage Agastya was the most competent preacher of the story of Lord Ram—for Lord Ram had himself granted this boon to him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 13.

That said, let us now have a brief knowledge about who the great sage Agastya, also known as Kumbhaj, was.

Well, sage Agastya is a renowned sage who had composed several of the hymns of the Rig Veda, e.g. Rig Veda Sanhita, 1/166-191. He is known as a 'Brahm-rishi' or a celestial sage tracing his origin to the creator Brahma.

He was born to sage Pulastya and his wife Havirbhuk. During this birth, his other brother was sage Visrawaa. It is also believed that in the Swayambhu Manvantar (age of Manu named Swambhu), he was born as the son of sage Pulastya, but in that birth he was named Dattoli.

According to another version, he was the son of Mitra and Varuna. In this version, he was born in a jar or pitcher known as 'Kumbha'. Hence, he is also known as Kumbhaja (born out of a Kumbha), Kumbhodbhava (rising out of a Kumbha), Kalasi-suta (son born from a Kalas or a pitcher or jar). During this birth, his twin brother was sage Vasistha, the great sage who was the court priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya where Lord Ram was the king.

His wife was a princess of the kingdom of Vidharva, and her name was Lopaamudraa, also known as Kaaveri. The sage had a son whose name was Drudhaasya, also known as Idhmavaaha.

His chief disciple was Agniveshya.

Sage Agastya did severe Tapa and had vast knowledge. He is said to have destroyed the two demons named Ilvala and Vaataapi. The sage had stunted the growth of Mt. Vindhya which was growing and expanding endlessly so much so as to obstruct the light of the sun.

Once, when Indra had killed the demon Vrittaasur, other demons named 'Kaaleya' managed to escape and they hid themselves under the water of the ocean. From there they began terrorizing the sages and seers. They stayed under water during daytime and came out at night to torment and devour these sages, and generally cause nuisance and havoc all around. These demons had not spared even such renowned sages of the time as Vasistha, Chyavan and Bharadwaj, because the demons attacked their hermitages and killed the sages and seers who lived there. It was then that the Gods, led by their king Indra, requested sage Agastya to somehow expose the demons. At this, the sage had scooped up the water of the ocean in a cup made by joining the two palms of his hands and had drunk the water of the ocean in one gulp so as to expose the demons. The Gods were then able to destroy them.

This story is narrated in: (i) Skanda Puran, Nagar Khand, (ii) Padma Puran, Srishti Khand, and (iii) the epic Mahabharat, Vanparva. This feat of sage Agastya is cited by Goswami Tulsidas in his epic narration of the story of Lord Ram, known as the Ram Charit Manas, in its Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 256.

Some of the demons, however, managed to escape and hid themselves in the nether world. This is how the demon race survived then. However, when the ocean was completely dried up it created another problem for the world because countless marine creatures begin to suffer and die. Besides this, the ocean was the largest natural reservoir of water on earth. So the Gods requested sage Agastya to refill it. The sage replied that the water has been digested in his stomach, but he can oblige the Gods by reproducing the ocean in the form of urine. That is the reason, according to this legendary story of the Purans, why the ocean is salty and sour—because it is the urine of sage Agastya.

This fact, that the ocean is sour and salty because it is the urine of sage Agastya, is explicitly narrated in the Anand Ramayan (purported to have been written by sage Valmiki), in its Vilaas Kand (Chapter), ninth Sarga (Canto), verse nos. 18-24 where Sita explains to Lopaamudraa, the wife of sage Agastya, why Sri Ram had constructed the bridge in order to cross the ocean to reach Lanka. She explained that the Lord did not ask the sage to dry up the ocean once again by drinking its water because it would be unthinkable to ask the sage to drink his own urine. Even if the sage had actually drunk the water, the Lord would be heaped with the ignominy of being so selfish that he made a Brahmin drink his own urine so that his purpose is served. The Lord did not swim across the ocean because it would be insulting and extremely demeaning for the Lord to swim in urine, and it would also be improper for him to step across a Brahmin's urine because it is to be regarded as holy as the urine of a cow.

There is a legendary story how once sage Agastya had converted king Nahush as a serpent. The story goes that once Indra, the king of Gods, was demoted from his exalted stature due to the curse of killing some Brahmins, and king Nahush had taken his place. Nahush lustfully eyed the consort of Indra, named Indrani. To punish him, Brihaspati, the moral preceptor of Gods, devised a stratagem by which Indrani requested Nahush to come to her riding a palanquin that was never used by anyone earlier. Overcome and blinded by passions, Nahush forgot everything about propriety and probity, and he summoned all the great sages and seers of the time to act as carriers or bearers of his palanquin. Humble sages and seers did not mind because Nahush was now elevated to the stature of Indra, the king of Gods. Nahush was so eager to reach heaven as quickly as possible that he kept prodding and scolding these sages to walk faster. Enraged, astonished and peeved at this nonsense being perpetrated by the haughty king, sage Agastya had then cursed him to become a great and poisonous snake. This story appears in Mahabharat, Anushaashan Parva, 99-100.

Sage Agastya lived in the Dandakaaranya forest when Lord Ram met him. The sage had then given some invincible divine weapons to the Lord which stood him in good stead during the epic war of Lanka, as well as in overcoming the demons whom the Lord encountered and destroyed during his sojourn in the formidable forest.

The sage is said to have brought about reconciliation between Indra, the king of Gods, and Maruts, the Wind Gods.

A whole class of people came to be known after him, and in due course the term ‘Agastya’ became a title and sort of honour given to learned sages and seers who were experts in the philosophy and knowledge that sage Agastya was an expert in and had preached during his lifetime. The sage has been made immortal by finding a place amongst the brightest stars in the sky. He is identified with Canopus, which is the brightest star in the sky of south India. The Canopus has been named after this sage as ‘Agastya’, and seeing this star in the sky when the sun is in the middle of Virgo (Kanyaa) sign of the zodiac and worshipping him at night is regarded as an auspicious deed. This is a symbolic way of honouring the sage by elevating him to an exalted stature of a ‘bright star’ and recognizing his stellar qualities.

He is regarded as the one who had created the Tamil language of South India. He is accredited as being the author of several treatises on medicine, mysticism and magic. One of his books is the ‘Agastya Sanhita’ which elaborately deals with ritualistic forms of worship.

It is said that once sage Agastya and the noble king named Shankha had a divine vision of Lord Vishnu at the banks of river Swami-pushkarni.]

रामकथा मुनिबर्ज बखानी । सुनी महेस परम सुखु मानी ॥ ३ ॥
रिषि पूछी हरिभगति सुहाई । कही संभु अधिकारी पाई ॥ ४ ॥

rāmakathā munibarja bakhānī. sunī mahēsa parama sukhu mānī. 3.
riṣi pūchī haribhagati suhāī. kahī sambhu adhikārī pāī. 4.

The exalted sage narrated the divine story of Lord Ram in great detail, hearing which Lord Mahesh (Shiva) found immense sense of contentedness, happiness and bliss<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The sage in turn asked Lord Shiva to preach him about the virtue of Bhakti (devotion) for Lord Ram (known as “haribhagati”, for Lord Ram was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu who is known as ‘Hari’), for this narration describing the glories of Bhakti is very pleasant to hear and a bestower of beatitude, and which Lord Shiva willingly described as he found the sage eligible for this knowledge<sup>2</sup>.# (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The wise sage Agastya knew that Lord Ram was very dear to Lord Shiva, and therefore he concluded that the best way to please Shiva was to narrate Lord Ram’s story in detail. When an honoured guest arrives, the host would try his best to please him and entertain him. Lord Shiva was not an ordinary guest; he was the Lord of creation, “Mahesh”, the ‘Great Ish—Great Lord’. Naturally therefore he should be pleased with something that is the best, and nothing else was the ‘best’ than narration of the divine story of Lord Ram.

From the perspective of the narration of the story of Lord Ram as narrated in the epic book “Ram Charit Manas”, this communion between sage Agastya and Lord Shiva forms the basis, the background against which the story was revealed.

As we would discover in due course of time, Sati was not convinced with whatever Agastya said about the divinity and holiness of Lord Ram, and she harboured her grave doubts just as Bharadwaj had his. Sage Yagyawalkya had chosen this episode of Lord Shiva going to sage Agastya and the latter narrating the divine story of Lord Ram in the presence of Sati to reassure Bharadwaj that he need not feel guilty or ashamed at having some traces of ignorance in him because even Sati, the Mother of creation and the divine consort of Lord Shiva too had her own doubts and she too was eclipsed by the shadow of ignorance inspite of Lord Shiva, the greatest of all the gods and the wisest among them, being her husband and even trying hard to dissuade her from harbouring ignorance as this negative character undermines a person's nobility and wisdom. How Sati (Shiva's wife) was swept off her feet and fell prey to ignorance, and the consequences she faced will be narrated in due course in this story—from Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Doha no. 64.

<sup>2</sup>As a return favour, the sage asked the Lord (Shiva) to enlighten him about the pleasant and spiritually elevating virtues of “Hari-Bhakti” (devotion for Lord Hari, or Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being and Lord God of the world whose incarnation on earth was in the form of Lord Ram).

Lord Shiva had been so pleased with the sage and so obliged by him (because the sage had narrated the whole divine story of Lord Ram) that he told the sage the characteristic features of “Hari-Bhakti” as desired, realising that the sage was eligible to hear it.

A similar case was that of Kaagbhusund. Lord Shiva had revealed the divine story of Lord Ram to him when he found that Kaagbhusund is eligible to hear it. And the eligibility criterion in case of Kaagbhusund was that he had ‘devotion for Lord Ram’. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 30.

So we see two aspects of eligibility condition here that would make one dear to Lord Ram and deemed to be fit to be called a devotee of the Lord: one is having ‘devotion for Lord Ram’ which entitles a person to know the esoteric secrets of the story of the Lord as was the case of Kaagbhusund, and the other is ‘deriving joy and bliss by narrating the story of Lord Ram’ that entitles him to have devotion as was the case with sage Agastya.

What is the lesson we learn from it: It is that narrating and hearing the divine story of Lord Ram and having devotion for the Lord complement and supplement each other. They are like the two sides of the same coin. One devoid of the other reduces their true potential and spiritual value.

The concept of “Hari Bhakti”, meaning having undiluted devotion and a sense of absolute surrender and loyalty to Lord Hari, or Lord Ram, has been elaborately described at a number of places in Ram Charit Manas.

The concept of “Bhakti” has a very broad sweep, and it incorporates such glorious virtues as having, inter alia, sincere devotion, dedication and firm faith in the Lord God, total submission and surrender before the Lord God, having unwavering love, conviction and belief in the Lord God, to be completely dedicated to the Lord and surrender oneself to him, having reverence and veneration for the Lord God, having no other solace, succour, hope and respite except the Lord, treating oneself as a humble servant of the Lord God and feeling fortunate at being able to serve the Lord God, remembering the Lord God at all times and offering each and every deed done and action taken to the Lord without expecting anything in return, remaining unruffled and calm under all circumstances with the view that these are the wishes of the Lord God and one has no right to get overly excited over them. In brief, Bhakti entails honouring the divine forces of creation in the form of some chosen deity who personifies the grandest virtues in creation.

The Holy Bible explains the essence of Bhakti in very succinct words as follows — ‘In him we live and move, and have our being’ (Acts, 17/28), ‘Trust in him at all times, you people, pour out your heart before him; for God is a refuge for us' (Psalms, 62/8).

The Narad Bhakti Sutra, literally meaning the fundamental formula that defines what comprises devotion for Lord God as enunciated by sage Narad who was one of the greatest devotees of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Being, is a treatise on Bhakti that is succinct and is universally respected as being one of the best in its genre. It has only 84 Sanskrit verses.

It says that the easiest (verse no. 58) and the best instrument for God-realisation (verse no. 80, 81) is 'Bhakti' because it gives the spiritual fruit or reward for which a person does any auspicious effort in the first place (verse no. 26, 30). It is superior to Gyan (knowledge), to Yoga (meditation), to Karma (rituals and religious observances), and other spiritual traditions (verse no. 25). Bhakti is a complete and wholesome way to attain self and god realisation; it needs no other support or help (verse no. 59).

Bhakti gives eternal peace and bliss of the highest order (verse no. 60).

Bhakti is divided into two aspects—(i) Paraa Bhakti, and (ii) A-paraa Bhakti. The A-paraa Bhakti is divided further into (a) Gauna Bhakti, and (b) Mukhya Bhakti. The Paraa Bhakti is the aim of spiritual practice, while the A-paraa Bhakti is a means to achieve success in it.

Paraa Bhakti is attainment of extreme and eternal bliss obtained upon God-realisation which is equivalent to self-realisation because the Parmatma, the Supreme Soul and the cosmic Spirit, is the same as the individual's Atma or his own soul. It is like nectar, and gives immortality and supreme form of bliss (verse nos. 2 and 3); it helps eliminate worldly desires and temptations (verse no. 7).

The A-paraa Bhakti involves some methods to make this possible—such as having interest in worshipping the Lord (verse no. 16), having desire and interest in listening to the stories associated with the Lord (verse no. 17), to be engrossed in the thoughts of the 'self' or the Atma (verse no. 18), surrendering all deeds to the Lord and always remembering him (verse no. 19).

But it must be noted that Gyan or truthful knowledge of the reality is also conducive to attaining nearness or oneness with God (verse no. 28). In other words, Gyan and Bhakti go hand in hand; they aid each other instead of conteraacting one another (verse no. 29). Bhakti is the only way that leads to Mukti—liberation and deliverance from this world of transmigration leading to permanent rest for the soul (verse no. 33). Bhakti helps one to break free from the shackling effects of this deluding and entrapping world (verse no. 33).

The methods by which Bhakti can be established and made to bloom in one's heart are narrated in verse nos. 34-42 as follows—to abandon attachments to material sense objects and sensual pleasures of this world, to desist from self gratification of the sense organs (verse no. 35), to do Bhajan—or the constant remembrance of the Lord, his divine name and divine deeds (verse nos. 36, 79), to hear and sing the divine stories, the virtues and the holy name of the Lord along with others in the community (verse no. 37), to have contact and communion with holy men such as great saints (verse no. 38-39, 42) which is obtained when the Lord is kind (verse no. 40), to treat true devotees of the Lord as being equivalent to the Lord himself (verse no. 41), to offer all the deeds and their fruits or rewards to the Lord (verse no. 61) along with any trace of negativity such as desires, anger, pride etc. that may still linger on (verse no. 65), and in general doing everything that is auspicious and holy which makes it possible for him to enhance his level of Bhakti (verse no. 76).

Other aids to Bhakti are the following—Abandonment of the feeling of worldly happiness and joy on the one hand, and of sorrow, misery and grief on the other hand, eliminating any sort of desires and passions such as for gain or profit of any kind, and to be careful not to waste a single moment and be prepared for death that may come any time (verse no. 77). Practicing the virtues of ‘Ahinsaa’ (non-violence), ‘Satya’ (truthfulness), ‘Shaucha’ (cleanliness and purity), ‘Dayaa’ (mercy and compassion), and ‘Aastikta’ (belief in God and the Holy Spirit as well as the teaching of the scriptures) etc. (verse no. 78).

The main obstacle in Bhakti is bad company (verse no. 43), as well as Kaam (wordly desires and passions), Krodh (anger) and Moha (infatuations, attachments, delusions, entanglements) that lead to Smriti-bhransa (failure to remember the horrible consequences of committing sins and getting entangled in the world), Buddhi-naash (destruction of intelligent thinking and wisdom), and Sarwa-naash (complete ruin) (verse no. 44).

Maya (the web of delusions so characteristic of this world) is a great obstacle and it is overcome only by detachment from all things (verse no. 46). Other methods of overcoming Maya are to live a serene life away from the world (verse no. 67), to break all worldly fetters and bondages, to become neutral by rising above the three Gunas of Sata, Raja and Tama, and to discard attempts to acquire and then worry about the protection of worldly possessions (verse no. 47), to not bother about the fruits of one’s deeds and labour but do one’s duty as ordained by destiny, peacefully and stoically (verse no. 48), and to abandon even the Vedas (excessive study of the scriptures once the basic knowledge and guidance has been obtained) and become free from all doubts, confusions, perplexities and consternations (verse no. 49).

One must avoid the following also—talking about or remembering anything pertaining to women, material wealth, hearsay and talks that create doubts in the mind about the truth of the Holy Spirit, talks about one’s enemies or those who are unfavourable—because all these things unnecessarily create vexation for the spirit (verse no. 63); negative characters such as Abhmaan and Dambha (pride and arrogance accompanied by deceit, conceit and pretensions) etc. (verse no. 64); getting involved in worthless debates and arguments (verse no. 74).

The ‘Gauna’ Bhakti is like a dumb man attempting to describe some delicious food (verse no. 52)—i.e. it is a silent form of devotion for the Lord which has no external signs. Here, the devotee sips the nectar of spiritual bliss that comes with self and god realisation without showing any signs of his spiritual enlightenment. It can be experienced and never be described; nothing more remains to be attained or desired for after that (verse no. 54).

The ‘Gauna Bhakti’ is of three types (verse no. 56)—(i) Saatvika, (ii) Raajsik, and (iii) Taamsik. These are also called ‘Aarta-bhakti’, ‘Arthaaartha-bhakti’, and ‘Jigyaasu-bhakti’. Gauna Bhakti is easy because it does not require any effort as it is done directly by having natural love for the God that arises in one’s heart. It leads to internal peace and bliss (verse nos. 58-60).

A true and sincere devotee of the Lord acquires a holy aura around him which makes him effuse divinity and holiness similar to the Lord, thereby making their presence beneficial for the whole world around them (verse no. 68-71). Like the universality and oneness of the Supreme Being, Supreme Spirit, the Supreme Truth and the Supreme Reality, such realised devotees of the Lord have no distinction as to their caste, religion, knowledge, physical form, birth, level of worldly prosperity or poverty, or the type of deeds done by them—because they have risen above such mundane considerations (verse no. 72-73).

The 9 types or paths of Bhakti, called the 'Navadhaa Bhakti', according to Ram Charit Manas, are the following:- (1) hearing about the Lord's virtues, glories, deeds, fames, holy name etc.; (2) talking and discussing about the Lord; (3) remembering him; (4) serving his holy feet; (5) adoring and worshipping him; (6) honouring and revering him; (7) submission and humility before him, treating him as a friend and companion; (8) concentrating on one's pure-self or Atma; (9) and treating the Atma (soul) as being the manifestation of the Lord.

Tulsidas has used this 'episode of Shabari' to elucidate on the concept of 9-fold path of Bhakti in the holy book's Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 35, till Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 36.

The importance of 'Bhakti' has been emphasized by Lord Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 86, to Doha no. 87 Ka.

#A very interesting observation can be made here. Lord Shiva is the one who had originally conceived the story of the Ramayan known as "Ram Charit Manas". From him it came to the knowledge of Kaagbhusund, and from the latter to sage Yagyavalkya. Later on it spread far and wide and became commonly known.

When this good word reached Shiva that the divine story of the Ramayan which he had revealed is benefiting a large number of Jivas and aiding in their spiritual welfare, he surely felt happy and contented. After all, all good things and all good words need to be shown the light of day and helped to be spread for the long-term good of the society and mankind, while all bad things need to be buried and concealed for they cause harm to the world at large.

So first Lord Shiva was glad, but after some thought he wondered if the real intent and purpose of the story, which was to spread spiritual bliss and provide succour and solace to the Jiva's tormented soul and help them develop devotion for Lord God amidst the world's churn and flux, is being truly fulfilled or not. Is the integrity of original story maintained, or has it been diluted, corrupted and deformed during its transmission and propagation from one sage to another, from one preacher to another, from one listener to another, from one generation to another.

Therefore, Lord Shiva wished to verify facts and ascertain whether the story Kaagbhusund narrates is true to the original version he (Shiva) had revealed to him, and whether or not any distortion has crept in the story amongst those who had heard it from Kaagbhusund and narrated it to others down the line. For Shiva feared that usually this happens, because often times the preacher is not correctly understood by his disciple who grows up to become a preacher himself, and therefore the wrong understanding percolates down the line to corrupt the next generation of preachers who tweak and twist the original version either due to their lack of grasp of the original story when they had first been taught by their own teacher, or due to the desire to please the audience which compels them to add a pinch of spice to the story, thereby ruining its pristine purity and authenticity.

Hence, Lord Shiva first went to hear it from Kaagbhusund. He was satisfied that it is indeed the same story he had conceived earlier in his Mana. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Doha no. 57.}

He was absolutely sure that Yagyavalkya cannot distort it for he was the most enlightened and the wisest sage of that time. There were however chances that those who have heard it from him or other sages may have injected some novelty in the story to spice it up. So he decided to check it from a third preacher who was preaching this story to others but who had not directly heard it from Yagyavalkya as was the case with Bharadwaj. So, Lord Shiva went to sage Aastya to hear the divine story of the Ramayan being narrated. He heard it attentively and was satisfied. It filled him with spiritual solace, joy and bliss as he expected the story to do. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 48; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 51.}

But there was a problem with sage Agastya. What was it? Though it is true that his narration of the story of the Ramayan was correct to the last dot, the sage could not develop the virtue of 'Bhakti' or devotion for Lord Ram inside his inner-self, something which is the main objective of preaching, listening and reading this story. The wise sage acknowledged this shortcoming in himself, and asked Lord Shiva to preach him about 'Bhakti' so that he becomes fulfilled and feels fully rewarded for having heard the Ramayan himself and endeavouring to spread the good word by preaching it to others. Shiva willingly obliged the sage. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 48.}]

Then after some time, Lord Tripurari<sup>3</sup> asked the sage to give him permission to leave, and then went to his own abode (at Mt. Kailash)<sup>4</sup> along with the daughter of Daksha<sup>5</sup> (i.e. Sati, his consort). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva is known as the “Lord of the mountains” as he has his permanent abode in Mt. Kailash, one of the holiest peaks of the mighty mountain range of the Himalayas.

<sup>2</sup>When Lord Shiva had once gone to the hermitage of saintly crow Kaagbhusund disguised as a swan in order to hear the narration of Lord Ram’s divine story, the Lord had stayed there also for many days—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 57.

Once when the crow saint Kaagbhusund had gone to the hermitage of his own guru he had stayed at the latter’s place, hearing the divine story of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 113.

<sup>3</sup>Demon Tripurasur/Tarakasur—Tarakasur (pronounced as ‘Taara-kaa-sur’) was the son of Vajraanga and his consort Varaangi. He had done severe Tapa (austerity and penance) as a result of which the creator Brahma had granted him several boons which had made him invincible. He was killed by Lord Subramanya, the son of Shiva and Parvati. He had three sons—Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali. They had also pleased Brahma and by his blessings built three great cities, collectively called ‘Tripura’. These cities were made of gold, silver and iron. These three demon brothers were collectively called Tripurasur—the demons of the three cities. When they became a nuisance for the Gods, Shiva destroyed these three cities and the demons with one arrow. Therefore he got the name of Tripurari—one who destroyed the three enemy cities.

The story of Tripurasur with a slight variation is narrated in Bhagwat Mahapurāṇ, 7/10/53-58. According to it, once when the demons were defeated by the gods, they went to take refuge with the greatest demon of them all, the mighty demon named ‘Maya Daanav’. He was the one who had created the golden city of Lanka for Ravana.

Maya Danav created three huge planes made of gold, silver and iron. These planes were so huge that they resembled entire cities and were well provided for with all the things necessary for comfortable living. Maya Daanav handed them to the three chief demons named Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali who were said to be the son of Tarkasur. The special quality of these planes was that they were hidden from view and flew stealthily. Emboldened by being invisible, the demons went on the rampage, plundering and laying to waste the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the sky. The gods could not fight them as these demons were invisible. Besides this, these three city-like planes had a pond of nectar each, the contents of which made the demons invincible and beyond the reach of death.

Frustrated and flabbergasted, the gods approached Lord Shiva to get rid of the demons. Lord Shiva invoked his specially empowered arrow known as the 'Pashupatastra'. When shot, it produced countless arrows spewing fierce tongues of flame. Though these arrows burnt the three cities or planes ("Tripurs"), the demons however managed to survive by taking a dip in the pond of nectar that was present in each of the three places.

Confused, Lord Shiva invoked Lord Vishnu, the maverick Lord who knows every trick in creation as he is the Supreme Being, to find some solution. Vishnu disguised himself as a cow and made the Creator Brahma a calf. They went to these ponds and drank the nectar. The demons were so dazed by the Lord's Maya (delusion creating powers) that they could not respond and react. After that, Vishnu prepared for the great war—creating the chariot from Dharma (righteousness), the charioteer from Gyan (knowledge), the war standard from Vairagya (renunciation), the horses from Aishwarya (fame and might), bow from Tapa (penance), the body armour from Vidya (skills), arrows from Kriya (deeds and dynamism), and all other paraphernalia of war by employing other mystical powers he had.

Then, on an auspicious moment of the asterism of "Abhijit" (conquer now), Lord Shiva rode this chariot and burnt the three cities by a single arrow.

According to the Ramayana of Valmiki, Baal Kand, Canto 75, two great bows were made from the bones of Dadhichi. One was known as "Sarang" and the other was known as "Pinak". The former was held by Lord Vishnu, and the latter by Lord Shiva. Vishnu killed the demons with his Sarang bow, while Shiva used his Pinak to destroy the three cities.

Another version of who the demon "Tripurasur" was appears in Skanda Puran, Aawantya Reva-Khand. It says that the son of the demon king Bali was known as 'Baanasur' (pronounced "Baanaa-sur"). He had thousand arms. He worshipped Lord Shiva for a thousand years. Pleased with him, Lord Shiva asked him to seek a boon, upon which Baanasur requested the Lord to provide him with a city that is so invincible that none of the gods can ever conquer it, except of course by Lord Shiva whom he had worshipped as his deity. Shiva granted him his wish.

The cunning Baanasur then decided to please the other three gods of the Trinity, i.e. Lords Vishnu and Brahma. So he worshipped them one by one and extracted similar boons from them as he had done from Shiva. Once done, he now had three invincible cities that symbolized his sway and domain covering the three dimensions of creation—viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world. Then he went mad with recklessness, plundering and pillaging at will. Terrified, the gods approached Lord Shiva as he was the one who had initially blessed Baanasur, and also because the demon had himself exempted Shiva from the boon of immunity from destruction. Then, Shiva stringed his bow called Pinak, mounted an arrow called Aghor, and angrily shot it at the three cities ruled by Baanasur. This arrow instantly burnt and reduced the three cities to ashes. Their residue fell in the holy river Narmada. Then Baanasur fervently prayed to Lord Shiva to be pleased with him and give him abode in his own divine Loka known as the 'Shiva-Loka', the divine abode of Shiva in the heaven.

The Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 14 describes that Lord Shiva is also known as the slayer of the demon Tirpurasur. Hence, Shiva or Rudra is also called Tripurari. The three cities ruled by Tripurasur symbolised the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world.

It was the occasion when Lord Hari (Vishnu) had revealed himself as a human being (in the body of Lord Ram) in the family lineage of king Raghu in order to eliminate the burden of the earth<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The imperishable and eternal Lord (i.e. Lord Vishnu as Lord Ram) was wandering at that time (i.e. at the time when Shiva was on his way to his own abode from the hermitage of sage Agastya) in the dense and un-inhabitable part of the forest known as Dandak<sup>2</sup>. The Lord had renounced his kingdom and had gone to the forest attired like a hermit on the instruction of his father (Dasrath)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Sortha/Doha no. 183—to Doha no. 192. Briefly, the demons, led by their king Ravana, had wreaked havoc on earth, killing and plundering innocent living beings and committing horrendous crimes. Peeved and disgusted, Mother Earth and the Gods prayed to Lord Vishnu to save them. The Lord promised them that he will descend to earth as a human being in the form of Lord Ram and take birth in the royal household of Dasrath who had done severe Tapa in his previous life and had requested the Lord to become his son. So, two birds would be killed with a single stone as it were—Dasrath's desires would be fulfilled, and the demons would be eliminated at the same time.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram's stay in the Dandak forest has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 46 which marks the end of this Kand.

<sup>3</sup>The episode of king Dasrath being forced to agree to give his unwilling consent to send Lord Ram to 14 years of forest exile due to family intrigue having its origin in the selfishness of his third wife Kaikeyi who had thrown a tantrum is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Doha no. 12—to Doha no. 79.]

As Lord Har (Shiva) was on his way home, he kept wondering how he would have an opportunity to get a divine glimpse of the Lord (Sri Ram) here (in the Dandak forest). The Lord (Vishnu) had taken a birth as a human being secretly (in order to eliminate the demons), and though it was a secret for others, but every enlightened person (such as sages and seers) was aware of this fact. (Doha no. 48 Ka)

[Note—The fact that Lord Vishnu had come down to earth in the form of Lord Ram was kept a secret because otherwise if the demons got a hint it would be impossible to get rid of them. Only those who had great spiritual powers were aware of the Lord's incarnation. Lord Shiva was obviously privy to this because it was he who had directed the Gods and Mother Earth to pray to Lord Vishnu to overcome their problems—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 185; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 48 Kha herein below.]

tulasī darasana lōbhū mana ḍaru lōcana lālaci. 48 (b).

Lord Shiva's mind and heart were highly uneasy and anxious<sup>1</sup>, but Sati was not aware of the reason why it was so.

Tulsidas says that Lord Shiva's Mana (mind and heart) was overcome with apprehension and he was on the horns of a dilemma. On the one hand his eyes were eager to have a divine Darshan (viewing) of Lord Ram, and on the other hand he did not want to reveal the true identity of Lord Ram by first showing his eagerness, and then when the opportunity actually arrived, by paying his obeisance to the Lord (Ram) and bowing at his feet (because these actions would let the cat out of the bag, as it were). (Sortha no. 48 Kha)

(i) Lord Ram had gone to the forest in order to fulfil his promise to the gods that he would eliminate the demon king Ravana, and for this the Lord had to suffer a lot personally by having to wonder in the wild forest infested with wild beast and demons. Lord Shiva loved Lord Ram so much that he had enshrined the Lord's image in his heart like one enshrines a deity in a temple. Shiva was pained to see his beloved and revered Lord Ram wondering barefoot in the wild and undergoing all the hardships that are associated with life in the dense forest. This is one reason why Shiva became uneasy when he saw Lord Ram wandering in the Dandak forest as mentioned in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 48 herein above.

(ii) Shiva was worried that the enemy of the gods, i.e. the demon king Ravana, was his (Shiva's) ardent devotee, and the irony is that Ravana was to be killed by Lord Ram whom Shiva worships. This was a piquant situation. What would happen if Ravana comes to know of this fact, or if Ravana approaches Shiva to help him against Ram in the epic war at Lanka? Should Shiva go to Lord Ram while he is alone in the secluded part of the forest and discuss this problem with him, or should he desist from it?

(iii) The other reason for Shiva's restlessness was that he was anxious whether or not he (Shiva) would get an opportunity to meet his Lord, Sri Ram, and pay his obeisance to him without the world knowing it. Shiva did not wish to let the secret about Lord Ram's true identity to be leaked because that would warn the demons. But at the same time he did not want to miss this golden opportunity to have a divine glimpse of Lord Ram while he was all alone in the forest. This was the reason for his anxiety and restlessness for he did not know how this will come about without divulging the secret—because when anyone came to know that Lord Shiva had personally bowed before Ram and paid his obeisance to him then it would be easy to conclude who Ram actually was as everyone knew that Lord Ram is Shiva's revered Lord God whose holy name Shiva keeps repeating at all times, Shiva could not openly go and visit Lord Ram because, for one, Sati was with him and there was a fair chance that she would chatter about the Lord's incarnation and reveal the secret to others. Shiva could not even stop midway indefinitely on his journey to his abode in Mt. Kailash through the path of the sky, and so it was very uncertain if he would ever have the chance to see Lord Ram in the short span of time while he was passing overhead the forest through the path of the sky. It could only happen if Lord Ram himself decides to create a favourable circumstance where it becomes possible for Shiva to see the Lord somewhere in the open area of the forest.

As we shall read shortly, this indeed happened. Lord Ram obliged Shiva by appearing on an open stretch of the forest path to enable the latter to see him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 50 herein below.]

jaum̐ nahim̐ jā'um̐ raha'i pachitāvā. karata bicāru na banata banāvā. 2.

[Shiva was lost in thoughts. On the one hand the true identity of Lord Ram had to be kept a secret, and on the other hand this golden opportunity of having a divine view of the Lord cannot be allowed to be missed. So, Shiva was thinking as follows—]

‘It was concluded (i.e. decided after close scrutiny and analysis) that the demon king Ravana could only be killed by a human being, and the Lord wished to make the words of Vidhi (the creator Brahma), given as a boon (to Ravana), truthful<sup>1</sup>.

(This was the reason for Lord Hari becoming a human being in the form of Lord Ram.) (1)

On the other hand, if I (Shiva) do not go to have a Darshan of my revered Lord (Sri Ram), then I will regret forever for missing this opportunity.'

Thus, Shiva was on the horns of a great dilemma, not being able to decide what to do and what not to. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 177. Ravana had done severe Tapa, and when Brahma appeared before him to grant his wishes, Ravana asked that he may not be killed by anyone else except a human being and a monkey. Brahma had said 'okay' with a rider: he told Ravana that everyone who has been born must die one day, and even he, Brahma, had his life-span determined before he came into existence. So, if the boon is to be made effective then Ravana must ask for some exceptions of his choice. Ravana had thought that if he could conquer the gods, and especially the 'death god', on the strength of the boon of immunity from death as granted by Brahma, then it would be impossible for such weaklings as humans and monkeys to ever stand against him and harm him. So he told Brahma that he decided to exempt humans and monkeys from the blanket of immunity of his death. Lord Vishnu exploited this loophole in the shield of immunity from death granted by Brahma to Ravana and became a human being in the form of Lord Ram, while the rest of the gods became monkeys to help the Lord successfully kill Ravana. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 187 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 7-9.]

[Verse nos. 3-7 describe the moment when Lord Shiva got the opportunity to see Lord Ram.]

In this way (as narrated in previous verses), Isha (Lord Shiva) was lost in deep thoughts.

During that period of time it so happened that the ten-headed demon king Ravana [3] had taken Marich with him who transformed himself as a golden deer (when the two reached the hermitage of Lord Ram in the forest, at a place near the banks of river Godavari) [4]. (3-4)

The wicked fellow (Ravana) deceitfully stole (kidnapped) Vaidehi (Sita, the daughter of king Videha of Janakpur, and the wife of Lord Ram) because he (Ravana) was not aware of the immense powers and potentials of the Lord (Sri Ram). (5)

Lord Hari (Ram) returned to the hermitage with his younger brother (Laxman) after having slayed the imposter deer (i.e. Marich disguised as a golden deer). When he saw that the hermitage was empty (because Sita had been abducted by Ravana), the Lord's eyes were filled with tears. (6)

Lord Ram, the king of the Raghu dynasty, was overcome with grief and anxiety. Thereafter, the two brothers went out in the forest to search for Sita. (7)

[Note—This entire incident is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 26—to Doha no. 28; and Chaupai line nos. 1-17 that precede Doha no. 30.

The story in brief is as follows—While Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita lived in Panchavati, a demoness named Supernakha was infatuated by the beauty of Lord Ram. She disguised herself as a beautiful lady and approached Lord Ram with a proposal of marriage. When the Lord refused, she became furious. Then the Lord ordered Laxman to cut-off her nose and ears as punishment. She went to her brothers, Khar and Dushan, to complain, and the duo collected their demon army to attack the hermitage of Lord Ram to avenge their sister's humiliation. In the battle that ensued, all the demons were killed.

Then Supernakha went to Ravana to instigate him to take revenge. Ravana went to Marich and forced him to accompany him to Panchavati so that he could kidnap Sita, the wife of Lord Ram to settle scores with the Lord. Marich became a golden deer to lure Sita who wished to have this wonderful deer when she saw it. Lord Ram went very far away in an attempt to catch it, and finally shot the deer with his arrow. While dying, Marich called out for Laxman. When Sita heard the name of Laxman being called out, she thought that Lord Ram was in danger. She forced Laxman to go out and help his brother. Once Laxman had gone, Ravana approached Sita disguised as a mendicant. When Sita came out to give alms to him, Ravana grabbed her and forcibly put her on his chariot to take her away to be kept in captivity at Lanka, his capital city.

Lord Ram and Laxman returned to find the hermitage empty. Then the Lord behaved like an ordinary man, grieving and lamenting at the loss of his wife. The two brothers set out in the wild to search for her.

This entire episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 17—to Doha no. 28; and Chaupai line nos. 1-17 that precede Doha no. 30.

It was at this time that Lord Shiva saw his revered Lord Ram wandering in the forest.]

The answer to the question “why did Lord Ram behave in such a way that made him look like a man who is passionate and tied to the world with fetters of worldly relationships” is found in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 17 that precedes Doha no. 30; and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 39.

These verses say in essence that this peculiar behaviour of Lord Ram, who was supposed to be above all worldly relationships and immune to emotional outbursts, is because he wanted to act his role as a human being to perfection, thereby signaling the natural traits in everyone born as a man, and secondly to show at once how a passionate man behaves vis-à-vis a man who practices courage and resilience.]

Lord Raghupati's (Sri Ram's) deeds and his behaviour is very mysterious and beyond comprehension. Only the very wise and enlightened are able to decipher and understand them correctly. For the ignorant, those who are overcome with delusions, and those who are utterly stupid, these events are interpreted in the wrong light, and they harbour misgivings about the Lord in their hearts. (Doha no. 49)

[Note—The less enlightened think that Lord Ram was a human being who was grieving for his kidnapped wife, but those who are wise know that it was a clever trick by the Lord to keep the demons in the dark about his true identity of Lord Vishnu who had to find an excuse by which to confront the demons and eliminate them. Sita, who was an incarnation of goddess Laxmi, was hidden in the fire element and what Ravana took away was merely her shadow. Besides this, Lord Ram had voluntarily made Sita to be stolen by Ravana so that the Lord could find an excuse to fight with her abductor and punish him by killing him in the battle that would ensue to rescue her from captivity.

This is very clear in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 23—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 24; and Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 27.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 113—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 119 where Lord Shiva himself removes the doubts about the authenticity of Lord Ram's divinity when he had preached Parvati, his divine consort who had asked Shiva to enlighten her about the reality of Lord Ram.]

 bhari lōcana chabisindhu nihārī. kusamaya jāni na kīnhi cinhārī. 2.
 jaya saccidānanda jaga pāvana. asa kahi calē'u manōja nasāvana. 3.

Lord Sambhu (Shiva) saw Lord Ram at that time<sup>1</sup>, and this vision made him extremely exhilarated in his heart. (1)

The magnificent sight of Lord Ram made Shiva so ecstatic with joy and bliss that his eyes were filled with tears of happiness and delight. Shiva filled his eyes with this beautiful sight of Lord Ram who was like an ocean of magnificence and beauty<sup>2</sup>. [That is, Shiva watched the enchanting form of Lord Ram to his heart's content, and till his eyes were fully satisfied with the view.]

But he (Shiva) refrained from introducing himself to Lord Ram to meet him personally to pay his obeisance to the Lord of his heart and exchange greetings, as this was not the proper time to do so<sup>3</sup>. (2)

So, Shiva merely saluted Lord Ram mentally, exclaiming—"Glory to the Lord who is Sacchidaanand (eternal and supreme Consciousness that is truthful, and a repository of exemplary spiritual blissfulness), and is the one who makes the world purified and clean of all sins and negativities."

Saying thus, Lord Shiva, who had vanquished Manoj (Kamdeo-cupid)<sup>4</sup>, went ahead on his way (to his abode in Mt. Kailash). (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>At which time did Shiva see Lord Ram? The answer is given in previous verses, in Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 48, and Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 49 herein above.

A very interesting point to note here is this—Lord Ram had gone southwards, towards Panchvati in the Dandakarnya forest and onwards to Lanka, from sage Agastya's hermitage (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 15-18 that precede Doha no. 13), while Lord Shiva was heading towards his abode in Mt. Kailash which lies in the northern Himalayan mountain range—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 103).

How did, therefore, Shiva saw Lord Ram? Well, the answer is that Lord Ram had been searching for Sita in the whole of the forest known as Dandak (refer: Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 30), and naturally he must have been at a spot north of the sage's hermitage when Shiva was passing overhead in the sky.

It is also possible that Lord Shiva had himself taken a detour and was wandering in the sky roughly around the area where Lord Ram was wandering on ground—in an apparent effort to see the latter.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Vishnu's divine sight is so fulfilling for the eyes that anyone who sees the Lord is mesmerised by his enchanting and bewitching form. Vishnu is so enchanting and captivating to look at that it appears that he is like an endless ocean of beauty. This fact has been reiterated elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, when Manu and his wife Satrupa had prayed to the Lord, and the Lord had revealed himself before them, the couple were enthralled by the Lord's fabulous sight which was like an ocean of beauty and charm—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 148.

And the question 'how beautiful was Lord Ram that Manu and Satrupa were dazed?' is answered at the same place, viz. Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 148.

It was the same form that has now mesmerised Lord Shiva.

<sup>3</sup>Why was it not the proper time to meet Lord Ram? The answer is that it was essential to keep Lord Vishnu's incarnation as Lord Ram a top secret so that the Lord's mission of elimination of demons could be accomplished successfully. The demon king Ravana had to be killed by Lord Vishnu in the disguise of a human being (refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 49 above), and if it was revealed that Lord Ram, whose wife Sita was stolen by Ravana, was Lord Vishnu in his form, the whole planning would crumble. The demons must be kept in the dark about the true identity of Lord Ram, and if Shiva went to bow before Lord Ram and pay his respects to him, the demons would immediately come to know of this because surely they must have kept watch over the movement of Lord Ram after their king Ravana stole Sita. The cat would be out of the bag, and this was something which had to be avoided at all costs.

Obviously, if Shiva went to meet Lord Ram, there would have been a lot of showing of respect and affection between the two, such as mutually bowing their heads and paying respects to each other. It would have been impossible to keep the identity of Lord Ram concealed as Shiva would not bow to anyone except the Supreme Lord of creation.

Earlier in Doha no. 48 herein above we have already read that Shiva was very eager to have a divine vision of Lord Ram but was not sure how it would come to happen. Then we read that even as he walked towards his abode, his mind was occupied with this thought—whether he would be able to see Lord Ram, and whether it would be alright to meet the Lord and see him up close—refer: line no. 1 of Doha no. 48 Ka above.

It is always wise to have patience when the time is not proper ("Kusamaya")—this principle is observed by Parvati's mother later on in the story when she had refrained her emotions at the time of departure of her beloved daughter with Shiva after their marriage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 102.

चले जात सिव सती समेता । पुनि पुनि पुलकत कृपानिकेता ॥ ४ ॥

calē jāta siva satī samētā. puni puni pulakata kṛpānikētā. 4.

Lord Shiva, accompanied by Sati, went on moving ahead on his path (for reasons explained above), but the body of the Lord, who is an abode of kindness, graciousness and mercy, was getting repeatedly thrilled all along the way (as he remembered the divine sight of Lord Ram he had just seen a while ago). (4)

[Note—Shiva was moving ahead towards his abode in Mt. Kailash, but his thoughts were fixed on Lord Ram. It ought to be noted here that Shiva was the greatest devotee of Lord Ram, and in fact this story of Ram Charit Manas was conceived by him in his Mana (heart and mind) and then was first revealed by him to his consort Uma—refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 30; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 33; (iii) Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 104; (b) Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 3; (c) Uttar Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 128; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 129; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 130.]

 bha'ē magana chabi tāsu bilōkī. ajahum' prīti ura rahati na rōkī. 8.

When Sati observed this emotional condition of Shiva, she was confused and great doubts sprouted in her heart.<sup>1</sup> (5)

She thought to herself—‘Lord Shankar (Shiva) is the Lord of the world (“Jagdish”) to whom the whole world pays its obeisance and whom the world worships. All the gods, the humans, the sages and seers bow their head before him (Shiva). (6)

The same Lord (i.e. Shiva) has bowed his head to the son of a king (“Nrip-sut” = the “king’s” “son”) and exclaimed that the latter was “Sacchidaanand” and “Pardhaam” (i.e. he is eternal, truthful and the supreme abode of spiritual bliss, as well as the supreme destination of the soul). [How is it possible?] (7)

Not only this, Shiva had also become so enchanted by the sight of this prince (Lord Ram) that he has been dazed since then. Shiva is so lost in the thoughts of Ram and is so much thrilled that he seems to be overcome with affection for the prince, and this affection does not seem to abate at all. It rather seems to overwhelm him. [I am utterly confused, as Shiva is a renunciate god and he is not easily charmed by anything at all, let alone by the beautiful form of a human being. Besides this, Shiva is an enlightened god and the wisest amongst them. So, his odd behaviour has become a mystery for me.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—This confusion in the mind of Sati shows that she wasn't paying attention to the discussion between her husband Lord Shiva and sage Agastya as narrated earlier in Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precedes Doha no. 48. The two had been discussing at length about the divinity of Lord Ram and had narrated the story of the Lord during the course of this discussion.

This state of immaturity of Sati's mind will come to the fore once again a little later when she would assume the form of Sita, the stolen wife of Lord Ram, and walk in front of the Lord to find out if he is able to recognise her as Sati, or thinks that she is Sita. In the latter case it will be proved that Ram was an ordinary prince, but should he recognise her as Sati then it will be certain that he is indeed the Lord whom Shiva worships. In her zeal to determine the reality of Lord Ram, Sati forgot that to assume the form of Sita would be in violation of ethical norms, and that Lord Shiva would not like her doubting his wisdom and assuming the form of the divine consort of the Lord whom her husband worships. Assuming the form of Sita would mean trying to cheat Lord Ram on the one hand, and assuming the form of another person's wife would be betrayal of loyalty vows with her own husband, Lord Shiva. It would be a compounded crime, a deceit that would be multiplied two times over.

It is pertinent to note here that Sati's questions to Lord Shiva about who Lord Ram actually was is the basis of the telling of the entire story of the Adhyatma Ramayan written by sage Veda Vyas—refer: Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto no. 1.

Besides this, this entire episode of Sati getting deluded regarding the authenticity of Lord Ram's divine form is narrated in detail in 'Shiva Puran, Rudra Samhita', in its Canto no. 24. Incidentally, this Puran (ancient mythological history), as its name suggests, is entirely dedicated to the theme of Lord Shiva.

brahma jō byāpaka biraja aja akala anīha abhēda.
sō ki dēha dhari hō'i nara jāhi na jānata bēda. 50.

Does it make sense to assume that Brahm, the supreme Lord of creation—who is all-pervading, omnipresent and immanent ("Vyaapak"), is immaculate and holy ("Viraj"), is eternal and without a birth ("Aja"), who is free from all physical and perceivable attributes and qualities associated with this creation ("Akal"), who is free from having desires and ambitions (“Aniha”), is uniform and without distinct parts (“Avedha”), and is so mysterious and mystical that he is beyond the reach of the knowledge of the Vedas (i.e. whom even the great scriptures have not been able to know and define)—will ever take the gross form of the body of a human being? (Doha no. 50)

[Note—Sati was confused because the virtues of Brahm are in sharp contrast with and opposite to those of a human being. There is no comparison between the two. None of the attributes of Brahm are applicable to a human. So, thought Sati, why would Brahm volunteer to demote himself to the lowly stature of a human being?

Even if it is assumed that Brahm had to eliminate the scourge of the evil demons, he could do it by his mere wish as he is the almighty and all-powerful “Supreme Being”, without the need to come down on the earth and undergo all the hardships and sufferings like an ordinary man. How can Brahm wail and grieve for a woman like Ram is doing for his abducted wife Sita? Why would Brahm have to take a birth and grow up like a man when he can simply reveal his divine form anywhere and in any shape he wants? Does not Brahm, who is all-knowing and all-pervading, even know where Sita is that he has to go and search for her in the wilderness like a man as Ram is doing?

None of the external deeds and behaviours of Lord Ram show that he is Brahm, then why did her husband Shiva bow before him, and why was he so enchanted by the sight of Lord Ram that he had lost awareness of everything else? Sati was confounded as she could not understand it!]

sambhugirā puni mṛṣā na hō'ī. siva sarbagya jāna sabu kō'ī. 3.

[Sati thought to herself—] ‘Supposing it is true that Lord Vishnu has taken the form of a human being (as Lord Ram) to protect the interest of the gods and help them (by eliminating the demons), but then it is well known that Vishnu is also omniscient and wise like Tripurari (Lord Shiva). (1)

This being the fact, why would he (Vishnu in the form of Ram) then wander aimlessly in search of his wife like an ignorant man? After all, Vishnu is an abode of all knowledge, he is the Lord of Laxmi (the goddess who is Vishnu’s divine consort) who is inseparable from him, and is the invincible enemy of the demons.

[Given these facts, it is unbelievable that Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram would not know where Laxmi in the form of Sita is, that he would have to suffer separation from Laxmi who is supposed to be eternally inseparable from him, and that Laxmi would be so weak and lacking in mystical powers that she could not protect herself from a demon who would easily kidnap her like an ordinary woman.] (2)

Nevertheless, the words of Shambhu (Lord Shiva)<sup>1</sup> cannot be wrong, because everybody knows that he is all-knowing and wisest.' (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What were the words of Shiva? The answer is found in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 50 herein above. Shiva has saluted Lord Ram and pronounced that the Lord is 'Sacchidaanand', and 'Jag-Paawan'—i.e. Lord Ram is eternally truthful, pure, divine and an abode of spiritual bliss, as well as the one who purifies the world of its impurities. These are the characteristics of Lord Vishnu. This being so, Lord Ram cannot be equated with ordinary human beings. But his behaviour contradicts these facts, and on the face of it Ram does not appear to bear any resemblance to Vishnu.

These negative thoughts bore heavily in the mind of Sati, and left her bewildered.]

jadyapi pragaṭa na kahē'u bhavānī. hara antarajāmī saba jānī. 5.

There was a great deal of bewilderment in the Mana (heart and mind) of Sati, leaving her confused and perplexed. In spite of great effort to reassure her own self, wisdom did not emerge in her heart and she could not calm herself down because of these doubts and confusions<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Although Bhavani (Sati) did not openly expressed the confusions and doubts that were deluging her mind and heart and taking a heavy toll of her peace, Lord Har (Shiva) became aware of it as he is 'Antaryaami', i.e. he knows the internal thoughts of all; nothing is so secret as to be hidden from the Lord<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer similar idea expressed in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 50 herein above.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 93 that says having unwarranted doubts has a stunning affect on a man's wisdom, and it causes so much perplexities and confusions in him as if he has been bitten by a serpent.]

<sup>2</sup>Sati had acknowledged that Shiva is omniscient in Chaupai line no. 1 herein above. Nothing could be hidden from him.]

sō'i mama iṣṭadēva raghubīrā. sēvata jāhi sadā muni dhīrā. 8.

Thus, Shiva told Sati (even though she did not ask the Lord for any clarification as she was afraid to do so lest her husband would be annoyed at her impertinence and stupidity)—‘Look Sati. Your temperament is like an ordinary woman (though you are a goddess in your own right and my consort who is supposed to be above such delusory thoughts). It is not good and wise to harbour such baseless doubts in one’s heart (as they do more harm and serve no purpose whatsoever).<sup>1</sup> (6)

He whose divine story had been narrated by sage Kumbhaj (i.e. sage Agastya), and the virtues of whose Bhakti (devotion and submission) I had explained to the sage a short while ago<sup>2</sup> [7],---

---It is the same Lord Raghubir (Sri Ram, the brave warrior of the dynasty of king Raghu) whom I adore as my revered deity (“Iṣṭha-Dev”—इष्टदेव) and who is constantly being served (worshipped) by wise, learned and realised sages to whom I have bowed my head and paid my obeisance a little while ago [8].

[In other words, the warrior prince before whom I bowed and upon whom you have cast your doubts is the same Lord Ram whom I worship as my revered deity. He is not an ordinary warrior prince of the Raghu dynasty as you think him to be. Have wisdom, and refrain from falling prey to falsehoods and temptations of Maya—the Lord’s maverick power to create delusions. It won’t help you in anyway.] (7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In other words, you behave like an ordinary woman who is full of doubts, and is habituated to question the wisdom and actions of her husband. You are a goddess, and have been living with me for so long. You have always accompanied me whenever I had gone to some sage’s hermitage to discuss spiritual and metaphysical topics. You have always observed that I meditate upon Lord Ram and his holy name and form. You also know that I am immune to delusions and don’t play fools around with nonsensical things. You are well aware of the level of my wisdom and intellectual prowess, and the fact that gods and their patriarch, the creator Brahma, have often approached me when they themselves could not find an answer to confounding issues faced by them.

Therefore, it is incongruous for you to doubt my wisdom when I declare my faith, devotion and allegiance to Lord Ram.

---He whose endless, immeasurable and eternal glories are being sung and lauded continuously by the Vedas and Purans, but still the scriptures fail to understand and define him in entirety, thereby declaring that he is “Neti-Neti”<sup>1</sup> (not this; not this—or that ‘whatever has been said of the Lord is not a sufficient description of his true glory nor of his true identity, for it evades description and understanding’) [2]---

---It is the same Lord Ram who is Brahm (the Supreme Being), the all-pervading, omnipresent and immanent Lord of the whole universe, the Lord of Maya (i.e. the delusory powers of creation), in a personified form<sup>2</sup> [3]---

---Who has manifested himself, out of his own free will, in a divine form as the gem-of-a-prince in the family of king Raghu (“Raghu-kul-mani”) for the welfare and good of his devotees<sup>3</sup> [4]. (Chanda line nos. 1-4)

Sati had raised two questions—one was that Lord Ram was not Brahm, and the second was that Brahm does not incarnate as a human being: refer—from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 2 that follows this Doha. Lord Shiva has addressed her doubts in the above verses, saying that “Lord Ram is indeed Brahm”, and then giving the reason “why Brahm became a human being”.]

Though Lord Shiva repeatedly told her the reality of Lord Ram, his wise words had no effect upon Sati whose heart did not accept the reasoning. She remained stubborn in her disbelief. [Sati wasn't convinced about what her husband had said.]<sup>1</sup>

Understanding in his heart about the stupendous power and the immense influence that Lord Hari's (Lord Vishnu's) Maya (delusion-creating powers) can have upon a person's wisdom<sup>2</sup> (thereby totally eclipsing it, and hence making him or her susceptible to falling an easy prey to delusions and ignorance), Lord Mahesh ("the Great God", Lord Shiva) smiled wryly and said<sup>3</sup>—(Sortha no. 51)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar situation has arisen elsewhere in the narration of Ram Charit Manas when we read that the great sage Narad, who is supposed to be a great devotee of Lord Vishnu and above passions and worldly emotions, too had not paid attention to Lord Shiva's advice to him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 127.

The context in Narad's case was that once he had been so deeply submerged in mediating upon Lord Vishnu that Kamdeo (cupid), the god of passions, could not detract the sage in spite of his best efforts to do so. This achievement filled Narad with a sense of pride, and he went to Lord Shiva to boast of his achievement. It was then that the Lord told him that whatever he had said before him was alright, but he should not go and repeat his boast before Lord Vishnu as the latter is sure to punish him. Narad did not take this advice in the correct light, and thought that Shiva wishes to keep him quiet so that his stunning feat remains obscure so that the world would believe that Kamdeo was defeated by Shiva alone as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 83—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 88.

As in our present case of Sati suffering due to her disobeying Shiva, Narad too had to suffer horrible ignominy when Lord Vishnu turned him into an ugly faced monkey—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 133; and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 134.

<sup>2</sup>The power of Maya is extremely strong. It has held under its spell even the wisest and the most learned, and deluded them so much as to portray that they were utterly stupid and ignorant.

It is averred in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 72 that Maya is so powerful that it makes the world dance to its tune—this is the proclamation of the saint-crow Kaagbhusund.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand—(i) Doha no. 41; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precedes Doha no. 59; (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 71; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 116.

The Atharva Veda's Pashupat Brahm Upanishad, Uttar Kanda/Canto 2, verse no. 9-10 describe the effects of Maya, verse nos. 15-18 the relationship between Maya and the Atma, and verse nos. 33, 44-45 the fact that Maya is a voluntary creation of the Atma as well as of Brahm.

Sage Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan, in its Lanka Kanda, canto 14, verse nos. 28-29 describe the relationship between Maya and Brahm.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 132 where we read that Lord Vishnu had smiled at the ignorance and delusions that engulfed the wise sage Narad as a result of the influence of Maya of the Lord.

Lord Ram's Maya is so great and powerful that it had provoked even Sati, the otherwise truthful consort of Shiva, to "tell a lie"—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 56.]

Shiva told Sati—'If you have so strong doubt (that inspite of my trying to tell you the truth you still do not seem to be convinced), then why don't you go and examine the truth for yourself?'<sup>1</sup> (1)

In the meantime, I will sit calmly here under the shadow of a banyan tree (the Indian Fig tree)<sup>2</sup>, and wait till you come back to me. (2)

Use your wisdom and apply intelligence and careful thought<sup>3</sup> to do whatever you think is necessary that would help you to overcome your doubts. [Because harbouring doubts is not good for anyone. Doubts make a person restless and it robs the peace of the mind and heart.]' (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva thought that since Sati has been overcome with doubts and has even begin to question her husband's wisdom, then in this situation no matter how hard he tried she cannot be convinced. So it's better to let her examine the truth herself. In a sort of way, there is a lesson in this episode: it is wise for an intelligent person not to get agitated when his best of advice has no effect on the mind of a person whose intelligence and wisdom have become eclipsed. In this situation it is better to let go and retain one's calm.

Another lesson is that when a person becomes stubborn and refuses to hear even his best well-wisher, as we see presently in the case of Sati disbelieving her own husband, it is better to stop arguing and let the other person have his or her way so that he or she learns the lesson the hard way. As we shall see soon, Sati discovers to her horror that what her husband, the wise and all-knowing Lord Shiva, has said about Lord Ram was actually the truth, but by the time she had committed certain errors which were unpardonable.

The consequences were severe for Sati, and it finally led to her being abandoned by Shiva—not so much as for disbelieving him as for her telling lies to him (Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 56) on the one hand, and on the other hand having the temerity and irreverence to attempt to cheat Lord Ram by assuming the visible form of Sita (Baal Kand, Doha no. 52). Sati forgot that Sita is worshipped by Lord Shiva as the Mother Goddess because he worships Lord Ram as the Supreme Lord of creation. How could Sati expect Shiva to accept her again once she has played the role of Sita (Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 56)?

When one begins to doubt even the best of teachers and advisors, when one thinks that everyone else is a fool except himself or herself, then such a person is doomed to suffer as Sati had learnt the hard way—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 59—and Chaupai line no. that follows this Doha.

<sup>2</sup>The banyan tree, the Indian Fig tree, is liked by Shiva, and whenever the Lord sits down to relax or meditate, it is under the shadow of this tree—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 106.

Even in Shiva's abode in Mt. Kailash, there is a banyan tree under which he sits to rest and meditate—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 58.

The banyan tree is the preferred one under the shade of which saints and sages gathered to talk on religious and spiritual matters. It has a broad girth and a wide area is covered by its shadow, allowing a large gathering to assemble under its shade. It is also regarded as an auspicious tree.

Even the saintly crow Kaagbhusund used to tell the divine story of Lord Ram under the shadow of a huge banayan tree—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precedes Doha no. 57. Once, Shiva had himself gone to hear Lord Ram's story at Kaagbhusund's place (Uttar Kand, Doha no. 57 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-10).

<sup>3</sup>Shiva has already warned Sati to be careful as to how she tests the reality of Lord Ram. Sati should use 'wisdom, intelligence and prudence', and not do anything that violates the basic tenets of Dharma. But the irony is that she was so deluded that she did—one, she assumed the form of Sita to cheat Lord Ram (Baal Kand, Doha no. 52), and second she came back and told lies to her husband (Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 56).]

calīm satī siva āyasu pā'ī. karahim bicāru karaum kā bhā'ī. 4.

Thus, after getting the orders from Lord Shiva, Sati went to test the truth and reality about Lord Ram. But she was so confused that she did not know how to do it. So on the way she kept pondering, 'What should I do now?' (4)

[Note—Sati has shown lack of wisdom from the very beginning. First and foremost, she could not pick up the truth inspite of hearing the discourse between the learned sage Agastya and Lord Shiva—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 51.

Then she did not believe her own husband inspite of knowing that Shiva was the most exalted God of creation, and that he never says a lie—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 50; and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 51.

Thirdly, when Shiva told her to go and find out the truth herself in a wise manner, she should have at least asked him to guide her how best to test the truth about Lord Ram—but she didn't do it. This is because she had already doubted the wisdom and had questioned the intelligence of Shiva.]

इहाँ संभु अस मन अनुमाना । दच्छसुता कहूँ नहिं कल्याणा ॥ ५ ॥
 मोरेहु कहें न संसय जाहीं । बिधि बिपरीत भलाई नाहीं ॥ ६ ॥
 होइहि सोइ जो राम रचि राखा । को करि तर्क बढ़ावै साखा ॥ ७ ॥

 hō'ihī sō'i jō rāma raci rākhā. kō kari tarka baṛhāvai sākḥā. 7.

Back here (from where Sati had left Lord Shiva sitting under the banayan tree), Lord Shambhu (Shiva) concluded that Sati is bound to commit some mischief and suffer its consequences. He thought, 'The daughter of Daksha<sup>1</sup> cannot have any welfare anywhere. (5)

Her doubts were not dispelled inspite of my attempts to tell her the truth. It appears that the creator is ill-disposed towards her and the stars are opposed to her well-being. These are bad omens and they portend harm for her<sup>2</sup>. (6)

What is the use of unnecessarily debating and contemplating upon things which are beyond one's reach and grasp; what is the benefit of uselessly creating imaginary trees with their extended branches for things? It's best, therefore, to leave the fate and whatever is to happen in the unknown realm of the future in the hands of Lord Ram, for ultimately it is the Lord's wish that shall prevail. [So, there is no point in worrying unnecessarily]' (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is clever to use the phrase “daughter of Daksha” for Sati. Daksha, Sati's father, was also egoist, stubborn and arrogant by nature. He also lacked wisdom and could not understand that Lord Shiva was not merely his son-in-law by the virtue of marriage of his daughter Sati with him, but is the “Mahadeva”, the greatest of all the gods, the most enlightened and powerful among the entire lot. So Daksha harboured ill-will against Lord Shiva and did not think twice before insulting the Lord. Daksha was so stupid that he did not realise that if Lord Shiva did not pay heed to his insulting behaviour it was not that the Lord was afraid to take revenge or was afraid of Daksha, but it was because Shiva was immune to such gross emotions as feeling elated at being honoured or angry at being insulted as he was beyond such things being a renunciate ascetic and an extremely self-realised god amongst the pantheon of gods. Daksha held Shiva in very low esteem and had boycotted him during the fire sacrifice when offerings are supposed to be made to all the gods without exception—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 62.

Being his daughter, Sati inherited many of her father's traits—one being stubborn, and the other to treat Shiva to be of a low intellect. We shall soon read that inspite of learning the hard way that what her husband Lord Shiva had told her with respect to Lord Ram being the absolute truth, she continued to disobey Shiva and doubt his advice. When the Lord advised her against going to participate in the fire sacrifice organised by her father Daksha because she won't be welcome, Sati did not pay heed to him and was adamant to go. Of course, she faced scorn and taunts there, and finally, being unable to bear with the insult, she had burnt herself in the fire sacrifice—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 62—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.

Sati has also been addressed as 'the daughter of Daksha' later on in this narration in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 55 where it is said that she 'was so dazed by the magical sighting of numerous images of Lord Ram in his Viraat form that for a moment she felt giddy and her senses were numbed, leading to her being blinded for sometime'.

<sup>2</sup>And this was the 'harm' that Sati suffered—she not only was overwhelmed with guilt that made her lose her mental peace and face (refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precedes Doha no. 55; Doha no. 57 ka; Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 58; and Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 59), but she also acquired ignominy for herself in the annals of history as a stubborn and stupid woman who did not obey her wise husband (refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 59). She also had to suffer being abandoned by her husband (refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 56; and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 58), and ultimately burn herself in the fire sacrifice at her father's place, resulting in the ruin of the whole family when Lord Shiva sent his follower named Birbhadra to punish Daksha and destroy his fire sacrifice (refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 65).]

अस कहि लगे जपन हरिनामा । गई सती जहँ प्रभु सुखधामा ॥ ८ ॥

asa kahi lagē japana harināmā. ga'īm satī jaham̃ prabhu sukhadhāmā. 8.

Saying so (or, deciding in the manner as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 5-7 herein above) to himself, Lord Shiva began repeating the holy name "Ram" of Lord Hari (i.e. Vishnu—because Lord Ram was Vishnu's incarnation)<sup>1</sup>.

Meanwhile, Sati went to the spot on the ground where the Lord (Ram), who is an abode of happiness and bliss<sup>2</sup>, was present. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva repeated the holy name of Lord Ram to find peace and solace because this holy name of the Lord is a well-recognised universal formula for attaining abiding bliss and tranquillity of the soul.

When Lord Shiva reached Mt. Kailash, his abode in the Himalayas, he sat down under the shade of a banayan tree to meditate, and we learn that the holy name he used for this purpose was "Ram"—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 58; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precedes Doha no. 60; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19.

In fact, Lord Shiva adores this name of Lord Ram so much because he knows its astounding spiritual powers:

(i) It is on the strength of this holy name that he had gulped the horrible poison known as 'Halaahal' that was produced at the time of the churning of the ocean (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 19).

(ii) It is on the strength of this holy name—known as the 'Tarak Mantra' because it can take the creature across the mundane world consisting of a continuous cycle of birth and death together with their accompanying horrors, a world which is compared to a vast and limitless ocean—that Lord Shiva provides a dying creature with the reward of liberation and deliverance when he utters this holy name of “Ram” in his ears (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19).

<sup>2</sup>It is important to use the epithet “Sukha-Dhaamaa” (i.e. an abode of happiness and bliss) here to remove misgivings about the true nature of Lord Ram who is acting his part of being a human to perfection by wailing and lamenting the loss of Sita, and wondering gloomily in the forest in search of her as if he is an ordinary man overcome with grief and distress. The reader ought to understand that Lord Ram has to do this because he is an expert actor and leaves nothing to chance. How will we judge an actor? Well, the only criterion for judging any actor is the perfection with which he plays the role assigned to him. Here, the Supreme Lord is playing the role of a prince whose wife has been abducted by an unknown enemy in the forest. What is he expected to do in this situation—sing and dance merrily?!!]

Sati repeatedly thought to herself what is to be done (to ascertain whether or not Lord Ram is the divine Lord Vishnu in a human form as advised by Shiva). Finally she decided to test the truth of Lord Ram by assuming the illusory form of Sita, and having assumed this form she started to walk ahead on the path on which Lord Ram was going in search of Sita. (Doha no. 52)

[Note—Sati decided to assume Sita's form because she thought that if Lord Ram is indeed the all-knowing Lord Vishnu as Shiva had told her, then surely he would see through the illusory form of Sita that she has assumed, and would recognise her to be Sati instead.

If Lord Ram, on the other hand, cannot see through her illusory form and falls for the trap, thinking her actually to be Sita, then in this case it would be established beyond doubt that Ram has no insight or divine powers to see behind a veil of deceit, that he is not all-knowing and omniscient as Shiva had proclaimed him to be. In other words, Lord Ram was an ordinary human prince, and therefore her doubts about him are true. This implies that Shiva was wrong and she was correct.]

kahi na sakata kachu ati gambhīrā. prabhu prabhā'u jānata matidhīrā. 2.

#When Laxman saw Uma in her disguised form (as Sita)<sup>1</sup>, he was astonished and flabbergasted. His heart was puzzled<sup>2</sup> because it was most unexpected. (1)

But he did not say a word because he thought that there was some very serious matter that defies his mind. Knowing about the Lord's (Sri Ram's) stupendous abilities and powers as well as his mystical ways, he decided to keep quiet and watch.<sup>3</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The first point to note here is that Laxman has become aware of Sati's true identity. What to say of Lord Ram who is all-knowing, even his fractional form Laxman could not be deceived by Sati.

Another important point to note here is that the word used for Shiva's consort is "Uma" and not "Sati". This is very crucial here. 'Uma' was the daughter of Daksha Prajapati, and like her father she too was arrogant and overcome with delusions. Even Shiva has addressed her as "the daughter of Daksha" in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 52 to indicate this fact.

On the other hand, the word "Sati" means one who is immaculate and pure, one who is devoted and loyal towards her husband. How can one expect such a woman to disbelief her loving husband who is giving a good advice for her own good, and how can one expect a true Sati to assume the form of another person's wife as Uma has done here by becoming Sita?

<sup>2</sup>Laxman was very surprised and perplexed as he had never imagined in his wildest of imaginations that Lord Shiva's consort would stoop so low and do this mischief. She has fallen low because she wasn't a 'Sati' now, but was 'Uma', the daughter of Daksha, and had inherited the low intellect and wisdom of her over-jealous and ill-advised father.

<sup>3</sup>Surely there must be some very serious matter with which he is not aware. And so Laxman thought that it was wise and prudent for him to keep quiet lest he would make a clown of himself like Uma.

#There is another way of interpreting these verses, and they have a spiritual message. Laxman was puzzled when he saw Uma, but Lord Ram would not be at all as we shall read below shortly in the verses that follow. The metaphysical implication of this development is that a Jiva (a living being), represented by Laxman, is confused when he sees so many stunning sights of the world. The Jiva is unable to decide what is true and what is false. So it is best for him to maintain his calm and leave everything in the hands of the Lord God whom he worships, because the Lord knows the truth and what is best for the Jiva. This spares the Jiva from getting tormented by a lot of problems that are avoidable. He is not subjected to unnecessary restlessness and tensions.]

sumirata jāhi miṭa'i agyānā. sō'i sarabagya rāmu bhagavānā. 4.

The Lord of the Gods (“Sur-Swaamy”, i.e. Lord Ram) immediately came to know about the deceit of Sati because he is all-knowing, and therefore knows the inner thoughts of all (as he lives in the inner-self of everyone as the Atma, the Soul). (3)

Lord Ram is the “Bhagwan” (the Supreme God) by remembering whom all ignorance and delusions are removed; he is the “Bhagwan” who is all-pervading and omniscient. (4)

[Note—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 257 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 where sage Vasistha has reiterated exactly the same thing.

Even Lord Shiva has reiterated this sentiment in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 39.

We also find that when Sita has asked Lord Ram to go fetch the golden deer for her, the Lord got up to run behind the illusive deer, knowing fully well that he was a demon named Marich in disguise, that all this was destined to happen as a prelude for Sita’s abduction by Ravana, and that nothing was surprising in it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 27.

Other similar reference is found in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 6 where sage Atri has honoured Lord Ram by affirming that Lord Ram knows the inner thoughts of all as he is “Antaryaami”—one who lives in the heart of all living beings.]

सती कीन्ह चह तहँहुँ दुराऊ । देखहु नारि सुभाव प्रभाऊ ॥ ५ ॥

nija māyā balu hr̥dayam̐ bakhānī. bōlē bihasi rāmu mṛdu bānī. 6.

Look at the nature of a woman and the way it affects her thinking and behaviour that even Sati (who is supposed to be of an immaculate character and wise as she is the consort of Lord Shiva, the wisest of all the gods and the greatest devotee of Lord Ram) had chosen to play a cunning trick with Lord Ram (who is the all-knowing Lord of Gods)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Meanwhile, Lord Ram praised in his heart the wonderful strength that his Maya (delusion-creating powers) has, and the magic it can play<sup>2</sup>. So he smiled<sup>3</sup> and said politely (to Sati)--- (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Chaupai line no. 5 is the comment of the author, Goswami Tulsidas. He means that a woman is easily led astray by delusions so much so that she would not believe even her own husband once an idea gets its hold on her mind.

A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 47 in the context of Kaikeyi who was so overcome with selfishness that her sense of rationality and probity took a severe beating, and she decided to send Lord Ram to forest so that her son Bharat could ascend the throne, not realising the turbulence this stubbornness would bring upon the whole family and the kingdom.

Once again, it is said in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 162 that “even the creator Brahma (“Vidhi”) is not able to understand the nature of a woman and how she would react”.

<sup>2</sup>Even Lord Shiva had realised that it was the Lord’s powerful Maya that has got its hold on Sati’s mind so that she has become so stubborn and irrational—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 51.

Later on, when Sati told Shiva a lie that she hasn’t tested Ram, Shiva again wondered at the powerful force of Lord Ram’s Maya that prevailed upon and instigated Sati to commit the unpardonable sin of telling a lie to her husband—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 56.

When Hanuman met Lord Ram later on in the story in Kishkindha Kand, he too could not recognise the Lord due to the deluding powers of Lord Ram’s Maya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 2.

<sup>3</sup>Why has Lord Ram smiled? Because he is in awe of his own Maya and the powerful delusions it can create. It is a wry smile, a sort of a teasing smirk with taunted lips. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 51; and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 132.

We shall read later on in Ram Charit Manas that when sage Sutikshan asked the Lord that he be allowed to accompany him to the hermitage of sage Agastya, the Lord had smiled and given his assent. It is because here also Sutikshan has used cunning so that he can be in the company of Lord Ram by saying that he hasn’t met his guru Agastya for quite some time and it is an opportunity to go and meet him with Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 12.

To wit, whenever someone uses cunning tricks with the Lord to serve his or her own agenda, Lord Ram smiles because he knows the real intention.]

kahē'u bahōri kahām̐ bṛṣakētū. bipina akēli phirahu kēhi hētū. 8.

The Lord (Sri Ram) joined his palms and reverentially bowed before Sati, introducing himself by his own name and that of his father (king Dasrath). (7)

Then he politely asked her, ‘Say, where is ‘Brishketu’ (one of the names of Lord Shiva)? Why are you (i.e. for what reason are you) wondering alone in the dense forest?’ (8)

[Note—The very fact that Lord Ram bowed his head and then introduced himself by not only saying his own name but being more specific by adding the name of his father shows that he was kind of teasing Sati. He subtly reprimanded her by saying in effect that since she was so stupid that she didn't know who he (Ram) was in spite of Shiva telling her all essential elements associated with the Lord as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and its following Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 51, it will be better if she is properly introduced with the prince she has come to examine, complete with all the identity credentials such as his own name as well as the name of his father so that no confusion is left in her mind as to which “Ram” she is meeting.

This introduction also signalled to Sati that Lord Ram has recognised who she actually is, that he knows that she isn't Sita. So, her trick hasn't worked!

Lord Ram was in a human form, and as such by bowing before Sati and holding his hands together in his front as a sign of showing great respect to her is a message to the rest of the world as to how one should treat a lady.]

When Sati heard these polite but significant words of Lord Ram (which clearly indicated that he has recognised her, and has even smiled at her nuisance and idiotic behaviour), she felt very uneasy and confounded.

Afraid out of her wits (as she realised her folly and the grave consequences that she would have to face now), Sati started on her return journey to where Mahesh (Lord Shiva) was (waiting for her to return). On the way, her heart was overcome with immense regret and consternation. (Doha no. 53)

[Note—We observe here that Sati did not have the courage to answer Lord Ram's question asked in verse no. 8 that precedes this Doha—“Where was Lord Shiva, and why was she loitering alone in the forest?”

First, she was already very nervous as she knew deep within her heart that by defying her enlightened husband, Lord Shiva, she was committing a grave sin. This was compounded when all her pretensions were bared naked and she was sort of unmasked. She had failed miserably in the test she so confidently set out to take, and what answer would she now give to Shiva upon return when he asked her how she fared. She was utterly stunned and confounded.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 58.

The lesson to learn here is about the horrendous consequences of falling in the trap of Maya. One must be wary of Maya.]

jā'i utaru aba dēha'um'kāhā. ura upajā ati dārūna dāhā. 2.

Sati was overwhelmed by contrition and regret. She lamented internally, and muttered to her self, 'I had not obeyed the words of Lord Shankar (Shiva), and in my stupidity and folly I had cast the shadow of my ignorance on Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Now, what answer shall I go and give him (Shiva)<sup>2</sup>?

These thoughts filled her heart with immense dismay and worry, tormenting it intensely and setting it literally afire by the worries of the consequences she would now have to face for her stupidity and impertinent behaviour. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati was extremely perturbed. She had disobeyed her husband, Lord Shiva, despite his repeated attempts to make Sati see reason (refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 51), which in its self is a grave sin. This is obviously because she had thought that he is less wise than she is in spite of witnessing how reverentially sage Agastya had welcomed and respected her husband, Lord Shiva in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 48.

To compound the matter further and make it worse, she had cast her ignorance upon someone, i.e. Lord Ram, who was praised unanimously by both sage Agastya as well as her husband Lord Shiva as the Supreme Lord of creation—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 50; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 along with Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 51.

<sup>2</sup>Her fears were not unfounded as we shall read below that as soon as she reached Lord Shiva, he immediately asked her how she had examined the reality of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 55. The confounded Sati was at her wits end, not knowing what to say: should she tell her husband the truth that she had committed a grave error by questioning his wisdom and asking for forgiveness, or should she cook up a story to hide her stupidity and consternation, trying to pretend that she had never actually doubted her husband, but that she had just wanted to have a divine glimpse of Lord Ram from close quarters, so she had devised this device as a ploy to go and meet the Lord to pay her personal obeisance to him. However, it turned out that the all-knowing Lord Shiva saw through her lies, and being too merciful to outright punish her for this sin of disobeying him and questioning his assertion about Lord Ram, he decided to neglect her instead and stop treating her as his divine consort. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 57 herein below.]

 phiri citavā pāchēm prabhu dēkhā. sahita bandhu siya sundara bēṣā. 5.

Lord Ram realised that Sati was utterly confounded and worried<sup>1</sup>. So he decided to remove all traces of doubts about him that she may still harbour in her mind and heart by revealing some of his mystical powers that cannot be possessed and displayed by an ordinary human being (which Sati had thought him to be). (3)

[So, what did Lord Ram do? He assumed many duplicate forms, all like him, and all accompanied by Sita! This was to show Sati that Sita is never separate from Lord Ram, and Sati should not think that she is the only one who could play tricks on the Lord.]

Sati saw a miraculous spectacle unfold before her eyes#. As she was going back, she saw on the path ahead of her the sight of Lord Ram with Sri (Sita) and his brother (Laxman). (4)

Stunned and bewildered, being utterly confounded and out of her wits, she looked back, only to see the beautiful forms of Lord with Sita and his brother.<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is to be noted that no words were exchanged between Lord Ram and Sati. The Lord had asked her where Shiva, her husband, was, but she hadn't replied, and instead had started retracing her steps in the direction from where she had come. But consternation and perplexities were writ large on her face. Even if she had done her best to hide it, Lord Ram knew the turbulent state of her mind as he is "all-knowing, and is privy to the inner thoughts of everyone"—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha nos. 3-4 herein above.

<sup>2</sup>Sati had assumed the form of Sita, Lord Ram's wife who had been abducted by Ravana, by the virtue of mystical powers that she possessed which allow one to change one's form at will. These powers are normally possessed by gods and goddesses, but not by an ordinary human prince. Sati had thought that Lord Ram was an ordinary prince as is clear by the reading of Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 50, as well as Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow this Doha.

So, Lord Ram wished to teach Sati in the language she would best understand—i.e. deceit, falsehood and illusions created by use of magical powers. After all, Sati had also employed deceit to test the Lord, and it is time that she is repaid in the same coin.

#If we were to dramatise this episode then it would be like Lord Ram and Laxman seeing an apparition of Sita. This is the reason why Laxman was dumbfounded in Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 53. And this perhaps is the reason why Sati did not reply to Lord Ram—as shadows, phantoms, ghosts and apparitions don't speak.

What Sati saw now was also an apparition—and we shall observe that the shadowy forms of Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman that appeared all around Sati do not speak a word too! We shall also read that this sight churned the head of Sati like in a whirlpool so much so that she was terrified, her heart shivered and her body became numbed out of fear and shock, even becoming temporarily blind like a person suffering from vertigo and some serious mental illness which results in bouts of hallucination and loss of sight—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 55.]

[What Sati saw was the 'Viraat' form of Lord Ram, the Lord's original form as Lord Vishnu who is also known as the "Viraat Purush". The word 'Viraat' means the vast, the cosmic and the all-encompassing form of the Lord.<sup>1</sup>]

Wherever and in whichever direction Sati saw she could see the Lord seated majestically, and being served by Siddhas (mystics) and wise sages. (6)

Not only this (i.e. not only the mystics and sages), but she also saw many Lord Shivas, Vidhis (the creator Brahma) and Vishnus, all more influential and powerful than the other, [7] ---

---each serving Lord Ram and worshipping the Lord's holy feet. She also saw the gods, in varied forms and attires, serving the Lord too [8]. (7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is the cosmic and all-inclusive form of the supreme Brahm, the Supreme Being, from whom not only the three primary gods, viz. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder, have emerged, but also the rest of the creation headed by the gods in heaven, as well as the mystics and sages on earth.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 54—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 55 which too describe Lord Ram's beautiful Viraat form.

The three, Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita stayed together in the forest, and they represented the three symbolic forms of Brahm (Supreme Being), the Jiva (the living being), and Maya (the mystical powers of Brahm) respectively—refer: Ram Charit Manas--(i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 123; and (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 7; Chaupai line no. 20 that precedes Doha no. 10.

Indeed, Lord Ram's visible form was so astounding that the beholder was left thrilled and dumbfounded with awe and astonishment—refer for instance: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 148 where this condition was experienced by Manu and Satrupa when the Lord revealed himself before them; and (ii) in Kiskindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 2 when Hauman was thrilled upon recognising his revered Lord, Sri Ram.]

Sati also saw the respective consorts of the gods (she had already seen as narrated in the previous verses). That is, she saw as many Satis (consort of Shiva), Bidhaatris (consort of Bidhi or the creator Brahma), and Indiraas (consort of Indra, the king of gods) in as many forms and in different attires as she saw their respective counterpart gods.

All the female counterparts of the different gods had as many compatible forms and varied attires as they were gods in myriad forms and attires. (Doha no. 54)

[Note—As we shall read below in verse nos. 3-4, Lord Ram and Sita were seen by Sati in one universal form and attire as compared to the varied forms and different attires of the rest of the gods and goddesses. This sight was in conformity with the philosophy of the scriptures that the Supreme Being is steady, constant, uniform, unchanging and universal.]

देखे जहँ तहँ रघुपति जेते । सक्तिन्ह सहित सकल सुर तेते ॥ १ ॥ dēkhē jaham̐ taham̐ raghupati jētē. saktinha sahita sakala sura tētē. 1.

jīva carācara jō sansārā. dēkhē sakala anēka prakārā. 2.

She saw the many Gods with their Shaktis (female counterparts; their consorts) everywhere she saw Lord Ram (“Raghupati”). (1)

Besides them, she also saw all the Jivas (living beings) that inhabit this world—both those who could move (such as the members of the animal kingdom) as well as those who could not (the members of the plant kingdom)—in numerous forms and different stages of evolution. (2)

[Note—To wit, the profoundly bewildered Sati saw the entire creation serving Lord Ram—right from the gods and goddesses in heaven to the exalted sages and mystics as well as the members of the animal and plant kingdoms on earth. This magical sight left her dumbfounded; she had never expected to witness such a scene in her wildest of imaginations. In fact it proved to her that Lord Ram, whose divinity and supremacy as the Lord of creation she had doubted, was indeed none else but the Supreme Lord of the world who had willingly assumed a form of a human being, and he is indeed the Lord whose true form is of cosmic dimension, who is served by every unit of creation, from the macrocosmic to the microcosmic level of existence.

A similar development occurred when the saintly crow Kaagbhusund saw the cosmic form of Lord Ram when the Lord was yet a child. This event is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 82. We shall be reading this episode in due course when we arrive there as we progress in our reading of this magnificent book.]

 sō'i raghubara sō'i lachimanu sītā. dēkhi satī ati bha'īm sabhītā. 5.

All of the gods in their different forms were worshipping the same Lord (Sri Ram). Sati did not see different forms of Lord Ram as she had seen the gods in myriad of forms. [That is, though she saw many forms of different gods and goddesses, she saw only one universal form of Lord Ram whom all the gods and goddesses were worshipping.] (3)

Though she saw many images of Raghupati (Lord Ram) with Sita [as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 54 herein above], yet all these images had the same attire and forms. [In other words, though Sati could see countless images of Lord Ram and Sita in every direction she looked, yet all these physical forms of the Lord and Sita were exactly alike, though the gods who worshipped them had variations in their physical forms and attires.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

Hence, when Sati saw with amazement this magical sight wherein she could see countless images of Lord Ram and Sita but all of them were exactly similar to each other, she became absolutely perplexed and scared<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This miracle of seeing one uniform image of Lord Ram everywhere was experienced by the crow saint Kaagbhusund also as narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha nos. 80—81. More specifically, Kaagbhusund had also seen one form of Lord Ram wherever he had gone—refer: Uttar Kand, Doha no. 81 Ka.

Kaagbhusund had wondered in many universes, and in each of these worlds he saw the same awe-inspiring wonderful sight as Sati has seen here in our present narration.]

हृदय कंप तन सुधि कछु नाहीं । नयन मूदि बैठी मग माहीं ॥ ६ ॥
 बहुरि बिलोकेउ नयन उघारी । कछु न दीख तहँ दच्छकुमारी ॥ ७ ॥

hr̥daya kampa tana sudhi kachu nāhīm. nayana mūdi baiṭhīm maga māhīm. 6.
 bahuri bilōkē'u nayana ughārī. kachu na dīkha taham' dacchakumārī. 7.

Sati's heart trembled (with fear) and she lost awareness of her senses (body). She (was so scared and dazed by what she saw that she) shut her eyes close and sat down in the middle of the path<sup>1</sup>. (6)

After some time she gathered herself and collected her senses, and then opened her eyes only to find that she could not see anything any more<sup>2</sup>. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati felt giddy and reeled under the influence of the stunning things she saw. She felt numbed in her senses, and thought that she was hallucinating. She feared that she has lost her mind or was seeing some terrifying ghosts. Feeling that she will faint and fall down unconscious if she continued to walk further, she closed her eyes and sat down in the middle of the road.

(i) Sati was so stunned that when she opened her eyes after some time, she could not see properly as happens when a person suffers from some sort of severe mental shock and his or her nerves become temporarily paralysed.

(ii) The miracle of countless stunning images of Lord Ram and Sita being served by as many countless forms of gods, goddesses, mystics, sages and creatures suddenly vanished from sight when Sati reopened her eyes. It was like a nightmare, a bad dream which vanishes as soon as a person wakes up from sleep. Indeed it was so—for Sati would now wake up from the ignorance-inspired delusions and would see the truth and reality. We shall read below in verse no. 8 that the same Sati who was so skeptical when Shiva had bowed before Lord Ram would now bow her own head before the latter.]

पुनि पुनि नाइ राम पद सीसा । चलीं तहाँ जहँ रहे गिरीसा ॥ ८ ॥

puni puni nā'i rāma pada sīsā. calīm tahām' jaham' rahē girīsā. 8.

She repeatedly bowed her head before Lord Ram<sup>1</sup> (to ask for forgiveness as well as to pay her respects to him), and then went her way to the spot where Girish (literally, the Lord of the mountains; here meaning Lord Shiva) had been waiting for her. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Sati was convinced about the reality of Lord Ram, about the Lord's divinity and true form as being the all-pervading, immanent and omnipresent Supreme Being himself in that form, she was at once thrilled for having had the privilege of witnessing the Lord's truthful form as well as was full of regret that she was foolish enough to have cast doubts on him. So she bowed repeatedly before Lord Ram to not only offer her deep reverence to him, but also to ask for forgiveness from the Lord for her impertinence and foolish behaviour.

A similar incident occurs later on in the story of Ram Charit Manas. The monkey prince Sugriv had doubts about Lord Ram's abilities, and whether the Lord was an ordinary human prince or someone divine, so to test the Lord he showed him a series of tall trees and asked him to shoot down all of them with a single arrow. Lord Ram fell all the trees as asked. This miracle convinced Sugriv that Lord Ram was no ordinary man. At that time too we read that 'Sugriv bowed his head repeatedly before the Lord'. {Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 14 that precedes Doha no. 7.}

Compare this 'repeatedly bowing of the head' with how Lord Shiva reacted when he saw Lord Ram as narrated earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 50. We will note that Lord Shiva did not bow his head before Lord Ram, but silently paid his obeisance to the Lord by praising his glories and feeling extremely exhilarated so much so that his body had goose-bumps. The question is: why did Shiva not bow his head before Lord Ram even though he was fully aware about the reality of the Lord and did not need any convincing? The answer is this: Lord Shiva avoided to openly bow before Lord Ram as it was not the opportune time for it. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 50.}

Why was it not so? It is because Lord Shiva wished to keep Lord Ram's identity secret so that the mission for which the Supreme Being had come down to earth in the physical form of Lord Ram, which was to eliminate the scourge of the demons, could be successfully completed. Lord Shiva did not wish to divulge the secret of Lord Ram's identity as that would have alerted the demons who would then run away into hiding.]

दो०. गई समीप महेस तब हँसि पूछी कुसलात ।

When Sati reached Lord Mahesh (Shiva), he smiled<sup>1</sup> and asked about her welfare, if everything was alright with her<sup>2</sup>.

Shiva asked her, 'How did you examine Lord Ram? Tell me everything truthfully<sup>3</sup>.' (Doha no. 55)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva was intelligent, wise and prudent. He could observe the pale face of Sati, and her crestfallen manners. He smiled because he thought that today Sati has had her share of wonder that is so characteristic of the deluding world, that she has learnt the truth the hard way, and that she has had a hands-on bitter experience of doubting Lord Ram's divinity on the one hand, and the words of her husband, Lord Shiva, on the other hand.

<sup>2</sup>He wondered if everything was alright with her, for he had his doubts. We have already read earlier that when Shiva failed to persuade Sati to abandon her adamancy and listen to him to his wise council not to try acting smart to test the authenticity of Lord Ram or the truthfulness of the words of Shiva, he had decided that the fate of Sati was not good—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 52.

<sup>3</sup>It is very significant here that Shiva has asked her to tell 'everything truthfully'. It shows that he had his doubts whether Sati would tell him 'everything' without hiding anything, and say it 'truthfully'. He guessed it correctly that Sati would try to hide her mischief so as not to annoy her husband any further. She had already disobeyed Shiva, and had to bite a bitter pill for her audacious and impertinent behaviour, and now if she told him the truth of what she did, i.e. assumed the form of Lord Ram's wife Sita, it would surely stoke the fire of anger in him further. Sati was scared stiff like a person who is caught between the devil and the deep sea. She was bound to try more tricks to save her skin; she would surely now try to deceive Shiva so as to escape being punished by him.

Sati's nervousness was too obvious to have escaped Shiva's close scrutiny: she was ashen-faced, fidgety, shuffling nervously with lowered eyes and head, and her voice quivered out of uncertainty when she answered her husband. The signs were too tell-tale to have skipped Lord Shiva. Hence he concluded that there were fair chances of Sati hiding things from him, and telling him a lie to save herself from his wrath.]

मासपारायण, दूसरा विश्राम (māsapārāyaṇa, dūsarā viśrāma)

Pause no. 2 for a 30-day recitation of Ram Charit Manas

चौ०. सतीं समुझि रघुबीर प्रभाऊ । भय बस सिव सन कीन्ह दुराऊ ॥ १ ॥
caupāī.

satīm samujhi raghubīra prabhā'ū. bhaya basa siva sana kīnha durā'ū. 1.

Realising the truth about the greatness of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>, the brave warrior in the race of king Raghu, Sati was so awed and scared that she hid from Shiva the reality of what had happened (or, what mischief she was upto in order to test the truth of Shiva's assertions pertaining to Lord Ram and the latter's greatness)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 54 where we read that Lord Ram has decided to reveal his astounding mystical powers to Sati when he found that she was feeling miserable.

What was the reason for Sati feeling so miserable? Well, she had realised her mistakes though it was too late to make amends now. She admits her error when she says—"I have not listened to what Shiva told me, and have cast the shadow of my stupidity and ignorance upon Lord Ram. Now, what and how shall I answer Shiva when I go back to him?" Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 54.

<sup>2</sup>So we see that Sati was completely confounded and dazed. On the one hand she had committed a grave sin by disbelieving and disobeying her husband, a sin that itself demanded stern punishment, and on the other hand her head was still reeling from the effects of the frightening experience she had had a little while ago when she saw out-of-world visions of countless images of Lord Ram and Sita being served by countless gods, goddesses, sages and others that surrounded her from all sides.

To make matters worse for her, she had, in her stupidity, taken the form of Sita, another person's wife, and this was sure to annoy her own husband Shiva because this was against all norms of good conduct and ethics. She had tried to cheat Lord Ram though her husband Lord Shiva had clearly told her that Ram is the Lord whom he worships—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51.

With this big baggage of stupid, stubborn, unethical, impertinent and un-reverential behaviour, what more can be expected from Sati other than she being scared out of her wits so much that she was afraid to tell the truth. She tried to hide her follies and mischief by taking recourse to falsehood, thereby compounding her miseries further, instead of abating them.

What was the effect of all this consternation and emotional tumult on Sati? Well, the answer is found below in verse nos. 2-3 where we read that she hides her actions and tells Shiva a lie.]

कछु न परीछा लीन्हि गोसाईं । कीन्ह प्रनामु तुम्हारिहि नाई ॥ २ ॥
जो तुम्ह कहा सो मृषा न होई । मोरें मन प्रतीति अति सोई ॥ ३ ॥ kachu na parīchā līnhi gōsā'īm. kīnha pranāmu tumhārihi nā'īm. 2.

jō tumha kahā sō mṛṣā na hō'ī. mōrēm mana pratīti ati sō'ī. 3.

Sati told a lie to Shiva. She told him—‘Oh Lord! I have not tested him (Lord Ram) in any way. I just bowed my head before him like you had done. (2)

Indeed oh Lord, whatever you had said is the truth, and I am fully convinced of it. [Or, whatever you say cannot be wrong, and I have firm faith in my Mana (mind and heart) regarding the truthfulness of your words.]’ (3)

[Note—Sati has said two blatant lies here: One is that she did not test Lord Ram, which she had actually done, and another is that she has full faith in the truthfulness of Lord Shiva’s words, which she hadn’t.

She could have said instead that she did not test Lord Ram because though she had her doubts about the divine aspect of the Lord in the beginning but by the time she reached him she thought over the matter and decided that Shiva cannot tell something that is wrong, and therefore she had aborted her test and came back to him. That would have somewhat eased the intensity of her lies.

Further still, the best option for her would have been to honestly admit to Lord Shiva that she had made a serious mistake by not trusting him, and that she has now regrets it bitterly, begging for forgiveness from the Lord; she should have added that if Lord Shiva wishes to make her undertake some sort of penance for repentance, she was willing to do it.

Making a mistake is not such a big crime as to hide one’s mischief by telling lies to conceal it—especially from one’s own husband or someone who is one’s well-wisher, such as the case was with Shiva and Sati.]

तब संकर देखेउ धरि ध्याना । सतीं जो कीन्ह चरित सबु जाना ॥ ४ ॥
बहुरि राममायहि सिरु नावा । प्रेरि सतिहि जेहिं झूठ कहावा ॥ ५ ॥ taba saṅkara dēkhē'u dhari dhyānā. satīm jō kīnha carita sabu jānā. 4.

bahuri rāmamāyahi siru nāvā. prēri satihi jēhim̐ jhūm̐ṭha kahāvā. 5.

Then Lord Shiva closed his eyes and contemplated in order to see beyond the visible spectrum of sight. In this transcendental state of the mind he came to know whatever Sati had done<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Having realised the truth, Shiva bowed his head to Lord Ram's Maya (delusion creating powers) which is so powerful that it had provoked Sati to tell lies<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is well known that Lord Shiva is the patron deity of ascetics, and remains perpetually submerged in deep meditation and contemplation. The Upanishads dealing with Yoga tell us that in this state of existence, the person acquires a state of transcendental consciousness when he goes above and beyond the gross and mundane level of existence to reach a higher state to observe things in their real form from a neutral and detached perspective.

The transcendental state of consciousness is obtained by practicing Yoga and Dhyān (meditation and contemplation) which enables the practitioner to rise above the grossness and the mundane plane of physical existence in this world to get a truthful and honest picture of any given thing or situation from a higher viewing point that lends the viewer to have a broader bird's eye perspective which is untainted by worldly pre-conceived ideas, and is not distorted by the grossness of the various organs of perception of the viewer's physical body when the same thing or situation is observed from the physical plane limited to this gross world.

Since Lord Shiva is expert in meditation and contemplation, he immediately employed this tool to find out the truth. When he saw Sati, her fidgety behaviour, demeanours and countenance clearly indicated to him that there was something wrong, and Sati was not telling him the truth. There was no use in trying to extract the truth from her by either persuasion or threat. So it's better to investigate the matter himself, he thought, and the best way to do it was to contemplate or do "Dhyān".

<sup>2</sup>Not only telling lies, but the Lord's Maya had even eclipsed Sati's wisdom and sense of probity when it inspired her to assume the form of Sita (refer: Doha no. 52). Not only this, Maya had even made her so arrogant and over confident of her own intelligence that she thought Shiva to be wrong in assuming that Lord Ram, who was roaming on the ground in search of his wife Sita, was no one else but the Supreme Being himself in a human form. 'How can it be?' thought Sati (refer: Doha no. 50 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-2).

In this context, refer also to: Ram Charit Manas—(a) Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 51; (b) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 2; and (c) Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 59; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 71; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 72.]

Lord Shambhu (Shiva) thought to himself, ‘The wish of Lord Hari (Vishnu; Lord Ram), as well as one’s own destiny (or fate) are very powerful forces (as they determine what course a person’s life would take)<sup>1</sup>.’

[To wit, it is almost impossible to oppose them. Whatever Lord Hari wants will happen. Whatever is written in one’s destiny is destined to happen. One has almost no control over these factors. Yes, it is true that one can always act diligently and change the course of his life, but this can only happen by the grace of Lord Hari, and this indirectly means that a person has to be mindful of the fact that nothing can happen without keeping the Lord in the loop.] (6)

The fact that Sati had assumed the form of Sita caused immense grief and sorrow in the heart of Shiva. He felt very disconsolate within, and confounded. [Why was he so dismayed and in a state of profound dilemma? This question is answered below.] (7)

He decided—‘If I now show any affection to Sati, and tend to neglect or overlook her actions, it would be gravely improper and tantamount to destroying the path of Bhakti (having devotion and loyalty for one’s chosen deity, who in the case of Shiva was Lord Ram)<sup>2</sup>.’ (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 128; line no. 1 of Doha no. 174; and Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 171.

<sup>2</sup>Sita was an incarnation of goddess Laxmi and the consort of the Lord (Sri Ram) whom Shiva worshipped as his chosen deity. This being so, Sita was like a ‘mother goddess’ for Shiva. Therefore, to assume the form of Sita was an unpardonable sin on the part of Sati.

Secondly, it is totally unethical and immoral for someone’s loyal and chaste wife to play the role of another person’s wife under any circumstance. This is another great sin that Sati committed.

Thirdly, she had tried to play dirty tricks with Lord Ram whom her husband reveres, especially when her husband had tried his best to dissuade her from doing so.

And all these sins were compounded when she boldly told lies to Shiva without fearing the consequences. It would have been much better for her to come out clean and tell him the truth at the outset, asking for forgiveness and praying that the intensity of punishment which was now due to her be reduced. But again, thought Shiva, it was Lord Ram’s Maya which prevented Sati from taking this straight path. It was Lord Ram’s wish and the destiny of Sati which have together brought things to such a pass.

If Shiva accepts Sati inspite of her sins, then obviously it would create a bad precedent, especially when Shiva was not an ordinary person but the most exalted amongst the gods. He is regarded as the wisest, the most enlightened and the greatest devotee of Lord Ram as well as the Lord’s original form as Lord Vishnu. Think, what will the other gods say of him if he stoops low to overlook the grave mischief of Sati just because she is his wife and he loves her dearly? Is his love for his wife more important than his love for his Lord God, Sri Ram, whom he worships day and night?

The path of Bhakti demand total surrender and loyalty towards the chosen deity, and a devotee's relationship with his or her chosen deity takes precedence over all other relationships that exist in the world. So, thought Shiva, should he compromise on this sacrosanct principle of Bhakti? Is Lord Ram's will and the holiness of the position of the Lord's consort (his wife Sita) worthy of neglect to please his own wife Sati who has committed such horrible sins as telling lies even to her husband and not paying heed to his advice?

Perhaps, Shiva thought to himself, Lord Ram wants him not to accept such an un-respectful and deceitful lady as his wife, a lady who has no faith in her husband, a lady who can play dirty tricks, a lady who does not bat an eyelid before telling lies. This is why Lord Ram created a situation whereby Lord Shiva would become aware of the true nature of his wife and be warned that she is not worthy to remain by his side. After all, her father insults Shiva and treats him with utter contempt (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 62). Is it ever advisable to have someone as one's wife under these circumstances?]

दो०. परम पुनीत न जाइ तजि किँ प्रेम बड़ पापु ।

प्रगटि न कहत महेसु कछु हृदयँ अधिक संतापु ॥ ५६ ॥

dōhā.

parama punīta na jā'i taji ki'ēm' prēma baṛa pāpu.

pragaṭi na kahata mahēsu kachu hṛdayam' adhika santāpu. 56.

Shiva was confounded and on the horns of a dilemma literally. He thought to himself that Sati was otherwise most immaculate and chaste, and so it looks difficult to abandon her outright. On the other hand, it would be a grave sin to show affection to her (for reasons cited in the above verses).

Though Shiva did not say anything overtly, but these opposing thoughts churned his heart and extremely tormented it. (Doha no. 56)

[Note—Shiva realised the gravity and the perplexities unique to the situation that confronted him. He realised that except for the sins she has committed in the present case, like not believing him, or taking the form of Sita, or telling lies, she was otherwise pure and incorruptible. Having doubts is not a sin par-se; everyone has his doubts. After all, Sati did not argue with Shiva or insult him in public, or said any words of insult. She had kept quiet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 51.

She had assumed the form of Sita not to lure Lord Ram with any passion in her mind; her intention was just to find out if the Lord recognises her as Sati or falls into the visual trap and thinks her to be Sita. If the latter thing would have happened then surely it would be established that Ram was just an ordinary prince who could see things with his gross organ of sight, i.e. the eye, and had no power to see beyond. So, though assuming the form of Sita was a wrong thing to do as such, but the intention was not sinful.

The third error of Sati was to speak lies. Once again, she did so to escape harsh punishment, and not done out of habit. Hence, this was also pardonable to some extent.

These arguments are alright in themselves. But the problem was that all these acts of Sati were sinful and fell within the ambit of impropriety and unethical conduct from the perspective of the principles of Dharma—which means conduct that is ethical, proper, righteous and noble. So she deserved punishment, and not condoned for her wrong-doing, as to accept her without her undertaking any kind of punishment by way of repentance to atone for her serious demeanours would go against the laws of Dharma.

These contradictory thoughts filled the heart of Shiva with grief and sorrow. It would be hard to abandon Sati, and it would be equally hard to accept her now.]

चौ०. तब संकर प्रभु पद सिरु नावा । सुमिरत रामु हृदयँ अस आवा ॥ १ ॥

Then, Shankar (Shiva) bowed his head (mentally) at the holy feet of the Lord (Sri Ram). As soon as Shiva remembered the revered Lord (Ram), the latter emerged in his heart (to bless Shiva and give him internal peace, as well as to guide him to decide what is the proper thing for him to do now in the given set of situations that had torn his mind).

[This verse has another interpretation and can also be read as follows: “Then (when?—after Sati told him lies and he came to know the truth by contemplation), Shiva mentally bowed his head at the feet of Lord Ram (in order to invoke the Lord and request him to show the correct path to be followed at this juncture). As soon as he invoked the Lord, he appeared in Shiva’s heart to inspire him to think in the manner as described in the following verse.”] (1)

[Note—As we have read in Doha no. 56, Shiva could not decide what to do. In this dilemma, he decided to take refuge with his beloved Lord Ram and seek the latter’s guidance.

How does one seek the Lord’s advice and guidance? Here is the answer: first pay your respect to the Lord God by bowing your head at the Lord’s holy feet and invoking him in your heart. Then the Lord would answer your queries by inspiring your soul to think in the way the Lord wants you to act.

Now, this is a great lesson for all of us. Remember: the voice of the soul is the voice of the Lord God, and it reveals in the form of what we call the “voice of conscience”. One who heeds the voice of one’s conscience treads the righteous path, and one who neglects it turns a deaf ear to the Lord.

So, what was the advice of Lord Ram? The answer is found in the following verse no. 2 herein below.]

एहिं तन सतिहि भेट मोहि नाहीं । सिव संकल्पु कीन्ह मन माहीं ॥ २ ॥

ēhim tana satihī bhēṭa mōhi nāhīm̐. siva saṅkalpu kīnha mana māhīm̐. 2.

Shiva decided in his Mana (mind and heart)—‘I cannot have any connection (relationship) with Sati as long as she remains in the present body.’ (2)

[Note—This is a prelude of things to come. Shiva has not completely abandoned Sati; he has decided to have no relationships with Sati “in the present body”. This is because she has polluted her body by assuming the form of Sita, and she has committed the sin of telling lies with this body. But at the same time, she is otherwise immaculate. So what is the practical solution? The answer is this: Sati should first discard this body and take another birth, or ‘her soul should live this tainted body and enter a new fresh one’ so that Shiva can accept her.

Remember: it is the gross body that becomes tainted by worldly corruptions, but the ‘soul’ always remains pure and immaculate. This is the lesson of this verse. A person’s sins and the body which commits these sins are to be punished, but not the ‘person himself’. Incredulous it seems, but it is the truth—for the true identity of the person is not his or her gross body, but the Atma, the soul, which is absolutely immaculate and eternal. The Atma remains above the mundane deeds done by the gross body, and is never involved in grossness.

It is when a person overlooks the voice of the Atma, known as the “voice of conscience; the inner voice”, that he or she commits sins. Even in the case of Sati this has been true. Her Atma, her “inner voice”, had warned her not to disbelieve Lord Shiva, but she had overlooked it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 51. Had she paid heed to the voice of her “conscience”, she would not have had to suffer now.

So, this was the guidance Shiva got from Lord Ram. ‘He should abandon Sati in her present form, but should accept her when her Atma takes a new form or assumes a fresh new body, which in practical terms means to take a new birth.’ We shall read a little while later that eventually this is what has happened. Sati burnt her corrupted body in the sacrificial fire of her father Daksha, and at that time had prayed to the creator to give her another birth where she can be accepted by Lord Shiva once again. Hence, she took birth in the household of Giriraj, the king of mountains, as Parvati. She did severe penance and was accepted by Shiva as his divine consort once again.

Sati’s Atma, i.e. her pure conscious soul which was her “true self”, remained the same; it was the gross body that changed. It was like a person discarding dirty clothes, taking a bath, and then donning fresh new clothes.]

अस बिचारि संकरु मतिधीरा । चले भवन सुमिरत रघुबीरा ॥ ३ ॥

asa bicāri saṅkaru matidhīrā. calē bhavana sumirata raghubīrā. 3.

Deciding thus, Lord Shankar (Shiva), who is very wise and patient, started on his journey for his abode (on Mt. Kailash), all the while remembering Lord Ram (“Raghubir”) on the way. (3)

[Note—Shiva was going to his abode at Mt. Kailash from sage Agastya’s hermitage when this episode of Sati took place. So he had waited under the shadow of a banyan tree till Sati came back to him after testing Lord Ram. Now that things have taken a nasty turn and it became clear to him that he has to neglect the presence of Sati henceforth, he got up to move onwards to his abode in Kailash. For all practical purposes, Shiva considered himself alone hereafter.

That is why he kept his mind submerged in the thoughts of Lord Ram which amounts to him remaining engrossed in meditating upon the Lord even as his physical body was moving towards his hermitage.]

asa pana tumha binu kara'i kō ānā. rāmabhagata samaratha bhagavānā. 5.

Even as Lord Shiva moved forward on his journey to his abode, a pleasant disembodied voice was heard in the sky<sup>1</sup>. It complimented Shiva for his decision (of abandoning Sati in her present body to uphold the laws of Dharma and Bhakti). This voice said—‘Glory to Mahesh! You have done well to reinforce and uphold the virtue of Bhakti<sup>2</sup>. (4)

Who else would have taken this stern decision that you have taken<sup>3</sup>? Indeed, you are a great devotee of Lord Ram, and are an able Lord God in your own right.’ (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The disembodied voice was the voice of the ‘Super Consciousness, the Supreme Atma’. It has approved the decision of Shiva not to accept anyone who has become corrupted, and especially one who cast doubts on the divinity of the Supreme Lord himself who was in the form of Lord Ram.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 186, as well as Chaupai line no. 6 that follows below.

<sup>2</sup>For a true devotee of Lord Ram, there is no other relationship more important than the Lord, and anyone who shows disrespect to the Lord is obviously worthy of abandonment no matter how close or dear he or she may be. The only relationship that a devotee values is one with his revered Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 72; (ii) Doha no. 130 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 5; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 131.

In the present case, Sati has cast doubts on the integrity of Lord Ram and has shown disrespect to him by assuming the form of his wife Sita. It ought to be noted carefully here that when she appeared before Lord Ram disguised as Sita, she had not bowed before the Lord or shown any other sign of respect to him. This in its self was showing great disrespect to Lord Ram whom Shiva reveres and worships. So, Shiva was right in abandoning her to uphold the principles of Bhakti and Dharma. And his decision was endorsed by the supreme Atma. That is, Shiva’s “higher Self” approved of his decision.

Even Lord Ram praises the steady devotion of Lord Shiva and his ability to stick to strict codes of self-discipline. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 76.]

kīnha kavana pana kahahu kṛpālā. satyadhāma prabhu dīnadayālā. 7.

When Sati heard the voice from the sky, she became anxious and nervous, not knowing what it meant or indicated. She became suspicious and began pondering its meaning in her heart, and unable to determine anything, she hesitantly asked Lord Shiva—(6)

‘Oh merciful Lord! You are an abode of truthfulness, and are compassionate towards the humble, the meek, the lowly and the downtrodden. Tell me please, what vows have you taken?’ (7)

[Note—Like any guilty person, Sati was suspicious of what next step Shiva would take to punish her. If Shiva had said something openly to admonish Sati for her mischief and misdemeanours, it would have been better for Sati because by this method the anger of Shiva would have been vented out. But when he decided to keep quiet and move on, not saying anything to Sati by way of even slightest of reprimand in spite of her grave and unpardonable sins, this did not portend good for her. When an able person or senior authority is offended by another person but decides to keep quiet, it is not a good sign for the latter, for this anger keeps boiling inside only to erupt like a volcano later on.

Sati’s conscience was pricking her like a crown of thorns. So when she heard the heavenly voice praising Lord Shiva’s stern vows, she immediately became suspicious that there was something grave in it.

She was ‘hesitant’ because she knew she was guilty of a grave and unpardonable sin, for otherwise she knew that Lord Shiva loved her very much and there was no cause of her feeling terrified to ask him such basic questions as ‘what vow have you taken?’

We must also note that she has used pleasing words to appease her angry husband—such as he being merciful, truthful, compassionate etc. This was her subtle way of pleading with Shiva to have mercy and compassion on her even if she had committed a grave error and even if he was angry at her.]

Though Sati asked Shiva to tell her what vows he had taken and what the heavenly voice meant, Lord Tripurari (Shiva) kept quiet and did not reply to her<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva’s quiet and reluctance to reply to Sati added to her woes, as she was now sure that Shiva is very angry at her and has virtually abandoned her for all practical purposes. This will be clear in the following Doha no. 57.

Lord Shiva had decided that he has got nothing to do with Sati any more, and treated her as a stranger with whom he did not wish to interact. He chose to keep quiet because if he opened his mouth to reply to her there were fair chances that his suppressed anger and annoyance would burst forth, which he wished to avoid as he loved Sati whom he knew to be an extremely faithful and devoted to him other than the one grave sin that she had committed, which was to disbelieve him, and then compounding matters further by telling a lie to cover up her follies.]

Sati concluded in her heart that the all-knowing Lord Shiva has come to know all the misdeeds she had done. She thought to herself, 'Lord Shiva has become aware of all the cunning and deceit I had undertaken, all the mischief I have committed.'

She realised that she has behaved like an ordinary silly and stupid woman (instead of being wise and prudent as was expected from the divine consort of such a wise and enlightened god as Shiva). (Doha no. 57 Ka)

It is well said by the wise ones the unifying and bonding power of love is like the relationship of water and milk because when ordinary water (which has no special monetary value independently) is mixed with milk, it blends so perfectly with the latter that it becomes as valuable as milk and acquires the same sale value as pure milk. But when even a drop of acid symbolising falsehood and lack of trust and faith is added to this homogenous liquid, the water and milk are not only separated but the taste of milk sours and becomes too horrible to be palatable. (Sortha no. 57 Kha)

[Note—This metaphor is employed to say that as long as Sati had not used falsehood and deceit against her loving husband Lord Shiva, as long as she had full trust in him and his words, Lord Shiva and Sati were inseparable from each other. Wherever Shiva went, Sati accompanied him. But now this acid of lies and mistrust has soured their cordial relation so much so that Shiva turned away from Sati and completely neglected her.

This episode and Sortha has a great practical message for all of us—it is that we must be true and honest with our partner if we wish to sustain the relationship and be cordial with each other. Otherwise, sooner or later the relation would sour.]

Sati's heart was overwhelmed with grief and contrition as she realised her stupidity and misdeeds. She was extremely worried, but did not know what to do now. (1)

She was extremely perturbed and thought to herself—'Lord Shiva, who is like a fathomless ocean of mercy and grace, has known my mischief and misdeeds, but he's so merciful and kind that he refrains from overtly telling me about my sins.<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva did not want to add to her woes by admonishing her or telling her what nonsense she has done. The Lord did not want to hurt Sati any more because he understood that she was already full of regret as she has realised her mistakes by then, and when she would come to know that he has abandoned her, the intensity of her torments would be beyond measurement. Being loving, merciful, compassionate and gracious, Lord Shiva did not wish to add fuel to her tormenting fire any more. So he decided to keep quiet.]

When Sati observed the behaviour and attitude of Shiva (that clearly hinted at his disenchantment with her), Sati's heart trembled (in fear) because she realised that the Lord has abandoned her. (3)

Since it was she who was at grave fault and had committed a horrific sin, she did not know what to say to the Lord in her defense; she could not protest to Shiva that he should not be so heartless with her so as to abandon his chaste and loyal wife.

Perturbed and distressed beyond measure, Sati's heart was smouldering in grief and contrition like being put in a furnace. (4)

[Note—Through these verses, the great saint Tulsidas wishes to tell all of us what fate awaits us if we take recourse to falsehood, deceit and pretensions in our lives, if we tell lies and disbelieve our well-wishers like Sati had disbelieved and lied to Shiva who was her best well-wisher in this world.

Even the best of relationship, the most cordial and the coveted relationship, would crumble like a house of cards and sour like milk in which acid is dropped if one is not careful not to use cunning and falsehood, distrust and dishonesty in it.]

baranata pantha bibidha itihāsā. bisvanātha pahum̐cē kailāsā. 6.

When Lord Brishketu (literally the Lord who has the sign of a bull marked on his standard/flag; i.e. Lord Shiva whose mount is a bull) realised that Sati was very sad and contrite, he narrated different stories to divert her mind and keep her engaged<sup>1</sup>. (5)

In this way, while narrating stories from the different Purans and Itihasas (ancient scriptures and mythological histories) on the way, the Lord of the world, “Vishwanaath”, reached Kailash, his abode. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva is a very merciful Lord. The measure of his graciousness and kindness is that instead of taking any severe punitive action against Sati and scolding her using stern language, he remained quiet. Then when he observed that Sati is suffering from guilt and remorse, and feeling contrite, he decided to divert her attention by telling her stories so that her pain and sorrows are diffused a bit.

The use of the epithet “Vishwanaath”, the ‘Lord of the world’, is significant here. It implies that Lord Shiva was aware of the fact that this world is not perfect; it is full of contradictions. Delusions and ignorance, falsehood and deceit are as much part of it as are enlightenment, knowledge and wisdom, as well as truthfulness and honesty. They coexist in this world; they are a part of the nature of creation.

Another point to note is that it is said in verse no. 4 herein above that “Sati’s heart was so much tormented by grief as if it was put in a furnace”. It means that she was already getting self-punished by her own conscience, and this was more effective than any other form of external punishment. She has realised her mistake, and she is already suffering like hell inside, so, being a merciful Lord, Shiva thought that it would be extremely cruel to torment her any further. Therefore he decided to comfort her a bit by telling stories.]

When Shiva reached Kailash, he remembered his vows (that he would have nothing to do with Sati any longer, and would instead spend his days like a lonely hermit or ascetic). So, he sat down under a banyan tree<sup>1</sup> in a meditative posture known as the ‘lotus posture’. [This is the posture adopted by ascetics when they meditate upon the ‘pure conscious Self’.] (7)

Shiva immersed himself in deep meditation, concentrating his thoughts on his true Self, the pure consciousness known as the Atma or Soul. In this way, he entered the state of steady Samadhi—a perpetual state of transcendental existence of consciousness when the practitioner experiences absolute bliss and tranquility even as he remains completely unaware of the external world because all his gross organs of action and perception go to virtual sleep. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It has been affirmed elsewhere also that the banyan tree is the preferred tree under the shadow of which Shiva meditates and rests in his abode at Mt. Kailash—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 106.

Kailash is the well-known abode of Lord Shiva on earth—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 105.]

Meanwhile, Sati lived a lonely and forlorn life at Kailash. Her mind and heart were overcome with worry and grief. The secret of her sorrows was not known to anyone as she kept quiet and to herself. In this way, days that passed away seemed like long eras (years; ages) to her. (Doha no. 58)

[Note—Life seemed like a burden to her. There was no one with whom she could share her pain and woes. Shiva was lost in meditation, and there was an eerie silence all around. It was like living alone in a cremation ground.

The internal grief and mental agony of a woman whose husband has abandoned her is portrayed here. Though physically she may be alive, but mentally she feels herself no better than one who is dead. Life becomes a burden for her, and days seem like ages.]

Contrition and grief held Sati's heart in their firm grip. She was tormented daily with guilt, and wondered when it would be possible for her to cross this endless ocean of sorrows and miseries<sup>1</sup>. (1)

She gravely regretted, lamenting thus—‘I have insulted Lord Ram and slighted his dignity (by playing dirty tricks with him and trying to trap him by disguising myself as his wife Sita), and I had compounded my follies by not believing the words of my husband (Lord Shiva)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

The creator Vidhaata (Brahma) has given me the bitter fruit (punishment) that I deserved for my own misdeeds (and therefore I can't blame either him or anyone else). Indeed, the Creator has done what was correct and judicious<sup>3</sup>. (3)

Still, oh Creator, it is unfair and cruel for you to force me to live separate from my beloved husband<sup>4</sup> (to whom I am totally devoted). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati has been tormented ever since she realised that whatever Shiva had told her regarding Lord Ram was the absolute truth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 53 and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

Then once again when there was a heavenly voice praising Shiva for his vow not to accept a tainted Sati as his consort any longer, her apprehensions were further reinforced. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 57.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, surely I have committed two grave sins—one was to play fools with the Supreme Lord, Sri Ram, and undermining the Lord's dignity and holiness by taking recourse to deceit and pretending to be his wife inspite of my husband clearly warning me not to do so. To add to my woes, I was so stupid and deluded that I did not even pay my obligatory obeisance to Lord Ram before I went ahead to test him. Not only this, I dared to think that my husband is attempting to mislead me, and by not believing in his words about the divinity and greatness of Lord Ram I have implied that he lacks wisdom and knowledge. Now, this has thrown me in a whirlpool of miseries and grief because my husband had abandoned me for all practical purposes. He has not even asked me to repent for my sins, nor has he admonished me, or told me how to do penance to neutralise the bad effects of my sins. So it's clear that Shiva is firm not to accept me under any circumstance.

<sup>3</sup>That is, I have no right to blame either the creator Brahma or my husband Shiva for my self-inflicted miseries and torments. I have myself invited and courted trouble. Whom should I blame?

<sup>4</sup>Therefore let me die and leave this mortal body. I don't want to keep this tainted body with which I have committed such sins. On the one hand I have offended my husband Shiva by slighting the authority and dignity of Lord Ram who is worshipped by him. It is tantamount to desecrating the deity he worships. Then I have disobeyed him and treated his word with doubts. As if this was not enough, I lied to my husband! Couldn't I tell Shiva the truth of my misdeeds and ask him for forgiveness, in which case I could have invoked his merciful and forgiving nature to get my punishment reduced or kept in abeyance to let me repent and reform my self and my foolish nature. But I did not do so. So, whom shall I accuse for my horrors than my own self? One reaps what one sows, and it is not otherwise: this is the universal Law of Nature that also applies to me now.]

The intensity of regret, contrition and grief in the heart of Sati were so huge that they could not be measured or described. Then, the wise/clever Sati<sup>1</sup> finally sought refuge with Lord Ram. Thus, she invoked the Lord in her heart by remembering him. (5)

She prayed to him (Lord Ram)—‘Oh Lord! If you are indeed the merciful Lord so much praised by all and honoured as such by the Vedas who univocally assert that you eliminate the sorrow and grief of those who seek your refuge and pray to you for help, (6)---

---Then I join my palms as a sign of submission before you to earnestly plead with you that let me shed this gross body (with which I have committed such grave sins, and which will never be accepted by my husband Shiva). (7)

And if I have true devotion and affection for the holy feet of Lord Shiva (like a loyal wife and true devotee must have), and this statement of mine is true to its core in all respects, if I am truthfully dedicated to Shiva's feet with my entire being employing my Mana (mind and heart), my actions, and my words, (8)---

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati has been called “wise or clever” (“sayānī”) because at last she came to her senses. She has now sought the refuge of Lord Ram, which was a very intelligent decision on her part. This is because she realised that the best way to seek pardon for her sins was to surrender before Lord Ram whom she had insulted and shown disrespect to. This would be the best way to seek forgiveness from her husband because he had taken more umbrage at her showing disrespect to the Lord whom he worships (i.e. Lord Ram), rather than her disobeying him (Shiva).

The root of all the trouble was her disbelieving Shiva's words that Lord Ram was indeed the Supreme Being who is the almighty Lord of creation. Now, this being the case, the wise course of action for her was to pray to the ‘Supreme Being’ himself whom she had insulted. When someone asks to surrender and prays to a senior Authority, it becomes virtually impossible for the latter to refuse. Committing mistakes or sins, and then accepting one's errors and asking to be forgiven, in any manner that the sinner thinks fit, is a sufficient ground for commuting of punishment.

We shall read below in Doha no. 59 that Sati asks that she be allowed to die because she was certain her husband, Lord Shiva, would not accept her in her present body under any circumstance.

Sati's decision to pray to Lord Ram stood her in good stead as will be clear when we read a little later that it was Lord Ram who had intervened on her behalf to persuade Shiva to marry her in her next birth as the daughter of Himwan, the king of mountains. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 77.]

---Then oh all-knowing<sup>1</sup> Lord (Ram), please listen to my earnest plea. Make an arrangement soon whereby I can die without sufferings so that all my torments and bad days are done with (and I am relieved from this ignoble life).' (Doha no. 59)

[Note—So we see that at last Sati had to seek refuge with the same Lord Ram upon whom she had cast so much doubts and aspersion. Her episode is an example of the power of the Lord's Maya, and the fact that in the final analysis it is the Lord who will come to our rescue inspite of our mischief and irreverent behaviour.

<sup>1</sup>Addressing Lord Ram as being “all-knowing” is significant. Sati meant to convince Lord Ram that whatever she had said to him by way of prayer was the truth, and there was no deceit in it. This was necessary because for all practical purposes Sati has created a very bad reputation for herself—as a liar and deceitful woman. So, let Lord Ram be convinced that notwithstanding whatever lies and cunning she may have adopted earlier, but this time around she is being absolutely truthful and honest.

There are umpteen numbers of verses that reiterate that Lord Ram is all-knowing. For instance, refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 53.

Now, why was Sati so confident that inspite of being offended, Lord Ram would still heed her requests if she prayed to him with total truthfulness and surrender? The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 219 which affirms that “Lord Ram always keeps the wishes of his followers, and this habit of his is endorsed and witnessed by the Vedas, the Purans, the gods and saintly people”.

There are some interesting aspects to this tale. Sati has stated while praying to Lord Ram: “if I have true devotion and affection for Lord Shiva's feet” (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 59—like a loyal wife must have), then she should die without suffering (refer: Doha no. 59). In other words, she makes two important requests: one is that inspite of her mistakes she still has true and undiluted devotion and affection for Lord Shiva, and wishes to serve the Lord's feet, and the other is that she wishes to leave this body but do it without pain. The first request—that she be allowed to serve Lord Shiva's holy feet may not be explicit here, but all ambiguity about it is removed later on in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65, and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 64—where she explicitly asks this blessings from Lord Hari or Lord Ram (because Ram is an incarnation of Hari).

The all-forgiving, all-merciful and most considerate Lord Ram has accepted all her requests. (i) She will get to marry Shiva again in her next life as Parvati—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 65. (ii) She would not have to suffer long and indefinitely as she would die soon by jumping in the sacred fire at her father's fire-sacrifice—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.

Another interesting aspect is the way Sati left her body. It is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64 that Sati burnt herself by jumping into the raging fire of the sacrificial pit at her father's fire sacrifice ritual. Fire is a well-known and reputed medium of purification because it burns all impurities without affecting the original material. Even gold is purified by putting it in fire. Shiva had taken a stern vow that he will have nothing to do with Sati in her present body because she had committed a grave sin by disguising herself as Sita, Lord Ram's wife—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57. And then Sati asks Lord Hari to bless her that she be Shiva's wife in the next birth so that she is able to serve the Lord's holy feet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65.

These two apparently opposing situations had to be reconciled. The only way was to “purify Sati's tainted body” so that she becomes acceptable to Shiva, and the best medium to do so was to put her in the ‘fire’. It is interesting to note that this “purifying by fire” is also carried out on Sita at the end of the war at Lanka—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 14 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 109. Quite a coincidence indeed! That is why Lord Shiva's consort was called “Sati”—it was a traditional process in ancient Indian society wherein a woman proved her chastity and loyalty to her husband by burning herself in the cremation fire with her dead husband's body. If she resisted or abstained from doing so, more often than not she was scorned at and castigated by the rest of the clan.]

ēhi bidhi dukhita prajāśakumārī. akathanīya dārūna dukhu bhārī. 1.

bītēṁ sambata sahasa satāsī. tajī samādhi sambhu abināsī. 2.

In the above narrated way, the daughter of Daksha Prajapati (i.e. Sati) suffered from horrible grief and misery which cannot be described (because it was immense and constantly tormenting her). (1)

Eighty-seven thousand Samvats (years) passed while the immortal (eternal and imperishable—“Abinaashi”)<sup>1</sup> Shiva remained deeply submerged in the transcendental state of consciousness known as Samadhi (or “meditative trance”).

At the end of this period, he woke up from this transcendental state of existence to the realities of the gross world<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “abināṣī” (Abinaashi) literally means that which does not decay and die, that which is eternal and imperishable, that which is immortal. Shiva is a god, and from the perspective of creation he is ‘immortal’ in the sense that unlike the rest of creation which perishes at the end of each Kaal (era; epoch), he remains perpetual.

The time frame of 87,000 Samvats is not a joke. It’s a very long period of time from human perspective. The gross body will naturally age and become feeble during the course of this long time. But ascetics overcome this problem by immersing themselves in Samadhi. It is believed that all physical functions of the body go into hibernation mode during Samadhi, and that period when the ascetic remains in Samadhi is not added to his physical age. Thus for instance, if an ascetic enters into Samadhi when he is say 13 years old, and remains in Samadhi for say next 100 years, then when he wakes up from Samadhi his age would still be 13 years. In other words, the body will not grow old by 100 years for the entire period of Samadhi. This is why our ancient sages, seers, hermits and ascetics could live for ‘thousands of years’.

This is the physical perspective. From the metaphysical angle however, the word “Abinaashi” refers to the soul, the Atma, the pure conscious ‘self’ of any living being, which is eternal and imperishable by nature. Only those who are ‘self-realised’ know this fact because they identify themselves with the Atma and not the physical body. Shiva is the most enlightened and highly self-realised god in the entire pantheon of gods—and therefore this epithet of being “Abinaashi” aptly applies to him.

राम नाम सिव सुमिरन लागे । जानेउ सतीं जगतपति जागे ॥ ३ ॥

जाइ संभु पद बंदनु कीन्हा । सनमुख संकर आसनु दीन्हा ॥ ४ ॥

rāma nāma siva sumirana lāgē. jānē'u satīm jagatapati jāgē. 3.
jā'i sambhu pada bandanu kīnhā. sanamukha saṅkara āsanu dīnhā. 4.

As soon as he woke up from the state of Samadhi, he started muttering the holy name of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. When Sati heard it she realised that the Lord of the world has woken up from his meditative trance. (3)

She went and offered her obeisance to the holy feet of Lord Shambhu (Shiva). Shankar acknowledged her gestures, and politely gave her a seat to sit down in his front (facing him)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When a true devotee of Lord Ram wakes up to the realities of the gross world after sleep during which time his sub-conscious mind was detached from the affairs of the external world, he is characterised by first remembering and uttering the name of Lord Ram as a means of paying obeisance to his Lord as well as symbolically offering his new day to the Lord with a subtle prayer to take care of him during his waking time. We see this happening in the case of Vibhishan who uttered the name of Lord Ram the first thing upon waking up in the morning, and like Sati here, this pronouncing the Lord’s name helped Hanuman realise that Vibhishan was a true friend and devotee of the Lord in the jungle-like fort of demons at Lanka, the capital of the demons—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 6.

Uttering the holy name of Lord Ram the first thing upon getting up from sleep also proves that even during sleep the devotee's sub-conscious mind was focussed on the Lord because the two states of existence of consciousness, viz. 'the waking state' and the 'sleeping state' are relative by nature vis-à-vis the relationship of the creature's body with the physical world of material existence. In both these cases, the mind and sub-conscious remains active—the only difference is that while in the 'waking state' the external organs of the body such as those of perception (eye, nose, ear, tongue and skin) and action (hand, leg, mouth, genital and excretory) are active, in the 'sleeping state' they become inactive. But the mind and sub-conscious continues to work behind the curtain. Therefore, since the muttering of the name of the Lord is done by the tongue it only indicates that the concerned person has 'woken up' from sleep, that his gross organs, such as the tongue, have become active. But it does not mean that while asleep his mind was not thinking of the Lord—only that during sleep the tongue remained inactive.

So, when Shiva started uttering the name of Lord Ram, Sati realised that he has woken up from his Samadhi (meditative trance like state), which for an ascetic like Shiva is akin to an ordinary person's 'sleep'.

Lord Shiva always chanted Lord Ram's holy name day in and day out as a spiritual formula that gave him eternal peace at all levels, the external world as well as his inner-self. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 108 that is explicit on it.

lagē kahana harikathā rasālā. daccha prajāsa bha'e tēhi kālā. 5.

dēkhā bidhi bicāri saba lāyaka. dacchahi kīnha prajāpati nāyaka. 6.

Shiva began narrating to Sati various interesting stories related to Lord Hari (Vishnu)<sup>1</sup>.

Meanwhile, sometime during that time, Daksha (Sati's father) became a guardian of all living beings in this creation. (5)

The creator Bidhi (Brahma) deemed him suitable in every possible way to be a guardian of his creation. Hence, he appointed Daksha as the leader (king) of all living beings in his kingdom (creation)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier we have read that when Shiva was on his way to Kailash from the hermitage of sage Agastya and Sati had played mischief on the way, Shiva had mentally abandoned her. This made Sati very sad. When the Lord found Sati extremely distressed, he had narrated many stories to her to keep her mind diverted from her miseries—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 58.

But the irony is that inspite of suffering so much, and inspite of getting to hear Lord Hari's divine stories at least three time by now—once in the hermitage of sage Agastya, then on the way to Kailash, and the third time now—Sati was still disillusioned. This is why she has asked Shiva for the 'fourth time' to tell her the divine story of Lord Hari (Ram): refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 108—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 110.

<sup>2</sup>The story of Daskha: According to Padma Puran, the creator Brahma, in order to roll out this creation and make it self-sustaining, created the first human in his own likeness, and named him 'Manu'. This Man was a sort of a revealed form of the invisible Brahma. He was called 'Swayambhu Manu' or the self-created Manu because he had no physical parent.

It is also written that Bhrigu, Pulaha, Kratu, Angiraa, Marichi, Daksha, Atri and Vasistha were the mentally-created "Manas Putra" of Brahma, and similar to him in all respects—i.e. had the same mystical powers and knowledge as the creator himself. These nine are also known as the 'Nine Brahmas'.

In Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 1, verse no. 1-2, sage Maitreye had told Bidur that the Swayambhu Manu had a wife named Shatrupa. From her he begot three daughters—viz. Aakuti, Devhuti and Prasuti. 'Aakuti' was married to Prajapati Ruchi.

Then later on in Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 1, verse nos. 10-11, sage Maitreye had told Bidur that Swayambhu Manu had married his second daughter named 'Devhuti' to sage Kardam, and his third daughter 'Prasuti' to Daksha Prajapati, the son of Brahma.

According to Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 1, verse nos. 47-53, Manu married his daughter Prasuti Daksha Prajapati, the son of the creator Brahma. Prasuti gave birth to sixteen daughters, out of whom thirteen elder ones were married to Dharma, one was married to Agni (Fire God), one to all the Pittars (spirits of dead ancestors who have become demi-gods), and one to Lord Shiva.

The eleven daughters who were married to Dharma were the following—Shraddha (who gave birth to Shubha), Maitri (who gave birth to Prasaad), Dayaa (who gave birth to Abhaya), Shaanti (who gave birth to Sukha), Tushti (who gave birth to Moda), Pushti (who gave birth to Ahankaar), Kriyaa (who gave birth to Yoga), Unnati (who gave birth to Darpa), Buddhi (who gave birth to Artha or financial well-being), Medhaa (who gave birth to Smriti or memory), Titikshaa (who gave birth to Kshema or taking care of necessities of life), Hrii or Lajja {modesty and dignity} (who gave birth to Prasraya or prayerful submission), and Murti (who gave birth to two great sons named Nar and Naaraayan).

The youngest daughter who was married to Lord Shiva was called Sati. This lady later on burnt herself out of anger and insult in the fire sacrifice of her own father. This incident however is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 60—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 65.

At the time of death however, she wished to be married to Lord Shiva once again as she was fully devoted to the Lord and did not want to marry anyone else in her next birth. So took birth as Parvati in the household of the king of mountains known as Himwaan. Parvati did severe Tapa to marry Lord Shiva. This story is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 72—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103.

A different version is narrated in Garud Puran. According to it the story is as follows:—With the aim of creating a world with living beings, the creator Brahma created five “Manas Putras” or mental-born sons in his own likeness. They were Dharma, Rudra, Manu, Bhrgu and Sankaadi. Then with his right thumb, Brahma created Daksha, and with his left thumb he created the wife of Daksha who produced 16 daughters. They were the following—Shradhaa, Maitri, Dayaa, Shaanti, Tushti, Pushti, Kriyaa, Unnati, Buddhi, Medhaa, Murti, Titiksha, Hli, Swaahaa, Swadhaa and Sati.

Swaahaa was married to Agni, Swadhaa to the Pittars, and the other thirteen daughters were married to Dharma. The 16th daughter, Sati, was married to Rudra whose other name is Shiva. When Daksha had insulted Shiva by not inviting him to the fire sacrifice he had organized, and in which Sati had burnt herself as narrated in Ram Charit Manas (Baal Kand, from Doha no. 61—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 65), Shiva had cursed him (Daksha) that he would be demoted to become a human being and take birth in the family of Dhruv. One of the descendents of Dhruv was known as Prachetaa who did severe Tapa (penance) to get the power of reproduction and spread his progeny. He married the daughter of Kandu, named Maarishaa, and from her he begot a son named Daksha. Then this Daksha produced so many living beings by his mere mental wish men that they filled all the four corners of the world. But the irony was that these mental-born creatures were unable to reproduce themselves—i.e. they could not beget children in order to perpetuate this creation consisting of living beings on earth. In other words, once they died the land would be barren once again.

In order to overcome this problem, Daksha married Asikni, the daughter of Veeran Prajapati. From her he produced thousand sons and countless daughters. These daughters were the ones from whom Kashyap and others were able to perpetuate this creation. In other words, this present generation of living beings, of all genres and families, has Daksha as their ancestor in the present cycle of creation.

More information pertaining to the story of Daksha and his sons (numbering ten thousand) is narrated as a note appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 79.]

baṛa adhikāra daccha jaba pāvā. ati abhimānu hr̥dayam̐ taba āvā. 7.
nahim̐ kō'u asa janamā jaga māhīm̐. prabhutā pā'i jāhi mada nāhīm̐. 8.

When Daksha acquired an exalted stature of being appointed as the guardian of the living beings of the kingdom of the Creator by the latter himself, immense sense of self-pride and arrogance took root in his heart<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Indeed it is true that there is no one who has taken birth in this world but does not have pride and ego if he or she gets to acquire high stature and position, or is honoured by someone who is great (like the creator Brahma who had honoured Daksha by making him the guardian of his creation)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Daksha became exceedingly proud of himself, thinking—“Oh, I am so great and able that the Creator has selected me to lead the world out of all the candidates for this coveted position. Now I am the king of the world, rivaling Indra who is the king of gods. No one can match me now. Oh, I am the undisputed sovereign now. None can challenge my position now because I have been appointed by the Creator himself.

<sup>2</sup>This is an important observation. It is worth noting here that only those who have taken birth in this world created by Brahma, the creator are prone to this negative trait of becoming arrogant and haughty. That is why the ‘self-born’ Supreme Being is free from this taint—because he is not created by Brahma, the creator.

So therefore, Lord Ram was never subjected to being influenced by the negative traits of ego, pride, arrogance or haughtiness for the simple and straight reason that he had come to this world out of his own free will, and not created by Brahma, the creator, like other living beings.]

To celebrate his newly acquired stature, Daksha summoned all the sages and began to perform a huge fire sacrifice. He sent invitations to all the gods, respectfully inviting them to come and take their respective shares of the offerings during the fire sacrifice. (Doha no. 60)

[Note—Who were invited? This is answered below in verse nos. 1-2. It ought to be noted that Shiva is left out.]

biṣṇu birañci mahēsu bihāī. calē sakala sura jāna banāī. 2.

The Kinnars (celestial dancers), the Naagas<sup>1</sup> (subterranean serpents), the Siddhas (mystics), the Gandharvas (celestial musicians and singers), and all the rest of the gods<sup>2</sup>, accompanied by their respective consorts, proceeded to attend the fire sacrifice of Daksha. (1)

All the gods and their consorts—except the three chief gods of the Trinity, viz. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder<sup>3</sup>—boarded their decorated aerial chariots and headed to the fire sacrifice of Daksha. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “Naagas”—Though the word ‘Naag’, simply put, means a serpent or snake, from mythological point of view they are semi-gods. the brief story of their origin is as follows—Sage Kashyap and his wife Kadru had 1000 sons who had 1000 hoods each. They were called the ‘Naagas’, and they ruled over the subterranean world. Out of them, there were 26 main Naagas such as Anant, Vaasuki, Shesh, Karkootak, Shankha, Kambal, Mahaaneel, Takshak, Padma, Mahaapadma, Mahaashankha, etc. The story is narrated in Padma Puran, Sristi Khanda, and Vishnu Puran, Section 1, Canto 21, verse no. 1-3.

<sup>2</sup>The Gods and their sub-classes—The creator Brahma created ten levels in creation. Out of them, the ‘gods’ constitute one level. According to Bhagwat Maha Puran, 3/10/27-28, the ‘gods’ themselves are classified into eight sub-classes or sections—viz. (i) Devta (the higher immortal gods), (ii) Pittar (spirit of dead ancestors), (iii) Asur (non-gods, but not mortal creatures), (iv) Gandharva and Apsara (celestial singers and musicians and their women), (v) Yaksha and Raksha (lower forms of Asurs and demoted spirits; demons in spirit form), (vi) Siddha (mystics), Chaaran (bards) and Vidyaadhar (lower spirits who possessed special skills and were learned but not qualified to become full gods), (vii) Bhut-Pret-Pishach (ghosts, phantoms, evil spirits), and (viii) Kinnars (celestial dancers). Refer also to: Amarkosh, Swarga Varga 1, verse no. 11.

The Gandharvas have a yellow complexion. They are said to be the sons of Kashyap Prajaapati and his wife Arishtaa. The Apsaraas are said to be their wives. They are regarded as the custodians of ‘Soma’ (the elixir of the gods that is stored in the Moon), medicine men of gods (because they give the Soma as a miracle potion for all ailments), propagators of heavenly knowledge, the controllers of the Nakshatras (zodiac signs and stars), etc. The patron god of the Gandharvas is ‘Varun’, the Water-God, and their chief or leader is Chitra-rath. The main Gandharvas are eleven in number as follows—Haha, Huhu, Chitrasen/Chitra-rath, Vidhyaadhar, Hansa, Vishwaa-vasu, Paraa-vasu, Gomaau, Tumburu, Viraadha and Nandi.

According to Taittiriya Aaranyaka, (i, 9, 3), there are eleven sub-classes of Gandharvas. But according to Agni Puran, the Gandharvas have twelve sub-classes, and they are Abhrajya, Andhaari, Rambhaari, Suryavarchaa, Kridhu, Hasta, Suhasta, Hans/Swan, Murdahwaan, Mahaamanaa, Vishwaa-vasu, and Krishaanu.

<sup>3</sup>Daksha had become so arrogant that he did not even invite his mentor, the creator Brahma. Daksha kept ill-will with Shiva, and since all the gods of the Trinity were deemed to be the same Brahm, the Supreme Being, in three different forms to carry out three different functions of creation, viz. to create (Brahma), to sustain (Vishnu) and to conclude (Shiva), Daksha decided to neglect all of them. But the other gods should have paid attention to the fact that these three gods of the Trinity were the senior most amongst them, and to by-pass them just to get their own share of the sacrificial offerings by someone (Daksha) who has insulted the Trinity Gods by not inviting them, and to whom all the gods paid their obeisance and bowed before, was an unacceptable thing by any criterion. The gods had to pay a heavy price for this deemed insult to the Trinity Gods—because we shall read a little later how Lord Shiva sends his disciple named Veerbhadra to destroy the fire sacrifice of Daksha and punish the gods—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 65.]

Sati observed different types of decorated aerial vehicles flying through the sky. (3)

In them, beautiful women-folk of the gods were singing such melodious songs with a sweet voice that if sages heard them they would be so enchanted that they would be inspired to abandon their meditative trance to listen and enjoy them (i.e. the meditating sages would be sufficiently enticed to stop their meditation and hear these pleasant songs and see the sight of magnificently decorated aerial vehicles flying through the sky in colourful formations). (4)

When Sati asked Lord Shiva about this wonderful sight and what it meant, he told her everything (regarding Daksha's fire sacrifice and the gods going to attend it).

When Sati heard of the fire sacrifice at her father's place, she felt a bit excited. (5)

[Note—Amid the gloom and despair that had surrounded Sati because of Shiva adopting a detached attitude towards her, this news was a sort of diversion for her depressed mind that would give her some moments of pleasure and comfort, as well as a chance to recover her emotional bearing and a bit of mental peace. So she asked Shiva to give her permission so that she can go and attend this fire sacrifice—refer: Doha no. 61 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8 herein below.]

She thought to herself—If Mahesh gives me permission then I can go and live there (at my father's place) for some time on this excuse (of having come to attend the fire sacrifice). (6)

[The reason why she wanted to go to her father's place for some days, and why she was reluctant to freely ask her husband to give her permission, is this—] Her heart was full of sorrow and grief because her husband had abandoned her. So therefore, she was very hesitant to approach him due to the guilt of her sins bearing heavy on her mind and heart.

[To wit, she feared he would become more annoyed with her that instead of doing penance to atone for her sins she wishes to enjoy the celebrations at her father's place, and therefore perhaps he would not allow her to come back to him when she returned from her father's place at the end of the fire sacrifice.] (7)

bōlī satī manōhara bānī. bhaya saṅkōca prēma rasa sānī. 8.

[But unable to resist herself, she approached Shiva.] Sati spoke to Shiva hesitantly and most politely because she was afraid of him (i.e. she was uncertain how her husband would respond to her).

But nevertheless, when she finally spoke it was with a very pleasant and polite tone as if her words were soaked in affection (for she tried her best not to annoy Shiva any more by showing a hint that she is uneasy and feels the need to have a change of environment to calm her nerves and sooth her mind). (8)

[Note—Sati knew of her mistakes, and was scared that her asking Shiva to give her permission to go to her father's place to attend celebrations instead of doing something to atone for her sins would not go down well with her husband. He could have sternly admonished her that at a time when she was expected to do some sort repentance and show remorse for her misdeeds, she wants to enjoy celebrations at her father's place. Wasn't she concerned about who would serve her husband during her absence? Even after suffering so much, hasn't she learnt any lesson in life?

So, Sati was unusually polite when she finally gathered courage to ask Shiva to give her permission and let her go to her father's place, in order to diffuse the tension as best as she could and behave normally as if nothing has happened.]

Lord Shiva replied to Sati, ‘What you said is primarily alright, and on the face of it, it is okay to my mind as well.

But there is a problem here, and it is this: it is not proper to do so (i.e. to go to your father’s place to attend the fire sacrifice ceremony) because he (your father, Daksha) has not sent us an invitation<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Daksha has invited all his other daughters, but he has not invited you and has ignored you because of his animosity and grudge with me. (2)

He once took an offence at me in the heavenly court of Brahma, the creator, and ever since that time he has been insulting me<sup>2</sup>. [And this is why he has not sent an invitation to either me or you.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When a religious function is underway in a person’s father’s home, there is no harm in going and attending it. So, primarily Sati’s request was okay. But the problem was that her father harboured severe ill-will with Sati’s husband, Lord Shiva. Going uninvited to someone’s place irrespective of who he or she is, and how closely he or she is related, is sure to invite rebuke, insult, scorn and ridicule. Sati did not think of this. The fact of the matter is that she was so overcome by the powerful forces of Maya that she had lost wisdom to judge what is good and what is bad.

This error of judgment and inability to think wisely and intelligently as to what is good and what is not is at the root cause of all her miseries in the first place. It is this lack of wisdom which prevailed upon her to test the authenticity of Lord Ram by disguising herself as the Lord’s wife without thinking of the consequences of such an action, and it was the same lack of wisdom that later on made her tell lies to her husband. And now it is the same lack of wisdom that prevented her from understanding that it is highly improper to go to someone’s place without a proper invitation, especially when that person keeps ill-will with one’s closest kin, and for a wife her husband is obviously the closest relation.

Sati forgot that if she did go uninvited to her father’s place it would send a strong signal to all those present there that she did not bother about the insult that has been cast upon her husband, Lord Shiva. And this wrong signal would boomerang upon her as the entire community of gods and goddesses assembled there would ridicule her and treat her with contempt as someone who has no respect for her husband. It would result in all her self-respect, dignity and honour being sent for a toss. As the events unfolded, this is exactly what has happened—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 63 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

Once, the creator Brahma had organised a fire sacrifice in which all the gods and semi-gods as well as the all the sons of Brahma who were assigned the task of propagating this creation were invited. Both Shiva and Daksha were invited too. It so happened that when Daksha entered the venue, all other gods got up to show their respects to him, but Lord Shiva kept sitting. This is because Daksha was not even a senior god, and was merely a “Prajapati” (caretaker of Brahma's creation). But those who are of a low mentality and are full of ego think themselves to be too big or higher in stature than they actually are. So, Daksha took offence at Shiva's behaviour.

Daksha was so haughty that he immediately rebuked Shiva and told the latter that he would excommunicate him from his society and avenge his insult by not inviting Shiva to participate and accept any offerings during any fire sacrifice that Daksha would organise in his kingdom. Shiva is an exemplarily self-restrained and highly dispassionate Lord God as he is an ascetic of the highest order, and so it did not matter to him whether or not Daksha insulted him, or did not invite him to a fire sacrifice, or didn't offer Shiva his share of the sacrificial offerings.

The question is ‘why did Daksha take special offence at Shiva when Brahma and Vishnu too had not got up as he entered the venue’? The answer is this—‘Daksha's daughter Sati was married to Shiva, and therefore the latter was his son-in-law. Daksha took special umbrage at Shiva because he treated Shiva's showing indifference to him as an insult inflicted upon his dignity and stature by his son-in-law. Daksha forgot, in his misplaced sense of false importance and ego, that Shiva was one of the almighty gods of the Trinity and not merely his son-in-law. The other two senior gods, i.e. Brahma and Vishnu, were not related to Daksha as was Shiva, and this was the reason why he was especially very angry with Shiva.

But Shiva's insult did not go down well with Nandi (the Bull) who is his devout follower and mount. So Nandi counter-cursed Daksha that if he did so (i.e. if he did not offer the required share of sacrificial offerings to Shiva as ordained by the scriptures) then his fire sacrifice would be ruined.

Shiva all but forgot about this incident, but Daksha tied a firm knot in his mind that he will definitely insult Shiva by holding a fire sacrifice and neglecting him.

During the fire sacrifice organised by Brahma, when Daksha entered the venue, not only Lord Shiva but the other two senior-most gods, i.e. Brahma the creator, and Vishnu the sustainer, too had not got up. This is the reason why we learn here that Daksha had not invited even Brahma and Vishnu in his fire sacrifice—refer: Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 61.]

 tadapi birōdha māna jaham̐ kō'ī. tahām̐ ga'ēm̐ kalyānu na hō'ī. 6.

Oh Bhavani (another name of Sati)! If you go there without any invitation, then your honour, self-respect and dignity would suffer. (4)

Although it is alright, without doubt, to go to the house of one's friend, one's Lord, or one's father even without a formal invitation, (5)---

---but still it is not good for anyone to go to the place of someone who harbours any kind of hard-feelings, jealousy, animosity or ill-will.' (6)

[Note—Whatever Shiva warned Sati proved to be true. She was neglected and insulted at her father's place: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 63 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.]

 kaha prabhu jāhu jō binahim̐ bōlā'ēm̐. nahim̐ bhali bāta hamārē bhā'ēm̐. 8.

Shiva tried his best to explain things to Sati (and try to persuade her not to go to her father's place without an invitation), but so powerful is one's fate and destiny that wisdom eluded her; she would not see the reason and remained adamant.

[It is this stubborn nature of hers that had led to her miseries in the first place. She had not listened to Shiva's advice not to cast doubts on Lord Ram's divinity and integrity, and Sati's stubbornness had resulted in Shiva's abandonment of her when she assumed the form of Sita to test Lord Ram, and later resorted to telling lies in order to hide her misdemeanours. She is once again repeating the error of disobeying Lord Shiva and not paying heed to his advice.] (7)

Deciding that she won't listen to his advice, Lord Shiva finally gave up and said in a remorseful mood—'Well, if you go without being invited, do as you like, but I don't think it to be a good thing to do. I don't like it, and nor do I agree with it.

[Do as you think fit because you are stubborn and won't heed sane advice. But don't think I have given any bit of consent to it. I do not like your going to your father's place when he has completely neglected us, but you seem to be adamant. So, I think that it is wise for me to keep quiet now as it is clear that your fate is doomed.]' (8)

Lord Har (Shiva) tried his best to persuade the daughter of Daksha<sup>1</sup> (Sati) not to go (uninvited to her father's place), but unfortunately she would not listen.

So finally, Lord Tripurari<sup>2</sup> (Shiva, the Lord of the three dimensions of the world) sent her (i.e. allowed her to go to her father's place) along with his chief attendants to accompany her. (Doha no. 62)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The epithet “daughter of Daksha” is used here to indicate that after all Sati had inherited the character and the genes of her father—to be stubborn, to lack wisdom, and inclined to show disrespect to Shiva and his words by disobeying him—inspite of the fact that Shiva was not an ordinary god but ‘Tripurari’, “the Lord of the entire world consisting of three levels of existence, viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world”.]

daccha na kachu pūchī kusalātā. satihi bilōki jarē saba gātā. 3.

When Bhavani (i.e. the wife of Lord Bhava, Shiva) reached her father's house, no one welcomed her due to fear of inviting the wrath of Daksha. (1)

However, her mother was the only person who met her respectfully. [That is, Sati's mother met her affectionately, and she was the only person who welcomed her.]

Her sisters too met her, but all of them were smiling (in a sarcastic manner)<sup>1</sup>.

*Daksha did not as much as asked for her well-being even as a matter of formal courtesy. Instead, when he saw her he was so agitated that his body burnt like it was afire. [His blood-pressure rose and he became exceedingly annoyed.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why were they ‘smiling in a sarcastic manner’? Because Sati had come alone, without being accompanied by her husband Shiva, whereas the rest of her sisters were accompanied by their respective husbands. Besides this, they smiled scornfully to indicate that though they were sisters but in the present situation Sati was the lowliest amongst them as not only her husband Lord Shiva was an ascetic but he had discarded her. A lady abandoned by her husband does not deserve respect in society.

Another reason for their scornful smile is that Sati deemed it fit to come to her father's place inspite of knowing that he is opposed to her husband Lord Shiva, inspite of her not being invited by her father, and inspite of the rejection of her by her own husband, a situation which was extremely humiliating and ought to have put Sati to so much of shame that she would avoid meeting anyone, let alone her relations who would naturally ridicule and scorn at her. She looked most odd and virtually outcast in the whole household of Daksha. It looked as if Sati had no self-respect or a sense of probity, and that she had gone nuts.

To add to her woes, she wasn't received well by her father, and her husband had been excommunicated from the community of gods so that he could not participate and take his share of the offerings of the fire sacrifice. Being fully aware of this, Sati chose to come, and this meant that she had no sense of self-respect, dignity and honour, something that was bound to invite scorn and ridicule.

*This verse no. 3 can be interpreted as follows: Daksha did not welcome her, and did not even ask for her welfare. When Sati observed this rude attitude of her father, as well as the scornful smile of her sisters, she became very angry and her entire body became so agitated as if it was burning in fire.

What made Sati so angry, especially when Shiva had forewarned her of the type of reception she must expect at her father's place? Well, firstly, Sati had little faith in her husband's wisdom as is evident when she had not believed him with respect to his advice on Lord Ram. So, even in the case of her father she had not paid much weight to Shiva's advice that she won't be welcome—because she thought that her father may harbour ill-feelings for her husband but he will not have any hard feelings against her as all fathers love their off-springs.

Her father may not have invited her husband out of personal enmity, but she thought that when she would meet him he would naturally show a father's inherent affection for his daughter, and would treat her in the same way he treated his other daughters, her sisters. But as the event turned out, it was not to be so. All her sisters had nothing but scorn for her, and quite the contrary to her expectations he father loathed her more than anyone else.

In this scenario, Sati became very agitated and angry. The “burning of the body as if on fire” is a figure of speech to imply that the concerned person is highly agitated and angry as if his or her body is being scorched by heat.]

taba cita caṛhē'u jō saṅkara kahē'ū. prabhu apamānu samujhi ura dahē'ū. 5.

[Sati virtually bit her lips in disgust and somehow managed to suppress her anger in the initial phase. But then her anger burst out in the open when—] Sati went to see the fire sacrifice, but she could not find Lord Shiva's share of offerings. [During a fire sacrifice, offerings meant for the different gods are kept aside. Sati looked over them and found that no offering has been set aside for Shiva.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

At that moment she recalled what her husband, Lord Shiva, had told her (or had warned her—that it is sure that Daksha wouldn't offer any sacrificial offerings to him due to past animosity)<sup>2</sup>.

Interpreting this as an affront to the honour of the Lord (Shiva) and a clear public insult of him, her heart was outraged and it began burning with anger and seething with disgust (with a desire to seek retribution). (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Sati glanced over the offerings she discovered to her dismay that though the other two gods of the Trinity, viz. Lord Vishnu and Lord Brahma, had not come, but still their share of sacrificial offerings had been kept aside. Only Lord Shiva had been singled out for utter neglect and contempt as not even a trace of the offerings were set aside for him even in a token and perfunctory manner as absolutely necessary to be done during a fire sacrifice. This is because during such religious rites, offerings must be made to ‘all the gods without exception’.

Had no offerings been kept aside for Vishnu and Brahma, the affront to Shiva would not have been so marked, but as the things stood Sati could not digest that Shiva be singled out for such brazen insult.

The previous sorrows from which she was already suffering till now (that her husband had repudiated her) had not tormented her heart as much as this new horror (of witnessing her husband's public insult and the scorn heaped on him). This new torment was intolerable, and it shook her heart from its core. (6)

*Although there are many types of great sorrows and grief that torment a person during his or her interaction with the world, but the greatest amongst them is being insulted, scorned at and rebuked in front of the society*.

[*This verse can be interpreted in another way also as follows: “Although there are many types of great sorrows and grief that torment a person during his or her interaction with the world, but the greatest amongst them is the insult, the rebuke and the scorn that is heaped on one's own people, such as one's kith and kin.”] (7)

[Note—The reader would note that all of Sati's miseries have their genesis in her stubborn nature and lack of faith and trust in her husband who was not an ‘ordinary husband’ but the wisest of all the gods. The lesson that one learns is that one ought to pay attention to one's sincere advisor, especially when he is a learned and wise one, and not be too stubborn or over-confident about one's own wisdom and intelligence.

The second lesson to be learnt is that one should never go anywhere uninvited, no matter what happens, especially at a place where one is certain that he or she would not be welcome because the host harbours ill-feelings towards one's close relatives. In the present case we observe that Sati had not personally offended her father Daksha in any way, and on the contrary had come to her father's place in good faith and with full confidence that he would show fatherly affection for her, but as it turned out, she discovered to her dismay, that since he had ill-will for her husband he treated even his own daughter with disdain.]

This thought (as described in verse nos. 5 and 7 herein above) made Sati furious with indignation and anger. Her mother tried to calm her down in various ways.

[Her mother tried to soothe her hurt feelings in the best way she could, and tried to dissuade her from taking any reckless action in anger. But as it turned out, the events had gone out of hand, and it was too much for Sati to cope with Shiva's public insult and humiliation—as will be clear in the following narrative.] (8)

Insult to Lord Shiva was unbearable and unacceptable for Sati, and she could not pacify her heart on this count. So, outraged and unable to restrain herself, she poured scorn at the whole assembly and reproached it sternly in angry words—(Doha no. 63)

The extremely peeved Sati angrily snubbed the whole assembly, and said vehemently in a voice full of wrath and curse—‘Listen all the members of this assembly, including the sages who are present here. Listen all of you who have criticised Lord Shiva or have heard such insults being inflicted upon the Lord. (1)

All of you will immediately be given the fruits of your deeds (i.e. you will be summarily punished for your insulting Shiva). Let my father also regret fully and repent (for his misdeeds and sin of insulting Lord Shiva). (2)

It is a matter of rule that wherever and whenever you hear saints, Lord Shiva and Lord Vishnu (“Sri-Pati”, the Lord of Sri or goddess Laxmi) being reviled (abused, insulted, scorned at or criticised) [1], then if it is within your means you should chop-off the tongue of the reviler, and if it is not possible to do so then you should close your ears (so that you don't have to listen such vile words) and run away (get away) from the place [2]. It is such an irony that Lord Mahesh (Shiva), who is the universal Atma (soul) of the entire creation (“jagadātamā”), who is the Lord of the entire world (“purārī”), who is the Father of the whole world (“jagata janaka”), and who is the well-wisher of all (“hitakārī”) [5]---

---My father is so stupid and of a low intellect that he has chosen to criticise and revile the same great Lord of creation! And it is an irony and my bad luck that this body of mine is produced by his sperms (sukra) (because most unfortunately I happen to be his daughter) [6]. (5-6)

asa kahi jōga agini tanu jārā. bhaya'u sakala makha hāhākārā. 8.

It is for this reason (as narrated in verse nos. 3-6 herein above, but especially verse no. 6) that I will leave my sinful, hateful and vile body immediately (because it is born out the despicable sperms of my sinful father Daksha). And while I do so, I will enshrine Lord Shiva, who is adorned with the crescent moon on his forehead and whose flag has the emblem of the Bull (“Brish”—which stands for the virtues of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, and noble conduct), in my heart.<sup>1</sup> (7)

Saying thus, Sati burnt her physical gross body in the fire of produced by doing Yoga<sup>2</sup>. As soon as she burnt herself, there was a tumultuous plaintive cry of dismay and horror<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati has now realised that the root cause of all her miseries is that she carries the genes of her sinful, stubborn, stupid and haughty father Daksha. He had not understood the divine nature of Lord Shiva, and had treated him as an ordinary god. That Shiva had married his daughter Sati further reduced the stature of the Lord in his eyes—for Daksha started treating Shiva as being inferior to him by the virtue of him being Shiva's father-in-law. In his ignorance, naivety and sense of false self-importance, Daksha had forgotten that Shiva was the Lord of creation, and that is why he is honoured by the epithet “Maha-Deva”, the Great God. No other god has this honour.

Lord Shiva is a highly self-realised and enlightened Lord who knows that the gross physical body is not the true self of any living being, but that the true self is the Atma, the Soul which is a universal pure conscious entity that lives in the body of all living beings. That is why Shiva is called “Jagdaatma”—the universal Soul of the entire world.

It is said that when a person dies, the last thoughts that are in his or mind decide where he or she goes in re-birth. For instance, if one thinks of Lord God then after death his soul migrates to the abode of the Lord. If he thinks of this world and its pleasures, then he is reborn in the world to fulfill his desires to enjoy it.

In the case of Sati, she enshrined Shiva in her heart, which is saying that her mind and sub-conscience was fixed on Shiva, and therefore she was bound to go where Shiva was in her next birth. As it eventually happened, Sati was re-born as Parvati in the household of Himvaan, the king of the snow-covered mountains known as Himalayas. She married Lord Shiva in this new incarnation.

<sup>2</sup>The word used in the text for the fire in which Sati burnt herself is “Yog Agni”. This is the type of fire that is kindled inside one's body by friction caused by the vital winds. Usually this is the sort of death achieved by ascetics who are expert in doing Yoga. Since Sati was the consort of Shiva who is an expert ascetic himself and the patron god of all ascetics, it is natural to expect that she had full knowledge of this sort of death. It is painless and voluntary.

According to some versions, however, the phrase “Joga Agni” (Áô» ¥ç»çÛ) refers to the fire of the sacrificial pit. If this is to be treated as the means by which Sati left her body then it would obviously mean that she jumped into the fire sacrifice to burn herself. The word “Sati” refers to ancient practice in India wherein the dead man's widow burnt herself in the cremation fire lit to cremate her husband's body. In this case, the widow rode atop the funeral pile consisting of firewood, and then fire was lit.

<sup>3</sup>Sati's burning of herself during the process of the sacrifice was tantamount to it getting disrupted. A disrupted fire sacrifice portends great evil for the patron who hosts it. As we shall read below, Lord Shiva sent his chief disciple named Birbhadra who came angrily and not only completely defiled and upturned the fire sacrifice ritual but also severely punished all the gods and sages who were present there.]

दो०. सती मरनु सुनि संभु गन लगे करन मख खीस ।

जग्य बिधंस बिलोकि भृगु रच्छा कीन्हि मुनीस ॥ ६४ ॥

dōhā.

satī maranu suni sambhu gana lagē karana makha khīsa.
jagya bidhnsa bilōki bhr̥gu racchā kīnhi munīsa. 64.

As soon as the attendants of Lord Shiva, who had accompanied Sati on the instructions of Shiva (see line no. 2 of Doha no. 62 herein above), heard of her death<sup>1</sup>, they immediately began to spoil the fire sacrifice.

When sage Bhrigu* saw that the fire sacrifice was being ruined, he intervened and saved it from complete destruction<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 64)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This shows that the attendants of Shiva who had accompanied Sati were not allowed to enter the venue, but stood guard outside the gates. When Daksha had decided to completely neglect Shiva it is natural that the latter's attendants would also be boycotted. So, when Sati burnt herself inside the pavilion and a huge tumult was raised, these Shiva's attendants rushed inside to find out what had happened. And as soon as they saw that Sati had died, they became furious and drew their weapons, creating mayhem inside the pavilion to avenge Sati's death and Shiva's insult.

<sup>2</sup>When Shiva's attendants started ruining the fire sacrifice, sage Bhrigu invoked some mystical Mantras (secret formulas) of the Yajur Veda which help to overcome those forces that disrupt a fire sacrifice. Bhrigu invoked those specialised Mantras and offered oblations to the fire once again. This resulted in creation of thousands of semi-gods named "Ribhu", who immediately chased away Shiva's attendants. This saved the fire sacrifice from immediate ruin.

This statement that the 'fire sacrifice was saved by sage Bhrigu' shows that he was the priest presiding over the performance of the sacrifice. But it was a temporary relief because soon Lord Shiva sent Birbhadrā who came angrily to completely ruin the sacrifice and punish all those present, including Daksha. Refer verse nos. 1-3 herein below.

*Sage Bhrigu is a well known sage and seer who appears in a number of Vedic and Purnaic works. His name 'Bhrigu' is derived from the root word 'Bhrij' or 'Bhraaj' which literally means to roast or burn, and therefore it could mean the sage, who was a fire sacrifice priest, had some mystical powers which allowed him to kindle the altar fire automatically by use of Mantras. According to mythological history, the patron God of lightening, Lord Maatarishwan, brought the celestial lightening down to earth and taught three priests the art of kindling the sacred altar fire using the Aranis ('the fire sticks' used to kindle fire by vigorous rubbing together). These three priests were the Bhrigu, the Angiras, and the Atharvan.

Sage Bhrigu has is regarded as being one of the nine 'Manas Putras' of Brahma, the creator. [That is, Bhrigu was born as the son of Brahma because the latter wished in his mind and heart, the 'Mana', to have a son, a 'Putra', rather than the usual process by which a son is born, i.e. the physical process of procreation by intercourse.]

He is one of the seven celestial sages known as "Sapta-rishis".

He is also stated elsewhere as being the son of Indra (the king of Gods). The Taittiriya Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, in its Valli 3, Anuvak 1 describes him as 'Bhrgu Vaaruni', i.e. the son of Varun (the Water God). He was the father of Laxmi, the divine consort of Vishnu the sustainer and protector of creation. That is why Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity, is also known as Bhargavi, the daughter of Bhargava, or Bhrigu.

According to Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 1, verse nos. 43-45, sage Bhrigu had a wife named 'Khyati' from whom he begot two sons named Dhaataa and Vidhaataa, and a daughter named Sri. 'Sri' (whose another name was Laxmi) was later married to Vishnu. Meanwhile, sage Meru married his daughters Aayati and Niyati to Dhaataa and Vidhaataa respectively. Aayati gave birth to Mrikand, and Niyati gave birth to Praan. Mrikand's son was the famous sage Markendeya, and Praan's son was Ved-shiraa. Hence, sage Markendeya was a great grandson of Bhrigu.

According to Bhagwat Maha-puran, 3/24/21-24, and 4/1, it is narrated that in the epoch called Swayambhu-Manwantar, king Manu's daughter named Devhuti was married to sage Kardam from whom she begot nine daughters. They were named Kalaa, Anusuya, Shraddha, Havirbhu, Gati, Kriyaa, Urjaa or Arundhati, Chiti and Shaanti, and Khyati. They were married respectively to sages Marichi, Atri, Angiraa, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasistha, Atharvan and Bhrigu.

In other births sage Bhrigu is regarded as the grand-father of Shukracharya (also known as Ushnaa), the moral preceptor of the Demons (Refer: Bhagwat, Skandha 4, Canto 1, verse no. 45). [Bhrigu's son was Kavi, and the latter's son was Shukracharya.]

He was one of the ancient sages after whom a lineage was established—and his descendents assumed his name as their surname or title. It is 'Bhargava' or 'Bhrigu'. Some well known names of sages who followed him in this lineage are sages Jamdagni and Parashuram.

He is one of the four sages (the others being Marichi, Atri and Kashyap) who had elaborately described the Vakhaanas Aagam followed by some Vaishnav sects (followers of Vishnu worship).

He performed severe austerity and penance at a place called Bhrigu Kaccha located on the banks of river Narmada where it merges with the Arabian Sea. It is situated in the Broach area of Gujrat state of western India.

He is credited with composing the tome of astrology and horoscopes known as 'Bhrigu Sanhita'. It is said to contain a data base of all possible horoscopes that can be created by considering all possible permutations and combinations of the nine planets and twelve zodiac signs.

The third chapter, called Valli no. 3, of the famous Taittiriya Upanishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition is revealed by Varun to Bhrigu when the latter approached his father Varun to ask him the method by which Brahm can be realised. He once tested the Trinity Gods (Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva) and determined that Vishnu is the best amongst them and alone deserves worship. This story in brief is as follows—

Once all the sages had collected and decided to judge which of the Trinity Gods, i.e. Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder, is the greatest. Sage Bhrigu was appointed to find it out. Bhrigu first went to Brahma and did not show any respect to him. This enraged Brahma, but somehow he managed to control himself. Then Bhrigu went to meet Shiva. Shiva came forward but Bhrigu did not want to meet him, accusing the Lord of following inauspicious way of life. This enraged Shiva who lifted his trident to kill Bhrigu. Then Parvati, the consort of Shiva, intervened and pacified him.

Finally, Bhrigu went to Vishnu who was reclining in his divine abode known as Vaikuntha. Bhrigu got annoyed that Vishnu did not get up to welcome him, and so he kicked the Lord on his chest. Lord Vishnu woke up from his sleep, and instead of becoming angry at Bhrigu asked for his forgiveness as he was unaware that the Brahmin has arrived as he was asleep. Further, Vishnu showed Bhrigu great respect and said that instead of feeling insulted on being kicked on the chest, he is feeling honoured that a great sage had blessed him by touching his body with his august feet. This stunned Bhrigu; he was dumbfounded at the gracious and forgiving nature of Vishnu. But Vishnu's consort Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity, was extremely peeved, and she cursed the Brahmin that henceforth the entire Brahmin race will have to suffer because of lack of wealth and would be forced to beg for their sustenance.

Lord Vishnu wears the mark made by the sage's footprint on his chest as a token of respect that he has for learned Brahmins.

Bhrigu came back and narrated the entire thing to the assembly of sages. They decided that indeed it was Lord Vishnu who was the greatest because he had conquered anger, the worst of all the negative qualities and the cause of all strife and destruction. Anger was to become the greatest of evils and vices in this world, and forgiveness as the greatest of virtues.]

When Lord Shiva got the news (of Sati's death and the cause of it)<sup>1</sup>, he became furious. He angrily sent Birbhadra<sup>2</sup> to take revenge and punish the perpetrators. (1)

He (i.e. Birbhadra) went immediately and laid to waste the fire sacrifice of Daksha, punishing the various gods and other attendees in a proper manner. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How did Shiva come to know of the developments that resulted in the death of Sati? One answer is that his attendants, whom he had sent with Sati to escort and protect her (as narrated in Doha no. 62), came rushing back to inform him of the developments at Daksha's place.

But there is a different version given in Shiva Puran, Kashi Khand, Canto 89, verse nos. 5-12. According to it, sage Narad came to Shiva and reported how and why Sati had died. Shiva showed indifference, saying that it is the way of the mortal world, that one should be detached from such developments and remain aloof from being honoured or insulted, or being attached to worldly relationships such thinking someone as one's wife or father-in-law. Sage Narad told Shiva that though this is a highly correct way of spiritual thinking but from the practical point of view it is counter-productive. Say, what will the world think if Shiva remains indifferent and does not take any action? The wicked world, which does not realise Shiva's stellar spiritual philosophy and highly enlightened state of being, would think that Shiva was afraid to take action, or he was too weak or impotent to seek retribution for his own insult as well as the ignominious way his wife Sati had died. His exalted stature in the community of gods would be severely undermined. This motivated Shiva to send Birbhadra to punish those who were responsible for Sati's death.

The same story is narrated in Kedar Khand, Canto 3.

<sup>2</sup>Birbhadra (also Virbhadra)—The name means “a gentleman (“Bhadra”) who is very brave (“Beer’ or ‘Veer’)”.

According to Kedar Khand, Canto 3, angry Shiva tore at the lock of hairs on his head and uprooted some of its strands. Then he slammed them angrily on the side of the mountain at Kailash. This produced Birbhadra and his army of attendants.

Birbhadra’s birth and the subsequent destruction of Daksha’s fire sacrifice is narrated in detail in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 5 as follows:--

According to its verse nos. 1-6—“As soon as Shiva heard of how he was insulted in the fire sacrifice of Daksha that resulted in Sati’s death, he became furious. Chewing his lips with his teeth in anger, he got up, tore at the lock of hairs on his head, uprooted some of its strands, and slammed them against the earth. This produced Birbhadra. He had a colossal body, thousand arms that held countless forms of weapons, three eyes as brilliant as the sun, ferocious sharp teeth, hairs that resembled leaping flames of a raging fire, dark complexion, and he wore a garland of skulls.

Birbhadra stood before Lord Shiva with palms joined in submission, and asked Shiva for instructions. Shiva told him—‘Oh son, you have been created from a fraction of my own body (because Birbhadra was created from Shiva’s hairs). You will be called another Rudra like me. Go and punish Daksha in an appropriate manner.’ Birbhadra lifted his trident and rushed to the fire sacrifice of Daksha. At that time it appeared that a huge storm has arrived.”

Mahabharat, Shanti-parva, however, presents a little variation of how Birbhadra was created. Here, Vaismapaayan Veda Vyas told Janmanjaya that “Shiva produced Birbhadra from his mouth. The latter was an image of Shiva, and a personified form of anger. Hence, Birbhadra was called ‘Rudra’, meaning the angry form of Shiva. When Shiva ordered him to go punish Daksha and ruin his sacrifice because it was not being conducted according to the sanction of the scriptures, Birbhadra produced countless devil warriors from each root of his hair on his skin. They were aided by Mahakaali, the ferocious form of Sati’s spirit.

Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 5, verse nos. 13-26 describe in detail the destruction of the fire sacrifice of Daksha and how those who had caused insult to Shiva, such as the selfish gods, the priests, as well as Daksha were punished. So, as soon as Birbhadra reached the site of the fire sacrifice, he and his warriors surrounded the venue of the sacrifice and laid everything to ruin (verse nos. 13-15).

To punish sage Bhrigu who had taken the side of Daksha and scorned at Shiva in as much as he not only sneered at the Lord and challenged his authority but also helped Daksha to resume the fire sacrifice and chased away Sati’s escorts by creating demi-gods by the virtue of mystical powers of Mantras of the Yajur Veda in which he was an expert.

As soon as Birbhadra reached the venue of the fire sacrifice, he took Daksha Prajapti as captive. His companion Chandish held Pusha as hostage, and Nandi (the Bull of Shiva) caught hold of Bhagdeva (the personified forms of various gods who were there to take their shares of the offerings made to the sacred fire).

Then Birbhadra pinned Bhagdeva to the ground and gorged out his eyes because he had used his eyes to signal encouragement to Daksha to insult Shiva in the court of Brahma earlier (verse no. 20).

Then he pulled out the teeth of Pusha because when Daksha was insulting Shiva in the same court of Brahma, Pusha was laughing with an open mouth and showing his thirty-two teeth in mirth (verse no. 21).

Finally, Birbhadra pushed Daksha to the ground, sat on his chest, squeezed and wringed his neck so as to break it from the shoulders like one breaks the neck of a sacrificial animal. Then he threw this severed neck into the fire pit. After thus punishing all chief offenders, Birbhadra returned to Lord Shiva at Kailash—(verse nos. 22-26).

The remaining gods, sages and others were obviously so terrified that they made good their escape before Birbhadra could turn his attention at them—Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 6, verse no. 1.

In Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 7, verse no. 60, sage Maitreya told Bidur that the former had heard of this story of how Daksha's fire sacrifice was ruined because he had insulted Lord Shiva from Uddhav.

The story of how Daksha had insulted Shiva in the court of Brahma is narrated in Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 2, verse nos. 4-33.

At that time Birbhadra had cut-off the head of Daksha and threw it in the fire pit of the sacrifice. This fire was called "Dakshinaagni", the same one in which sage Bhrigu was offering oblations. After this incident, Brahma etc. prayed to Lord Shiva to forgive Daksha as the latter was Brahma's son who was created by him to oversee this creation as its guardian. The all-forgiving and merciful Lord Shiva agreed, and to revive Daksha he stitched the head of a goat on his torso. Daksha came alive, and he thanked Shiva by praying to him in the voice of a goat, but bleating meekly. This pleased Shiva. Henceforth, Shiva blessed Daksha that whenever anyone offers worship to him (Shiva) then the worshipper should conclude his prayers by making the sound similar to that made by a goat.

This entire episode is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-puran, Skandha 4—(i) Canto 6, verse nos. 1-8, 33, 41-53 (where Brahma has prayed to Shiva to forgive the punished gods and revive them); (ii) Canto 7, verse nos. 5, 7-8 (Shiva stitching the head of a goat on Daksha), verse nos. 9-15 (where Daksha has prayed to Shiva), and verse no. 16 (where it is said that Daksha, who now had the head of a goat, resumed his fire sacrifice after being forgiven by Shiva).]

The ignoble and contemptible fate of Daksha and all others who had the temerity and the audacity to insult Lord Shiva (the greatest amongst the gods) was in line with the fate of anyone who dares to insult or oppose the Great Lord, Lord Shiva. (3)

This history is known by the whole world (and narrated in detail in the Purans), and therefore I (sage Yagyawalkya<sup>1</sup>) have narrated it in brief. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Remember: This story of Lord Shiva's marriage is being narrated by sage Yagyawalkya to sage Bhradwaj when the latter asked him to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram. Yagyawalkya started his narration with the visit of Lord Shiva to sage Agastya's hermitage and subsequent events that led to the narration of Shiva's marriage with Parvati. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 47 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8.]

At the time of her death, Sati asked Lord Hari (Vishnu, the Supreme Being), to bless her with a boon that she may have affection and devotion for (i.e. serve) the holy feet of Lord Shiva in all her successive births. (5)

It is for this reason that she was re-born in the household of the king (or the patron deity) of the snow-covered mountains (known as the Himalayas) as Parvati. (6)

[Note—An exactly the same thing is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 7, verse no. 58.

An interesting thing is to be noted here. Sati had requested Lord Hari “to grant her a boon so that she may serve or have devotion for the feet of Lord Shiva in all her forthcoming births”, instead of seeking “final dissolution of her gross body so that her soul finds its liberation and deliverance, or in other words, seek final emancipation and salvation for herself”. This is because she had a desire to serve Lord Shiva like all ‘Bhakts’ or devotees want. In order to serve Shiva’s holy feet it was necessary to take a birth once again. If she had sought final dissolution for her soul, if she had sought final emancipation and salvation for her soul it would have meant that the soul would merge with its primary source, the cosmic Soul known as Brahm, and there would be no rebirth for her. This destiny of the soul is known as “Moksha”. If she had sought Moksha then in this situation it would have been the end of the cycle of birth and death for her, and this meant she wouldn’t be able to fulfil her desire to serve Lord Shiva any longer.

A ‘Bhakta’ (devotee) does not want Moksha; he or she wants to be able to serve the object of his or her adoration and devotion for a long-long time. Ascetics and hermits, those who are self-realised and well-versed in the higher learning of the metaphysical philosophy of the Upanishads, however, prefer dissolution of their gross body and find final freedom for their soul for all times to come. In other words, they seek ‘Moksha’.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 10 where we read that Baali, the monkey king of Kishkindha, had sought a similar sort of boon from Lord Ram at the time of his death.

Similarly, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 24 we find that the friends and common citizens of Ayodhya pray to God that they be so blessed that in every birth they have to take due to the cumulative effect of their deeds in any given birth, they can have unstinted devotion for Lord Ram and are able to serve him.

Even sage Vasistha, who was the royal priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya and the son of the creator Brahm, had also sought this type of blessing in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 49.

Now, why was she born in the household of ‘Himwaan’, the king or the deity of the snow-covered mountains known as Himalayas? There are the following possible reasons for it—

(i) At the time of death she had asked that in her next birth she could serve Lord Shiva, and it is well known that Shiva’s terrestrial abode is in Mt. Kailash which is located in the northern fringes of the Himalayas.

(ii) Sati was scorched in heat of two kinds—one was the heat generated by her anger, and the other was the heat that burnt her physical body. So her soul wished to be born in a cold environment, and no other place suited its desire better than the ‘snow-covered mountains’.

(iii) Her soul wished to take birth in a home where the general ambience was of contentedness, calmness and tranquility as opposed to ambition, greed, and a false sense of pride, arrogance and ego. Himwaan, the king of the mountains, was inherently cool and calm by temperament as symbolised by the snow that covered his kingdom. Himalayan mountain ranges are by their inherent nature a tranquil and serene place where hermits and ascetics seeking solace and succour for their souls can live in peace, as opposed to kingdoms in the plains where agitation, restlessness, greed, arrogance, strife, jealousy, malice and other worldly taints are order of the day and the dominant features.

Sati had had enough of it when she was born as the daughter of Daksha Prajapati. So she wanted peace in her new birth, and therefore her soul chose to take re-birth in the Himalayas.

(iv) It was destined for the soul of Sati that it would serve Lord Shiva again in her next birth. But to attain Shiva was not easy; it required doing severe Tapa (penance and austerity). Himalayas are the ideal place for doing Tapa. Even those who are born in the plains go to the Himalayas in the last days of their lives when they decide to do Tapa to attain emancipation and salvation for their tormented soul. This is also one of the prime reasons why Sati was born in the lap of the Himalayas themselves so that she finds it easy and convenient to do Tapa in a place close to her birth place, a place that has an environment and topography with which she is familiar since birth so as to facilitate her to cope with the rigours of doing severe Tapa.]

Ever since Uma (Sati’s name in her new birth; the other name being ‘Parvati’) took birth in the household of the king of mountains (“Sail Griha”*), all imaginable sorts of prosperity and well-being spread in all the directions of the realm. The mountains became an abode of blessings and abundance. (7)

Sages and hermits established their holy hermitages here and there, everywhere, and the king of the realm (Himwaan) gave them land and other facilities for the purpose. (8)

[Note—*The word “saila” means ‘mountain’, and ‘Griha’ (gr̥ha) means ‘home’.

Ever since the time Uma was born in the lap of the grand mountain ranges of the Himalayas, it became a preferred destination for sages and hermits seeking to establish their hermitages and spend their lives in tranquility, serenity, solitude and peace, doing meditation and penances, and initiating disciples into the eclectic disciplines of spiritualism and metaphysics. It is a remarkable thing to note that even today this tradition continues, though of course the present corrupt age of Kaliyug has had its negative effect on this noble and holy tradition.

When a divine and blessed soul lives at a place, it is transformed miraculously from being a god-forsaken abhorable place to an oasis of blessedness, happiness, peace and well-being. We shall read later on in Ram Charit Manas that when Lord Ram came to live in Chitrakoot, an otherwise densely forested area pregnant with wild animals and far away from any civilised habited part of any kingdom, the place metamorphosed into a virtual heaven-on-earth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 137—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 139.

Once again we find that when Lord Ram went to live on Mt. Prabarshan near Rishyamook mountain range, the hill became heavenly with its magnificent beauty and outworldly charm—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 12—to Doha no. 17.]

[Note—Refer note appended to verse nos. 7-8 herein above.

Life was full of joy and happiness in the realm of Himwaan, the king of the Himalayas, ever since Uma was born there. Her birth proved very auspicious for the whole kingdom of the Himalayas.]

When Girijaa (the daughter of 'Giri', a word that stands for a personified form of the mountains where she was born) made her advent in the household of the king of the mountains, his home as well as the rest of his realm became as cheerful and enlivened with happiness as when a devotee of Lord Ram gets access to Bhakti (devotion) for the Lord<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Indeed it is expected that every day there would be renewed auspiciousness, cheerfulness and delight in the household where someone whose glories and virtues are sung regularly by the creator Brahma and others is born. [This 'someone' is Uma, the Mother Goddess who is the divine consort of Lord Shiva, the "Mahadeva" or the 'Great God' of creation.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, everyone was cheerful and contented ever since Uma took birth in the mountains. Just like a devotee feels fulfilled and absolutely contented when his desire for having Bhakti (devotion) for the Lord God bears fruit, the entire realm of the mountains effused an aura of vibrancy, abundance, liveliness and cheerfulness after the birth of Uma there. A devotee of Lord Ram does not want any other thing in this world except devotion for the Lord and a chance to serve the Lord. If this desire of his is fulfilled, he regards himself as the happiest person in existence. The same feeling of contentedness, happiness, joy and delight permeated in the kingdom of the mountains when Uma was born there.

Refer also to Tulsidas' book "Parvati Mangal", verse nos. 7-8 also describe the prosperity in the household of Himwaan when Parvati (the daughter of the mountains) was born.

<sup>2</sup>Later on in the story of Ram Charit Manas we shall read that when Lord Ram was born in the household of Dasrath, the king of Ayodhya, a similar environment of auspiciousness and happiness prevailed, and the king felt that he is most fortunate that the Lord of the world has come to his home as a child—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 193.]

नारद समाचार सब पाए । कौतुकहीं गिरि गेह सिधाए ॥ ५ ॥

nārada samācāra saba pā'ē. kautukahīm giri gēha sidhā'ē. 5.

When the celestial sage Narad (pronounced as “Naarad”) heard of this whole episode, he was amazed and very astonished. So, he set off for the household of the king of mountains (to learn the truth and see things for himself). (5)

[Note—Narad was astonished and amazed at this development, and he wished to examine it closely. So he decided to go and see everything first hand.

Why was Narad so amazed and astonished? The home where Sati took birth as Uma was the household of ‘Himgiri’, the king or the deity of the snow-covered mountains (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 65). Now, “Him” means snow, and “Giri” means mountain. The lofty peaks of the Himalayan mountain ranges are covered round the year with snow. Everyone knows that there are no forests in the higher reaches of the Himalayas, but we read in Doha no. 65 that ever since Uma took birth in the lap of the mountain ranges, the entire place was covered with lush green trees laden with fruits, flowers and leaves. Then in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 65 we read that sages and hermits established their hermitages there.

Another stunning development was that those animals who were inherently inimical towards each other became friendly and lived together, sharing their forested habitat and its assets—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow Doha no. 65.

All these developments were most unusual and stunning. So Narad wondered at the cause of all these miraculous developments, and how it all came about.

Another point that can be deduced is that the time when Narad came to pay a visit at Himgiri’s house was much later after Uma’s birth. We have read that “ever since Uma took birth in the Himalayas, there was all-round happiness, prosperity and auspiciousness; even sages and hermits came from other places to establish their hermitages there; there were ever-green trees laden with succulent fruits, colourful flowers and vibrant leaves; the rivers flowed with clean sparkling water; all animals were happy and friendly”. All these developments took some time to unfold; they can’t happen overnight.

Then we shall read below that when Narad came to pay a visit, Himwaan, the father of Uma, called her and asked Narad to prophesise her fate and destiny. Narad foretold that she would be married to an ascetic, though he did not know even himself who that ‘ascetic’ would be. However, Uma got an inspiration that she should do Tapa to attain the hand of Lord Shiva. Then we learn that Parvati or Uma actually did Tapa. This means she had reached an age when it was possible to do Tapa; she wasn’t an infant, or a toddler or a child still too young for Tapa.

Hence, it is reasonable to assume that Narad had heard of the miracles unfolding in the Himalayan region much after the day when Uma was born. Perhaps he was wondering in the universe as was his wont when somewhere he had heard of the mystical things happening in the mountains. So he decided to come and see things. By reading verse nos. 9-10 of Parvati Mangal, a book dedicated to the marriage of Shiva and Parvati written by Goswami Tulsidas, it becomes clear that the time when Narad arrived at the house of Himgiri was when Parvati or Uma was grown up and her parents were worried about finding a suitable groom for her.]

When sage Narad arrived, ‘Sailraaj’, the king of the mountains, welcomed him with great respect and honour. The king duly washed the feet of the guest and gave him a comfortable mat to sit<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Then he, along with his wife, bowed his head at the feet of the sage, and sprinkled the water that was used to wash the sage’s feet throughout his house to sanctify it and invoke auspiciousness. [This sprinkling of water everywhere in the house is a symbolic gesture that implies that every nook and corner of the house is sanctified by the holiness associated with great sages. It is a symbolic gesture that means that the sage has walked in the house to purify its environment.] (7)

The king of the mountains praised his extremely good luck that he has had the privilege of welcoming and serving a great sage<sup>2</sup> of the stature of Narad. Then, as is the custom, he called his daughter (Uma) and made her prostrate before the feet of the sage. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When sage Vishwamitra visited the court of king Dasrath of Ayodhya, the same process is observed there as well—the king first bowed and welcomed the sage, gave him a nice seat, summoned his four sons, Lord Ram and his three brothers, and made them bow before the feet of the great sage. The king praised his good luck that a sage of the exalted stature of Vishwamitra has come to pay a visit to his household even without an invitation, something to be exceedingly glad about. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 207.

The king praised his good luck because exalted saints and sages are met only when a person is rewarded for some good deeds done by him, and not otherwise: refer—Ram Charit Manas, (i) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 7; and (ii) Uttar Kand, the 1st half of Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 45.

When sage Vasistha went to meet Lord Ram, the latter had praised his own good luck because it is a privilege to have a person of high stature as an honourable guest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 9.

<sup>2</sup>Refer specifically to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 207 where king Dasrath has praised his luck in exactly the same way when sage Vishwamitra arrived in his court.]

The king said to sage Narad—‘Oh Lord! You are ‘Trikaalagya’, i.e. you are able to see (know) everything of the past, the present and the future (the three dimensions of time). Hence, everything is known to you, and you have access to all the divisions or spheres of the world as well as the phases of time.

Oh the greatest and the most exalted of all sages (“Munibar”)! Please contemplate in your heart and tell me truthfully the virtues and the shortcomings of my daughter. [That is, please tell me what fate holds for her; what will be good for her future, and what precautions I should take.] (Doha no. 66)

[Note—In Tulsidas’ “Parvati Mangal”, verse no. 9 it is said that Parvati’s parents were worried about finding a suitable groom for her, and in verse nos. 13-14 it is said that Maina, the wife of Himwaan and the mother of Parvati, fell at the feet of Narad and requested him to tell her about a suitable groom for Parvati.

There is another episode narrated in Ram Charit Manas where Narad had been asked to outline the goodness and drawbacks in a girl when he visited her parent’s palace—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 130.]

kaha muni bihasi gūṛha mṛdu bānī. sutā tumhāri sakala guna khānī. 1.
sundara sahaja susīla sayānī. nāma umā ambikā bhavānī. 2.

The sage smiled and said pleasant words that had a significant meaning and were cloaked in mystery<sup>1</sup>.

He said—‘Your daughter is a mine of all good virtues. (1)

She is pretty, simple, courteous, wise and dignified. Her name is ‘Uma’, and she is the ‘Mother of the world’ (“Ambikaa”) known as Bhavaani<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was significant and mysterious in Narad’s words will be revealed shortly.

Narad was “Trikaalagya”, i.e. he knew well that Uma was Lord Shiva’s consort Sati in her previous life, and that she was destined to marry Lord Shiva in her present life too. But he restrained from telling everything in detail and divulging the truth. Why? Because Uma’s previous form as Sati had many negative characters as we have already read about in the previous verses. She had burnt herself in anger, she had lied to her husband, and she had disobeyed him and shown disrespect even to an incarnation of the Supreme Being in the form of Lord Ram. If Narad had divulged these facts, Uma’s parents would have gone in severe depression and may be they would have begun loathing her and treating her with contempt. This would be an ugly situation which Narad wished to avoid.

So, whatever he said was cloaked in mystery and had a double-meaning. He did not wish to divulge that Shiva would be her husband according to destiny because of one very obvious reason—Parvati’s father was the king of the mountains, and Shiva was a renunciate ascetic-god living in Mt. Kailash which also fell within his kingdom or realm. A king worth his name would never like his daughter, the princess of the kingdom, to marry such a person!

Himwaan was also well aware of the unconventional life-style of Shiva, and the fact that Shiva lived like a hermit, was an ascetic par-excellence, had ghosts and phantoms as his attendants as he is the God of death, and he was attired in the most unusual way with serpents wrapped around his body that is smeared in ash, remained half-naked, and was generally detached from the affairs and attractions of the world. Say, which parent would like to marry his or her daughter with such a groom, especially if this groom is a ‘subject’ of the kingdom of the princess’ father?

<sup>2</sup>Though Narad did not directly tell Uma’s father that she is destined to marry Shiva, but he has given ample hints. “Bhavaani” and “Ambikaa” point in this direction. ‘Bhava’ is one of the many names of Lord Shiva, and therefore ‘Bhavaani’ clearly hints that Uma would be Shiva’s wife. Again, since Shiva is the Father of the world, his consort would obviously be the ‘Mother of the world’, the ‘Ambikaa’.]

She would be worthy of praise, honour and worship in the whole world. Nothing would be inaccessible or un-obtainable for someone who worships her and offers his or her obeisance to her. (5)

By remembering her name and invoking it, women-folk of the world would be successful in following the path of being loyal and submitted to their husbands (known as “Pati-brat Dharma”)<sup>1</sup>, a path that is as difficult and testing as walking on the sharp edge of a sword<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This path is known as “Pati-brat Dharma”. It is a righteous and noble path that all married women are expected to follow. It has been explained to Sita, the divine consort of Lord Ram, by Anusuiya, the chaste wife of sage Atri during Lord Ram’s forest wonderings. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 5 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-19.

<sup>2</sup>This path is compared to the edge of a sword as it is very difficult to observe its strict principles. But if a woman succeeds in doing so, she acquires immense religious merit that virtually empowers her with the same strength as possessed by goddesses in heaven.]

Oh Sail<sup>1</sup> (the king of the mountains)! Your daughter has all the good virtues one can expect to have. However, there are some two-or-four negative traits: now listen to them. (7)

[Now, I (Narad) shall tell you the characters of her future husband—] Someone who has no remarkable attributes (“Agun”; is neutral; is free either being judged as having any good quality or possessing any bad one), who has no ego and a sense of self-pride (“Amaan”—is not bothered if he is honoured or insulted because he is highly self-restrained, dispassionate, self-realised and enlightened), who has no father or mother (because he is ‘unborn’ and ‘eternal’), who is uninterested in anything or any affair of the gross visible world of material sense objects, is detached and dispassionate towards everyone and everything (“Udaaseen”), and is free from all confusions and doubts (“Sansaya Chhina”)---(8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “Sail” (pronounced as “saila”) literally means a ‘mountain’. Parvati’s father was known by this name as he was the supreme ‘king of the mountains’ just like we have an emperor. His name became synonymous with the mountains. In the Indian context, the Himalyan Mountain in the north is the loftiest and the longest of all the mountains and hill ranges. So, the king who ruled over this mountain was deemed to be the king of all the mountains and hills of the country.

In literary lore, the different aspects of Nature have been personified and assigned a name that identified the latter with the former.]

---He who is a stern ascetic and hard to deal with or please (“Jogi; Jatil”), whose mind and heart have no desires and passions (“Akaam Mana”), who remains naked (“Nagan”—i.e. he has nothing to hide, he wears the sky as his garment like a true ascetic and hermit), whose attire is unconventional and unholy from the perspective of the world (“Amangal Vesha”—because he wears snakes and skulls on his body, keeps it smeared with ash, has a tiger skin wrapped around the hips, and so on)---

Well unfortunately, this is the sort of husband she is destined to get. It is written in the lines marked on her palms.’ (Doha no. 67)

[Note—We have read in verse no. 1 that preceded this Doha no. 67 that Narad’s words were ‘significant and cloaked in mystery’. So, Narad gave enough hints to Parvati’s father Himwaan who her future husband would be, but at the same time he kept the name secret.

This is the reason for it: Shiva’s characters seemed so odd and unconventional on their face that any father would wince at the thought of marrying his daughter with such a weird man as the one whose characters Narad described in the above verses. From the worldly perspective all these traits are negative, but from the view point of metaphysics and spiritualism these same characters are much sought after by aspirants who seek to attain higher levels of existence of consciousness. Great mystics and sages laud such characters as they are the noble and auspicious virtues of the Supreme Being known as Brahm.

Narad has already told Himwaan that his daughter would give him immense fame and honour—refer: Chaupai line no. 4 herein above. Indeed she will—just like Sita gave honour and fame to her father Janak when she was married to Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chanda line nos. 6-7 that precedes Doha no. 326; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 340; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 342.

But Uma’s parents did not get this hint as would be clear in the next verse no. 1 that says that when the parents heard Narad’s words, they felt very sad and remorseful.

In “Parvati Mangal” verse no. 17 we read that Narad has clearly told Parvati’s parents that she is destined to get a mad and weird husband. Further on we read in Parvati Mangal that when Lord Shiva had disguised himself as a Brahmin and had gone to test the sincerity of Parvati and her firm determination of marrying Shiva inspite of all the advice to the contrary, he (Shiva in disguise) has outlined the characters of her future husband in almost the same language as Narad has done here. Refer: Parvati Mangal, verse nos. 49-54.]

चौ०. सुनि मुनि गिरा सत्य जियँ जानी । दुख दंपतिहि उमा हरषानी ॥ १ ॥

नारदहूँ यह भेदु न जाना । दसा एक समुझब बिलगाना ॥ २ ॥

sunī muni girā satya jiyam̐ jānī. dukha dampatihi umā haraṣānī. 1. nāradahūm̐ yaha bhēdu na jānā. dasā ēka samujhaba bilagānā. 2.

Hearing the words of the sage and knowing fully well in their hearts that what he has said is the truth (because Narad was a “Trikaalagya” sage who knew everything of the past, the present and the future, and therefore whatever he says cannot be wrong—refer: Doha no. 66), the couple (the parents of Uma) were sorrowful, but Uma felt elated and pleased in her heart<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Even the all-knowing and wise Narad wasn’t aware of this difference in attitude with which his prophesy was received by them. It was because externally all of them (Uma and her parents) showed no signs of emotions and appeared to be stoically calm (as if nothing special was said, though internally they received the news and interpreted its meaning differently)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: “Parvati Mangal”, verse nos. 17-18 which also say the same thing.

<sup>2</sup>Narad did not know that the things he had told Uma’s parents about their daughter in Doha no. 67 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 were received as bad news by them, but it made Uma happy instead. Outwardly they maintained their composure, but internally they received the same news with different attitudes. Whereas Uma’s parents were shaken by it—because it meant that Uma’s husband would be someone who was very unsuitable for a married way of life of a householder, that her future husband would be virtually mad and weird, which would in turn mean that Uma would have to live unhappily for the rest of her life.

On the other hand, Uma was very happy because her soul was the same that had previously dwelt in the body of Sati, and in that body she had prayed to Lord Hari that she may be so blessed that in whatever body she is reborn she can have unflinching devotion for Lord Shiva and be able to serve him (refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65). Since the soul or the pure conscious Atma is the ‘true identity’ of any individual, the essential ‘self’ of Sati and Uma were the same, and it was only her gross physical body that has changed from one known as Sati to one known as Uma. Hence, as soon as her Atma heard Narad say that her future husband would possess such and such characteristics that were similar to those of Lord Shiva, Uma immediately realised in her internal self that her prayers seem to have been answered, that she is destined to be reunited with the beloved Lord of her dreams and of her previous life, i.e. Lord Shiva.

This secret was known only to her and not to her parents. That is why they were dismayed at Narad’s prophesying, but Uma was happy. She was happy that she would be reunited with her beloved Lord Shiva in this birth too, but her parents were worried that her stars were so bad that she is destined to have a weird husband.

Refer verse no. 3 herein below which describes how externally the reactions of everyone who heard the words of Narad were the same though internally they interpreted them differently as stated in verse no. 2 above.]

सकल सखीं गिरिजा गिरि मैना । पुलक सरीर भरे जल नैना ॥ ३ ॥

sakala sakhīm girijā giri mainā. pulaka sarīra bharē jala nainā. 3.

All those who were present on the occasion, viz. the female friends of Girija (Uma, the ‘daughter of Giri’), Giri (the king of hills or mountains), and Maina (his wife; the mother of Uma), were thrilled in their bodies, and tears welled-up in their eyes. (3)

[Note—We have read in the previous verse no. 2 that Narad did not understand the reason or the secret of why Uma had felt happy and her parents had become remorseful internally at his words because externally they behaved in the same way. What was their external reaction to Narad’s prophesies is described in this present verse no. 3.

Uma (Girija), her friends, her father Giri and her mother Maina—they were “thrilled in their bodies” and “their eyes were filled with tears”.

Uma was thrilled and had tears in her eyes because she was exceedingly happy and exhilarated that her prayers made in her previous life as Sati that she be reunited with Lord Shiva in her next birth have been answered.

Her parents and friends were thrilled at the words of Narad that listed her exemplary virtues as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 1-6 and 1st half of Chaupai line no. 7 that preceded Doha no. 67. But when they heard the bad news as mentioned in Doha no. 67 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 regarding Uma’s husband, they were very dismayed and worried. This is the reason why they had tears in their eyes. Refer also to Chaupai line no. 8 herein below.]

होइ न मृषा देवरिषि भाषा । उमा सो बचनु हृदयँ धरि राखा ॥ ४ ॥
उपजेउ सिव पद कमल सनेहू । मिलन कठिन मन भा संदेहू ॥ ५ ॥

hō’i na mṛṣā dēvariṣi bhāṣā. umā sō bacanu hṛdayam̐ dhari rākhā. 4.
upajē’u siva pada kamala sanēhū. milana kaṭhina mana bhā sandēhū. 5.

‘The great sage’s words can’t go in vain’—Uma was convinced of this and had firmly established his words (regarding her future husband) in her heart. (4)

This inspired a natural affection for Lord Shiva and devotion for his lotus feet in her heart. But since it was very difficult to attain the Lord, she had her doubts. (5)

[Note—Once again we see that Uma has not discarded her natural habit to have ‘doubts’, even in the words of great sages. In her previous life as Sati it was the character that led her to her ruin—(i) she knew that Lord Shiva’s words cannot be false but still she had doubted them regarding the divinity of Lord Ram (refer: Doha no. 51 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8), and (ii) she had doubted the wisdom of Shiva’s advice when the Lord had tried to persuade her not to go to her father’s place without an invitation, especially when he harbours ill-will against her husband (refer: Doha no. 61—to Doha no. 62).

But there is a perceptible difference here. In her previous birth as Sati, when she had doubts she had insisted on doing what pleased her. For instance, she went ahead to test the authenticity of Lord Ram inspite of her husband Lord Shiva telling him that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human, and later on she had gone to her father's home to attend the fire sacrifice inspite of Lord Shiva advising her that it would give her sorrow.

This was not so in her present birth as Uma though she still had the habit of having 'doubts'. When she learnt that her husband would be someone with the unique characters that matched that of Lord Shiva, she did feel that it is a far-fetched idea because it is 'very difficult to attain Lord Shiva' but 'she believed in Narad's words'. She did not doubt his words par-se, but only did not understand how it would materialise—that was her only doubt. But since she firmly believed in Narad's words—that what he said can't be in vain, she went out to make all efforts to put it into practice: she did severe Tapa, and she never got distracted from her chosen path. This will be clear as we read on further.

Uma had started treating Narad as her 'Guru' or moral preceptor and guide. It was he who had shown her the way ahead for her future, albeit in a veiled term. It was on his words that she relied firmly and decided to do severe Tapa to attain Lord Shiva (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 73, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha). Since it is wise to have a firm faith in the words of one's guru, and a great sage of the exalted stature of Narad is no less than a guru, Uma succeeded in her mission. She has clearly affirmed her faith in Narad and his words in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 80.

Realising that the time was not proper to openly express her affection and devotion for Lord Shiva that had naturally sprouted in her heart after she had heard the words of Narad, Uma concealed her emotions within herself, and went to sit on the lap of one of her dear friends<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sitting on the lap of her friend is just a figure of speech to indicate that Uma was very young in age at the time, and this 'friend' perhaps was her maid who was much elder to her and so close to her that she treated the latter as one of her dearest friends. So she went and shyly sat down on her friend's lap, for this 'friend' also happened to be her maid and a constant companion with whom Uma shared all her private thoughts and emotions.]

'The celestial sage's words can't be false'—thought the couple (i.e. Uma's parents) and her friends. (7)

So, keeping patience in his heart and gathering courage, the king of the mountains (“Gri-raau”; “Giri” = mountain; “Raau” = king) asked the sage (Narad), ‘Oh Lord! Please advice me what solution can be devised (to help us overcome the predicament about Uma’s future in relation to the sort of husband you have described for her<sup>1</sup>)’. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The father of Uma was naturally worried about her future because of the sort of weird husband Narad said she was destined to get—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 67 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8. Therefore he requested the sage to tell him if any way can be found to bypass or overcome this negativity.

This verse also explains whey he and his wife had tears in their eyes according to verse no. 3 herein above.]

दो०. कह मुनीस हिमवंत सुनु जो बिधि लिखा लिलार ।

dōhā.

kaha munīsa himavanta sunu jō bidhi likhā līlāra.
dēva danuja nara nāga muni kō'u na mēṭanihāra. 68.

The sage replied—‘Listen Himwant (the king of the snow-covered mountains)! Whatever the ‘Bidhi’<sup>1</sup> (the creator who determines the destiny of the entire creation) has written in a person’s destiny and decided to be his or her fate cannot be changed or erased by anyone, be it a god, a demon, a human being, a Naga (serpents who have mystical powers) or even a sage (no matter how powerful and resourceful he may be)<sup>2*</sup>. (Doha no. 68)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Bidhi is the creator Brahma. Out of the three Trinity Gods, he is the one who writes or determines a creature’s fate. The other two gods, viz. Vishnu and Shiva, are responsible for sustenance and conclusion of the creation, but not tamper with destiny determined by Brahma. There is a clear demarcation of duties of the three gods; no one of them interferes with the duty and responsibility of the other.

Hence, if it is written in the fate of Uma that her husband would be a person like the one described by Narad, then it cannot be changed. However, there may be many candidates who may all have the characteristics outlined by Narad, but by effort a solution can be devised in the sense that the best amongst them can be found for Uma. And Narad advised this solution below.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 97 where Parvati has affirmed the same thing while pacifying her mother Maina who was excessively agitated to see the physical unconventional form of Lord Shiva when the latter came to marry Parvati.

*Narad had said that whatever the creator of one’s destiny, the Creator known as Vidhi or Brahma, has written, no god, demon, human, serpent or sage can alter. But he has cleverly skipped the names of ‘Lord Shiva and Lord Vishnu’ from this blanket immunity. The reason is that these two are senior Gods, and not ordinary junior rung gods. They are part of the Trinity of Gods, the third God being Brahma himself. These three gods of the Trinity, Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder, are merely three manifestations of the same universal Supreme Being known as “Brahm” who has metamorphosed into three distinct forms to carry out three distinct functions of creation—viz. origin, sustenance, and conclusion.

It’s like the same Sun seen at three times of the day—at sunrise, at mid-day, and at sunset. Does the different colours of the sky and the way the Sun is seen at these three main points during its journey across the sky in anyway affect the basic identity of the Sun or its character? Similarly, the three gods of the Trinity have equal powers, but they refrain from interfering into the jurisdiction of the other to maintain order and system in this creation. Otherwise, there would be chaos.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precedes Doha no. 70 herein below where this observation is endorsed, because Narad says that “Lord Shiva is able to erase the destiny if he is pleased by penances”.]

Nevertheless, I shall advice you of one solution. If the Lord God wants, it may help you and serve your purpose. (1)

The sort of groom I have described to you shall be found for Uma. (2)

In my opinion, whatever so-called faults or shortcomings that are destined to be in the groom of Uma are all present in Lord Shiva (one of the great three gods of the Trinity). (3)

Therefore, if she is married to Lord Shiva then it will be best for her. If this happens then all the demerits (faults or shortcomings) in the would-be husband of Uma would turn out as merits. No one in the world would ever scorn at Uma’s fate of having a husband with this odd characters if that husband is Lord Shiva because the world had great respect for the Lord. [It is because all the so-called negativities of characters that I have listed herein above are deemed to be praise-worthy and positive characters when they are applied to Lord Shiva.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Saying this, Narad then goes on to explain with examples in verse nos. 5-8 that follow herein below why the some set of characters that are surely negative in the conventional view of thinking are viewed differently by the world as being positive when they are present in powerful entities in this creation.

A close examination of all the characteristics listed by Narad in Doha no. 67 and its Chaupai preceding line no. 8 show that they are unique qualities of Lord Shiva who is lauded as being the wisest, the most enlightened, the most exalted, a highly self-realised and the senior-most amongst the entire pantheon of gods. Shiva is honoured by the title of 'Maha-Deva' which means a 'Great God', an epithet that no other god is honoured with, not even the creator Brahma or the sustainer Vishnu.

Remaining detached from the material world and its temptations, being aloof from its charms and sensual pleasures, keeping the mind focused on meditation and contemplation instead of allowing it to be indulgent in the gross world and its affairs, turning oneself away from enticing sights and pleasures and instead turning inwards to face the Atma which is the pure conscious 'self', observing exemplary self-restraint over the sense organs of perception and action that helps the person to maintain internal tranquility, stability, calm and poise, and such like characters that are unique to Lord Shiva are not negative traits at all, but highly praised positive ones according to the scriptures such as the Upanishads that deal with the eclectic philosophy of metaphysics and spiritualism.

So, the fear of Uma's husband being 'weird and mad and unsuitable to be her partner if he has these characters' is absolutely unfounded, imaginary and relative by nature because the same characters are present in Lord Shiva, and no one in this creation says that Shiva is unholy or mad. On the contrary, if these characters are present in any other ordinary living being then of course he would be laughed at and no one would dare to marry his daughter with such a mad person.

Therefore, since it is not possible to change Uma's destiny with respect to the characters her husband would have, the best way out is to select someone who has these traits, but at the same time is honoured by the world for possessing the same set of character that have instilled fear and worry in the heart of the parents of Uma. These so-called negative traits in Shiva are praised by the world instead of being scoffed or riled at.]

[In these 4 verses, nos. 5-8, Narad gives the reason why the so-called negative traits are not regarded as being 'negative' when applied to Lord Shiva.]

Though Lord Hari (Vishnu) sleeps on the back of a poisonous snake (known as 'Seshnath' while it floats on the surface of the celestial ocean known as 'Kshirsagar'), no wise one finds fault with it and regards this as a condemnable thing to do by any account. [Instead of finding fault with Lord Vishnu for selecting this weird way of sleeping, the world pays its greatest of respects to him and deems him to a manifestation of the Supreme Being known as Brahm.]]<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The Sun and the Fire are known to absorb all sorts of “rasa” (moisture; vapour) from all sorts of things in this world, but they are not decried by anyone in this world for doing so. [On the contrary, people praise the Sun-God and the Fire-God and say that they purify the world by absorbing or burning all its impurities.]]<sup>2</sup> (6)

All sorts of things—some that are acceptable and not so bad, while others that are utterly reprehensible and polluting—float in the water of a river, but no one says that the water of the river Ganges has been made unclean or unholy, no one says that the sanctity of Ganges has been eroded by the debris floating in it.<sup>3</sup> (7)

Therefore we conclude that those who are powerful and authoritative are not accused of any wrong-doing or possessing any negative character just like the examples of the Sun, the Fire and the river Ganges.<sup>4</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>That is, though it is unconventional, weird and sheer madness to sleep on the coiled body of a poisonous sea-serpent as it floats on the surface of water, with its thousand hoods hissing and spouting hot gas on the head of Vishnu as he reclines on its body, no sage, seer or scripture has ever condemned this act of Vishnu and derided him to choose this weird way of sleeping.

<sup>2</sup>The heat of the sun dries water in all sorts of water-bodies—be it an ocean, a river, a stinking drain, a swamp from where poisonous fume emanates, or a dirty pond. This ‘dried water’ is in the form of vapour that ultimately forms the cloud, and when this cloud gives the same water extracted from say a filthy stinking drain or swamp no one criticises it. Rather, all people pray and offer their respects to the Sun-God and proclaim that no life is possible without the Sun. The world forgets that the Sun inhales toxic fumes emanating from swamps, drains and marshes.

Similarly, the fire dries up everything put near it—it would as easily dry a wet rug that is clean as one that stinks. When any wet thing is put in the fire, the latter extracts the moisture from it and makes it stiff and dry. No one accuses the fire of accepting rubbish and despicable things as its food; no one says that the fire has become corrupted by its association with dirty things. Rather, the world universally believes that the fire is incorruptible and purifies the world by burning its impurities.

<sup>3</sup>All sorts of things float on the surface of the water of river Ganges: Some are acceptable such as flowers and other things that do not cause any pollution in the water, and were duly offered to gods and deities before being put in the river. Other things are horrible—such as filth and effluent from cities and factories situated all along the river’s course, the carcasses that float in the water, the dirt and garbage that the river collects from its banks all along its journey from the Himalayas to the Bay of Bengal. In spite of knowing this, the world regards Ganges as a holy river; the world never winces from taking a purifying dip in its water. That is, the Ganges is universally regarded as a holy river in spite of all its shortcomings.

<sup>4</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Shiva Puran, 2/3/8/20.

The examples that Narad has cited have a direct relation with Lord Shiva. Now, let’s see how:--

(i) Vishnu sleeps on the coiled body of a poisonous serpent, and Lord Shiva has serpents coiled around his body.

(ii) The sun and the fire burn everything and it is not wise to play fools with them, so is with Shiva—his ‘third eye’ located on the forehead spews fire and had actually burnt Kamdeo when the latter tried to act smart with the Lord (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87).

Shiva is believed to live in cremation ground surrounded by cremation fires.

(iii) Shiva has given river Ganges a respectful place in the thick lock of hairs on his head.

So, even as no one finds faults with Vishnu, Sun, Fire and Ganges, no one finds fault with Shiva who represents all these four entities at once. Therefore, if Uma marries Shiva, there shall be no problem with her also in any way whatsoever.]

दो०. जौं अस हिसिषा करहिं नर जड़ बिबेक अभिमान ।

परहिं कलप भरि नरक महुँ जीव कि ईस समान ॥ ६९ ॥

dōhā.

jauṁ asa hisiṣā karahim̐ nara jaṛa bibēka abhimāna.

parahim̐ kalapa bhari naraka mahum̐ jīva ki īsa samāna. 69.

If a person is foolish enough that he starts comparing his gross mortal existence in this world with the exalted nature of God due to his misplaced sense of wisdom driven by ignorance and pride, then surely such stupid person falls in the great hell for a Kalpa (the duration of one life-time of the universe).

Say, can a ‘Jiva’ (a living being with a gross body which dies and takes birth in an endless cycle and remains engrossed in the world that itself is gross and perishable) ever be like the ‘Ish’ or the Lord God (who has characters and virtues just the opposite of a Jiva). [The answer is ‘No’.]<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 69)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “Jiva” is a living being who takes a birth, has a gross body, remains involved in the affairs of the gross world of material objects, dies and is re-born, is subjected to the laws of ‘Karma’ (which states that he is rewarded or punished according to the deeds that a Jiva does in his life), and so on and so forth. A Jiva has no control over his fate. He has physical limitations due to his gross physical body.

On the other hand, “Ish” (meaning Lord God) has none of these limitations. The Lord God neither takes a birth nor dies as he is eternal; he has no physical gross body; he is not bound to either the deeds or the world; he has no physical limitations as he is omnipresent, all-pervading, as well as sublime and subtle by nature instead of being gross and mundane.

The point to note here is that Vishnu and Shiva are manifestations of the supreme Brahm, the Lord of creation. The Sun is visible manifestation of the supreme powers of Brahm and also of the fire element which is one of the five basic elements of creation. The other element is water whose manifested form is river Ganges. None of these highly placed entities are corruptible by the lower entities of the world.

The entities listed by Narad (i.e. Vishnu, Sun, Fire and river Ganges) are not regarded as faulty though they possess characters that are ordinarily considered as negative because they are above the level of lowly existence of the world that is gross and mundane. Their existence is at a level that is subtle, sublime and transcendental.]

surasari milēm̐ sō pāvana jaisēm̐. īsa anīsahi antaru taisēm̐. 2.

[Narad gives more reasoning why even apparently negative traits are deemed to be positive when they are applied to Lord Shiva.]

Even if wine is mixed with the otherwise holy waters of river Ganges, saints and holy people will not drink it. [For saints and holy people, wine is a prohibited liquid. Merely adding the holy water of river Ganges won't change wine's basic character; it will still remain a prohibited drink.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

But the same wine becomes acceptable when it is added (or poured) into the main body of the river Ganges. [No matter how many bottles of wine are poured in the river Ganges, no one says that the river has become defiled and its water has lost its sanctity as being a purifying liquid. People continue to take bath in it and sip the water of Ganges.]<sup>2</sup>

This is the difference between 'Isha' (pronounced as "Eesha"; the Lord God) and a 'non-Isha' (the Jiva, the living being)<sup>3*</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The main part of the liquid is 'wine', and the water of Ganges is only an addition to it to make wine dilute. No saint or holy men would drink wine in the mistaken belief that since the holy water of river Ganges has been added to it, wine has become drinkable for them. Since 'wine' is an intoxicating liquid that is prohibited for holy people, mere addition of water of the Ganges would not change the former's basic character as being a prohibited drink.

<sup>2</sup>But suppose we pour bottles full of wine in river Ganges; will it mean that the water of Ganges becomes undrinkable? No, it is not so. The river Ganges and its water would continue to be respected and regarded as holy irrespective of addition of how much wine is poured into the water of the river. Ganges won't lose its holy and sanctified character.

This can be easily explained with the help of an example. Suppose water is added to pure milk, would this change the basic nature, nomenclature, character or virtue of the white liquid known as 'milk'? Milk would still be known as 'milk' no matter how much quantity of water is added to it.

On the other hand, suppose a huge canister full of pure milk is poured into a river, will anyone in his senses call the water of the river as 'milk'? No, the answer is that no matter how much milk is added to a river, the latter would always be said to contain 'water' and 'not milk'.

<sup>3</sup>'Isha' is the supreme God and Lord of everything that exists. This entire universe with all its diversity has its origin in him. He lives inside and outside this creation. He has all the exemplary good virtues in creation. He is eternal, immortal, uncorrupt, without attributes, subtle, sublime, pure Consciousness; he remains even, uniform and steady in the midst of the ever-changing nature of universe; he is all-pervading and all-encompassing; he is omniscient and omnipresent. In other words, 'Isha' is beyond measurement by any yardstick by which we measure the rest of the entities of creation; he is beyond comprehension and grasp of the limited abilities of the mind and intellect just like the sky that cannot be measured.

The 'non-Isha' or the Jiva, the living being, on the other hand, cannot become equivalent to 'Isha' though it is true that the Jiva is a 'fraction of Isha'. A 'fraction' obviously cannot be the 'whole'!

The metaphysical reason behind saying that Jiva is a fraction of Isha is that the true identity of their 'self' is the pure conscious Atma, the essential element known as the 'Soul'. This Atma is nothing but pure Consciousness. In the case of 'Isha', this Consciousness exists in its purest form and exalted state of transcendental existence. It has no physical limitations or barriers; it is subtle and sublime instead of being gross and mundane; it is eternal and imperishable instead of being mortal and subject to death and birth. Isha has no gross physical body as opposed to a Jiva that lives in a gross physical body.

So, since the 'Consciousness' is the true and factual identity of the 'self' in both the cases of an Isha and a non-Isha or Jiva, they appear to be the same in theory. But the similarity ends there—because Isha has a greater density of wholesome pure Consciousness as opposed to a Jiva or non-Isha which has only a 'fraction' of this Consciousness. So the distinction is crystal clear.

It is like the case of 'water in a glass of milk' and 'milk in the water of a river'. In the former case, the liquid will still be called 'milk', whereas in the latter case no one calls the 'water of a river' as being milk.

In this example, the milk is like the Jiva, and the water is like the Consciousness. The Jiva gets its identity and life because of the Consciousness present in it just like the milk getting its identity as a liquid which is life-sustaining because of its basic water content. Without water milk would be a solid chunk just like a Jiva whose body would be life-less without the presence of Consciousness in it. But water in milk is invisible; one sees only the white colour of the milk. Similarly, one sees the gross body of a Jiva while the Consciousness remains hidden from view. The situation is reversed in the case of Isha. Here, the Consciousness dominates, and all the grosser aspects of creation lay hidden just like the case of milk in the water of a flowing river. We recognise the 'water' of the river, and 'not the denser liquid known as milk' that is present in it.

Now, the question is: If 'Isha' is supposed to be pure and holy Consciousness, then why should it have even a trace of negativity in him? The answer is clear: The whole creation is a visible manifestation of the invisible Isha. Isha permeates every pore of this creation, surrounding it from the outside and living within it at the same time. This being the case, all the traits of this creation, whether good and positive, or bad and negative, would be reflected in and tagged to Isha. Being an integral part of this creation, Isha cannot remain immune to the effects of the good or the bad traits of creation. But that is all, for none of these traits actually define the true nature of Isha. The traits are, at the most, sticking to or hanging superficially to the main body of immaculate virtues that define the true character of Isha, and as soon as this creation dissolves, these external add-ons also vanish, and out comes the original immaculate nature of Isha.

*The difference between an Isha and a Jiva, and the relationship between them has been narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Doha no. 14—to Doha no. 16.]

संभु सहज समरथ भगवाना । एहि बिबाहँ सब बिधि कल्याना ॥ ३ ॥

sambhu sahaja samaratha bhagavānā. ēhi bibāham̐ saba bidhi kalyānā. 3.

Lord Shiva, put in simple words, is the all-able Lord God (“Bhagwaan”). Hence, this marriage (between Uma and Shiva) will be auspicious and a provider of well-being in all possible ways*<sup>1</sup>. (3)

[Note—*Refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 70 herein below.

<sup>1</sup>This verse concludes what has been said by Narad earlier in verse no. 4 that preceded Doha no. 69. He clearly indicates in this verse that Himwaan and Maina should stop worrying about who would be a suitable groom for Uma, and also remove their fears about the perceived negative traits of Shiva. Instead, they should not focus their attention as to how their daughter could find the hands of Shiva in marriage.

Narad was all-knowing and wise (refer: Doha no. 66), so he could easily realise the storm blowing in the minds of the parents. So he told them, in the following verse nos. 4-8 and Doha no. 70, how to bring into effect what he has just prophesised.]

दुराराध्य पै अहहिं महेसू । आसुतोष पुनि किँ कलेसू ॥ ४ ॥

जौं तपु करै कुमारि तुम्हारी । भाविउ मेटि सकहिं त्रिपुरारी ॥ ५ ॥ durārādhyā pai ahahim mahēsū. āsutōṣa puni ki'ēm̐ kalēsū. 4.

jauṁ tapu karai kumārī tumhārī. bhāvi'u mēṭi sakahim tripurārī. 5.

Though it is certainly true that it is very difficult to please Lord Mahesh (Shiva), yet it is also true that he is as easily and quickly pleased (“Aashutosh”) if one is determined to do so and takes the necessary trouble to propitiate him (by doing penance and undergoing hardships with a single-minded devotion for the Lord). (4)

Therefore, if your daughter does severe Tapa (penance, austerity and suffering of hardship for a cause) to please Lord Tripurari (Shiva), then be reassured that the all-able Lord can even erase the lines of fate that seem to be detrimental for her future happiness and well-being<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In other words, even if there are any traces of negativity that may be lurking in your daughter's fate that was determined as her destiny by the Creator at the time of her birth, but there is nothing to worry about it. This is because if your daughter manages to please the almighty Lord Tripurari, if he is satisfied by her sincerity, devotion and faith as well as her austerity and penance, then be assured that he is fully cable and competent to remove the darker sides of your daughter's fate, and instead ensure a bright and happy future for her.

So, you must stop worrying and procrastinating, and instead follow my wise advice to prevail upon your daughter to do Tapa to please Lord Shiva.

In Doha no. 68 above, Narad had said that whatever the creator of one's destiny, the Creator known as Vidhi or Brahma, has written, no god, demon, human, serpent or sage can alter. But he has cleverly skipped the names of 'Lord Shiva and Lord Vishnu' from this blanket immunity. The reason is that these two are senior Gods, and not ordinary junior rung gods. They are part of the Trinity of Gods, the third God being Brahma himself. These three gods of the Trinity, Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the concluder, are merely three manifestations of the same universal Supreme Being known as "Brahm" who has metamorphosed into three distinct forms to carry out three distinct functions of creation—viz. origin, sustenance, and conclusion.

It's like the same Sun seen at three times of the day—at sunrise, at mid-day, and at sunset. Does the different colours of the sky and the way the Sun is seen at these three main points during its journey across the sky in anyway affect the basic identity of the Sun or its character? Similarly, the three gods of the Trinity have equal powers, but they refrain from interfering into the jurisdiction of the other to maintain order and system in this creation. Otherwise, there would be chaos.]

jadyapi bara anēka jaga māhīm. ēhi kaham̃ siva taji dūsara nāhīm. 6.

Although there may be many eligible grooms in the world that may fit the description I have made<sup>1</sup>, but for her there is no other suitable groom other than Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 67 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 where Narad outlines the negativities in the character of the future groom of Uma, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 69 where he has explicitly said that if Uma marries Lord Shiva then all the negative traits that destiny has written her future husband will have, and which is the cause of worry for her parents, would automatically turn out to be laudable characters that are praised by the world instead of being criticised.

Then we have read how Narad explains this is possible in Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 68, and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

<sup>2</sup>It is said in Doha no. 66 herein above that Narad is "Trikaalagya" (one who can see the events of the past, the future and of course the present) and "Sarvagya" (one who is all-knowing). This naturally means he knows about the past life of Uma, that she was Sati in that life, and why and how she died to take birth as Uma. He was privy to the secret that Uma's eternal husband is no one else but Lord Shiva, and that at the time of death in her previous life she had prayed to Lord Hari to let her serve the feet of Shiva in her future birth too—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65.

That is why Narad was so certain and positive in his assertion that for Uma there is no other groom except Shiva.]

बर दायक प्रनतारति भंजन । कृपासिंधु सेवक मन रंजन ॥ ७ ॥
इच्छित फल बिनु सिव अवरार्धे । लहिअ न कोटि जोग जप सार्धे ॥ ८ ॥

icchita phala binu siva avarādhēm. lahi'a na kōṭi jōga japa sādheṃ. 8.

[Now, Narad lists the other positive virtues of Lord Shiva in order to reassure the parents of Uma as well as herself. It acted as a motivation for Uma to help set aside all her initial inhibitions and reservations, and declare her allegiance to Shiva.]

He (Lord Shiva) is the one who grants desired boons to seekers; he is the one who eliminates the sorrows of those who seek refuge and succour with him; he is an ocean of mercy, compassion and kindness; he is the one provides happiness and bliss to the Mana (heart and mind) of his followers and devotees; (7)---

---He is the one who gives the desired fruits and fulfils the wishes of his devotees. Verily, without worshipping Lord Shiva and pleasing him, one cannot expect to fulfil one's wishes no matter how hard one tries or whatever means one adopts to achieve one's objective<sup>1</sup>.

[In other words, if one wishes to see success in fulfilment of his or her dreams, then the only way is to please Lord Shiva. If Shiva is pleased, then even those wishes of the worshipper which may be against what is written in his or her destiny can be realised. Even things unimaginable and almost impossible to be realised can be made within one's reach if Lord Shiva so wants.]' (8)

He then reassured her father with these words—‘This (doing of Tapa for Shiva by your daughter Uma, and the subsequent marriage of the two) will pave the way for all-round welfare and auspiciousness. So now, oh Girish (the king of the mountains), set aside all your doubts and inhibitions (and instead become cheerful; stop worrying and procrastinating).’ (Doha no. 70)

Saying thus, the sage (Narad) went on his way to the abode of Brahma (the heavenly abode of the Creator).

Now, listen to what happened next. (1)

When Maina (mother of Uma) found her husband (“Gririraaj”, the king of mountains) alone, she pleaded with him earnestly—‘Oh Lord! I could not understand the meaning of what the sage has said. (2)

Please search and find a suitable home and a groom (i.e. a groom from a reputed family) for our daughter, and then get her married. (3)

Otherwise, let her remain unmarried (because she can't be allowed to get married to a groom not suitable for her). Oh dear husband, I love her very much; she is dear to me like my own life. (4)

If a suitable groom is not found for her (and you marry her to someone who is weird as advised by Narad), then the world will scorn at us, saying sarcastically that the king of the mountains is as dumb and dull by nature as the realm of the heartless stony mountains (“Giri”) over which he rules.<sup>1</sup> (5)

So oh dear husband, think over the matter with due diligence and act with wisdom so that later on our hearts are not subjected to torment and grief arising out of regret and repentance.’ (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There is a clever play on the word “Giri” here. It applies both to the mountains as well as its king.

The mother was very worried about her daughter's fate. She felt that her husband has been carried away by Narad's prophesies. Instead of trying to do his best to find a suitable groom for Uma, he seems to have become biased after Narad's advice, and seems to resign to Uma's fate. This is not a good thing to do for him. She thought that the king has come to believe in the words of Narad who first told them about the fate of Uma that her groom would have such-and-such negative traits (as narrated in Doha no. 67 and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it), and then went on to insist that Shiva is the most suitable groom for Uma (as narrated in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 70).

Not limiting himself to making a prophesy alone, Narad had gone further and had tried to brainwash the father of Uma by saying that if she does Tapa and pleases Lord Shiva, then the Lord can even change the course of her destiny (refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 70).

All this discourse has affected the rational thinking of the king of mountains, Giriraj. And so Uma's mother tried to persuade him to neglect Narad's advice and become more practical. He should search for a suitable groom for her instead of relying on a soothsayer's words. Otherwise the world would laugh at him and say that he was as stupid, dull and ill-witted as the lifeless and gross mountains over which he rules—because he had not applied his mind and intelligence but had relied on hearsay and words of a soothsayer to put the future of his daughter at peril.]

baru pāvaka pragaṭai sasi māhīm. nārada bacanu an'yathā nāhīm. 8.

Saying this, she (Maina; the mother of Uma) humbly fell at the feet of her husband and placed her head on them to plead with him.

Girish, the king of the mountains, politely lifted her and said to her lovingly—
(7)

‘Listen dear. It may be possible that fire erupts on the moon, but it is certain that Narad's words cannot go in vain or that his words are lies. (8)

[Note—The king tries to explain to his wife Maina that she must not think that he is being stupid or dumb by believing Narad's words. He does not believe in soothsayers par-se, but Narad was not an ordinary sage but someone who was “Trikaalagya and Sarvagya” (Doha no. 66). Therefore, what Narad has said can't be overlooked, and it would be rather naïve and stupid to do so.

It would be dumbness to by-pass Narad's advice to let Uma do Tapa to seek Shiva in marriage, and instead go around looking for another suitable groom for her.]

Therefore, oh dear, discard all worries and stop grieving. Instead, invoke and remember Lord God (“Sri Bhagwaan”; the Supreme Being). ‘He’ (i.e. the Sri Bhagwaan) who has created Uma, ‘he’ who has given her birth, ‘he’ is the one who will take care of her and her welfare in an auspicious way and in a manner that is best for her. (Doha no. 71)

[Note—A similar idea is expressed in “Parvati Mangal”, Chanda no. 13 and verse no. 109.]

[Giriraj, the king of mountains and the father of Uma, told his wife, Maina—] ‘Now, taking into consideration what I have said above, if you have sincere affection for our daughter and are concerned about her future welfare, then you should go and give her a wise advice (1)---

---so that she does Tapa (penance and austerity) in order to attain Lord Shiva<sup>1</sup>. Otherwise, there is no other way to eliminate the grief and worries (that have overwhelmed both of us)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

Remember: The words of Narad are rich in subtle meaning and very reasonable. [Don’t think that he is an ordinary clairvoyant who has cast his magical spell on me to mislead me to fall into some kind of trap. What he has said is not without reason, and it has some secret meaning of which, may be, we are not aware. He is a “Trikaalagy and Sarvagya” sage; he knows about the past life of Uma as well as what is in store for her future. Narad is a great devotee of Lord Vishnu, and when he says that our daughter must seek the hand of Shiva in marriage, he must surely have some sound reason behind it. He is not the type of sage who will tell a lie to suit his vested interest.]

[He has already told us that—] Lord Brishketu (i.e. Lord Shiva whose flag has the emblem of a Bull which stands for Dharma, or the virtues of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety and nobility) is indeed glorious and a treasury of beautiful virtues in all imaginable ways<sup>3</sup>. (3)

Think this over and recognise the truth of what I am saying. So, you must dispel all your doubts, misgivings and consternations. Shiva is absolutely free from all perceived taints and negativities that can be ever imagined. [Hence, you need not unnecessarily worry.]<sup>4</sup> (4)

<sup>4</sup>Here the king has answered his wife's concerns expressed in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 71 where she says that he must weigh all the pros and cons before deciding on the groom for their daughter Uma so that later on they are not tormented by grief and remorse at having made a wrong choice due to reliance on the word of a sage who has already said so many negative things about the future of their beloved daughter in order to fill their minds with fear and doubt.

Uma's father, king Giriraj, told her mother Maina: "Remember: Narad has been truthful to us by telling us the reality about our daughter's future. That is a good thing to do. Say, is it not wise to know the truth so that a person can make amends and find a wise way out while still there is time, instead of being in the dark and landing in an unforeseen trouble at a later date when it is already too late?"

His advising us about the possibility of choosing Lord Shiva as a groom for Uma was out of his sincere desire to help us out of the quagmire we have found ourselves in. Since no one can change a person's destiny (refer: Doha no. 68), what the wise, compassionate and noble-hearted sage Narad did was to give us a ray of hope amidst the gloom of darkness, saying in effect that everything is not lost and doomed, and that there is still hope. Though it is not possible to change the destiny of Uma that she will get a husband with the negative traits listed by the sage (refer: Doha no. 67 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8), but in the given circumstances if efforts are made to please Shiva sufficiently by doing Tapa, then the Lord can turn the doomed future of our daughter into a glorious one by accepting to become her husband (refer: Chaupai line no. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 69).

My dear Maina, Narad has no ill intent whatsoever; he is not against our welfare and happiness. Please remove your misgivings about him and his integrity. He is not a wicked sage.

Remember: It will be a great privilege for Uma to be the consort of Lord Shiva who is the greatest of gods and one of the Trinity Gods. Say, who can ever imagine of this good fortune coming his way; and you worry about it?

Don't allow your mind to go astray; have faith in Narad's words because he is a wise one. Remember: Uma is dear to me as she is to you. How can I ever disregard her welfare? But we must not turn our blind eyes to reality, and it is always wise and prudent to pay heed to wise ones like Narad, because if we try to act smart it is then we shall have to regret and not by heeding Narad's advice.

So, cheer up and go to Uma, cheer her up also, and persuade her to do Tapa in order to attain Shiva. Remember what Narad said: 'It is only Lord Shiva who can change her destiny if the Lord is pleased by her Tapa, because the Lord is all-able and competent to change the course of one's destiny (refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 70)'.

Therefore, Narad is not misleading us by hiding anything—neither the future destiny of Uma nor the character traits of Shiva. He has told us the truth. But while telling us that the characters of Lord Shiva are negative when viewed from the perspective of the world and its mortal beings, he has sought to allay our fears by emphasising they the same set of characters acquire a complete different meaning, a positive one, when applied to the Lord. He has explained to us why it is so in detail while advising that the best course of action for Uma would be to please Shiva and request him to accept her as his consort to overcome the negativities of her fate—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 69—to Chaupai line nos. 3 and 5 that precede Doha no. 70.”]

Hearing the encouraging and reassuring words of her husband, she (Maina) felt delighted at heart (and all her doubts, worries, misgivings and consternations abated). She immediately went to Girija (Uma). (5)

She called Uma and, with eyes filled in tears (of affection for her)<sup>1</sup>, she lovingly made the latter sit on her lap. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Maina had tears in her eyes. When her husband had explained things to her she had felt reassured. But when she saw the face of her daughter, all her misgivings resurfaced, and she became highly emotional. She slipped into depression and worries once again, thinking about the sage’s prophesy regarding her daughter’s doomed fate, and the fearful prospect of her being forced to do severe Tapa and endure its hardship if this doomed fate is to be somehow mended in her favour.

Uma has had a pampered upbringing, and now she faced the horror of doing severe penance and austerity, and suffering hardship to which she was not accustomed. This very thought send a chill down the spine of Uma’s loving mother, forcing tears to well-up in her eyes.

Later on in Ram Charit Manas we shall read another incident when the eyes of mother Kaushalya are filled with tears when she learns that her son, Lord Ram, has been ordered to go to forest exile for 14 years. It was a natural emotional reaction of a loving mother because she could visualise the hardship her son will have to undergo in the wilderness of the forest, something for which he was not trained. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 54. See also verse no. 7 herein below and its accompanying note no. 1. ]

The mother repeatedly held her daughter to her bosom and hugged her. The mother's throat was choked with emotions so much so that she could not speak a word to her daughter. (7)

Realising the predicament in which her mother found herself to be in, Bhavani (Uma, the future consort of Bhava, Lord Shiva)<sup>1</sup>, who is the Mother of the whole world and Sarvagya (all-knowing) broke the ice and spoke sweet words to comfort her mother. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>By addressing Uma as “Bhavaani”, the author of this epic, i.e. Goswami Tulsidas, has given us a subtle hint of what is to come next. This hint is this: that from this moment Uma has determined in her mind that she will become a consort of Lord Bhava, another name of Shiva. She did not need any persuasion from her mother for she had already decided to do Tapa to attain Lord Bhava and acquire the right to be called ‘Bhavaani’, ‘Lord Bhava’s consort’.]

Bhavaani (alias Uma) told her mother, ‘Listen mother! I have seen a dream, and I shall tell you what I have seen.

A handsome, fair-complexioned and noble Brahmin had given me an advice (as described in the following verses). (Doha no. 72)

[Note—In ‘Shiva Puran’, 2/3/9/15-18, Parvati, who was none else but the all-knowing goddess Kalikaadevi, the Supreme Goddess known as Parmeshwari, tells her mother: “Mother, listen. In the early morning hours of the previous night, I had a dream. An honourable and noble Vipra (Brahmin) has told me affectionately that I must do Tapa for attaining Lord Shiva.”]

The noble Brahmin told me in my dreams—‘Oh Sailkumari (the daughter of the mountains)! Go and do Tapa, realising the truth of Narad’s words. (1)

Even your parents (mother and father) have agreed to this viewpoint that Tapa is always a provider of happiness and an eliminator of all sorrows and grief.<sup>1</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 163.]

तपबल रचइ प्रपंचु बिधाता । तपबल बिष्नु सकल जग त्राता ॥ ३ ॥

 tapa adhāra saba sṛṣṭi bhavānī. karahi jā'i tapu asa jiyam' jānī. 5.

The creator Vidhata has created this complicated and diversified universe on the strength of Tapa (austerity, penance, suffering hardship for some noble cause). It is on the strength of Tapa that Lord Vishnu is able to eliminate all miseries that afflict this creation and is able to sustain and look after its welfare. (3)

It is on the strength of Tapa that Lord Shambhu (Shiva) finally annihilates the world (when its life ends and the time comes to wind up one cycle of creation so as to pave the way for a new one). It is on the strength of Tapa that Lord Seshnath (the legendary celestial serpent) is able to bear the weight of the earth on his hood (because it is believed that the earth is supported from below by Seshnath who holds it on his hood. (4)

Oh Bhavaani!<sup>1</sup> The entire creation is founded on the strength of Tapa (i.e. all the activities associated with this creation—its origin, sustenance and conclusion; its various activities and changes; its evolution and diversity, et-al—derive their energy and momentum by the virtue of its patron deities responsible for its various functions doing Tapa to enable them to carry out their assigned duties)<sup>2</sup>.

Therefore, realising the stupendous strength and immense potentials of Tapa (and how its practice enables the practitioner to achieve super-natural powers that makes it possible for one to do feats that would be otherwise beyond imagination and one's abilities), you must go and do Tapa (to overcome the hurdles in your fate, and to attain the hands of Lord Shiva in marriage as advised by Narad).<sup>3</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Bhavaani is the divine consort of Lord Bhava, Shiva. By addressing Uma as 'Bhavaani', the Brahmin who appeared in Uma's dream implied that if she wishes to attain this exalted stature of being the consort of Lord Bhava, then the only way it to do Tapa.

priya parivāra pitā aru mātā. bha'e bikala mukha āva na bātā. 8.

Hearing these mysterious words from her daughter, the mother was amazed. She called her husband Giri, and narrated the daughter's dream to him. (6)

The parents, the mother as well as the father, explained the things to their daughter in various ways (to remove her doubts and confusions, as well as to inject confidence and determination in her mind and heart so that she does Tapa with a firm conviction and succeeds in it).

Then, encouraged and convinced, Uma cheerfully (and with great confidence) started-off on her mission of doing Tapa. (7)

As she went away to do Tapa, her dear kith and kin, her loving family members, her parents, everyone, were overcome with grief so much so that they could not utter a word.<sup>1</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Doing Tapa is not a joke nor a child's play. Its severity would shake the confidence of even the hardened war veterans. Just how tough it is to do Tapa and how severely punishing it is will be clear if one reads the following instances in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Uma's Tapa as described in Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 74; (ii) Manu and Satrupa's Tapa as described in from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 144—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 145.

Even a single casual reading of the way Tapa is done and its effect on the body will make even those with stern hearts wince in fear. It is imaginable how hard and difficult it would have been for a girl as young as Uma to bear with the rigidities and hardships of doing Tapa. The mere imagination of the hardships and sufferings involved in doing Tapa sent chill down the spine of the loved ones of Uma, viz. her friends, family members and parents, and they were all drowned in gloom and despair. But there was no way out; Uma was determined to do Tapa.

An interesting lesson is to be learnt here: If a person has firm determination, if one is convinced of the path he or she has chosen, of one has self-confidence in the strength of the Spirit, then there is no hurdle in this creation that can come in his or her path, and for such a resolute person victory and success are virtually served on a platter.]

At the time when all the family members were thus overwhelmed by distress and gloom, sage Ved-siraa (bēdasirā) came and consoled them, explaining the glories of Parvati and extolling her divine virtues.

Learning about Parvati's divinity and heritage (that in her previous life as Sati she was already the consort of Lord Shiva, that she herself had sought to be Shiva's consort in her next life, the present one, at the time of death, and that she was thus an eternal partner of Shiva and therefore is sure to succeed in her Tapa), all the family members and her friends felt reassured and comforted. Their sense of despair and gloom was dissipated, and they became calm. (Doha no. 73)

चौ०. उर धरि उमा प्रानपति चरना । जाइ बिपिन लागीं तपु करना ॥ १ ॥

अति सुकुमार न तनु तप जोगू । पति पद सुमिरि तजेउ सबु भोगू ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

ura dhari umā prānapati caranā. jā'i bipina lāgīm tapu karanā. 1.

ati sukumāra na tanu tapa jōgū. pati pada sumiri tajē'u sabu bhōgū. 2.

Enshrining the holy feet of her beloved Lord (Shiva) in her heart, she (Uma/Parvati) went to the forest and began doing Tapa (to attain her beloved Lord)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Her body was very delicate and fragile, not at all suitable for Tapa. In spite of this, she invoked the holy feet of her husband (Lord Shiva) in her heart, and remembering him she discarded all thoughts of comfort and pleasures that are associated with the body and related to the world<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Uma had decided that Shiva would be her eternal husband, and this determination made her all the more resolute and firm in doing Tapa.

Her Tapa was different from the Tapa done by others to propitiate the chosen deity. While the rest of the world does Tapa to seek some reward, whether it is worldly or spiritual, some kind of blessing from the worshipped deity by way of a boon or two, or for fulfilment of some other kind of desire that is otherwise difficult or almost impossible to achieve, Uma did Tapa to be an 'eternal companion of the deity'.

Her interaction with the deity, in this case Lord Shiva, was not for some moments when the Lord appears before his devotee, grants him or her some boon, and then vanishes from sight. She wanted to be with her deity for the rest of her life. And so this Tapa was special because the desire that needed to be fulfilled was also unique. Consequentially, the intensity and dimension of Uma's Tapa also had to be special and different from the way others did Tapa. In other words, her Tapa was more severe and its sufferings were more intense as compared to the Tapa done by others.

When examined closely we observe that when Manu and Satrupa did Tapa to request Lord Vishnu to become their son, which resulted in the Lord incarnating as Lord Ram to become the son king Dasrath (Manu) and queen Kaushalya (Satrupa), the couple had to do severe Tapa that matched that done by Uma. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 144—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 145.

<sup>2</sup>Tapa involves stern self-restraint, and overcoming all temptations for comfort and pleasure. As we shall be reading shortly below, all desires to please the gross organs of the body, such as the desire of tongue to eat delicious things, the desire of the skin to seek physical comfort, and so on are to be overcome if one were to succeed in Tapa. This exercise of exemplary self-restraint and self-denial is treated as an ideal way of offering that is made to the deity worshipped during a religious sacrifice. Tapa is a sacrifice of one's own self, an exercise that is far better and more effective than making offerings of things that are bought by money, that may cause harm or pain to others (such as animal sacrifices or forcing others to donate against their wishes), and that is done by professional priests for monetary considerations.

To understand how penances and sacrifices done by one's own self are more fruitful and effective than hiring priests to do so we may draw a parallel with going on a pilgrimage to any holy site. The pilgrim who walks up the arduous path to the shrine has done more religiously meritorious deed than the pilgrim who hires an air-conditioned taxi to go there. Though both the persons have gone to the same place with the same religious value, but the first one is a true 'pilgrim' who has walked on foot, and he is the one who gets more credit points and therefore is better rewarded than the air-conditioned taxi-riding 'tourist'.]

nita nava carana upaja anurāgā. bisarī dēha tapahim manu lāgā. 3.

Every passing day saw renewed affection for the holy feet of the Lord (Shiva) sprouting in the heart of Uma so much so that gradually she lost consciousness (awareness) of even the basic comforts of her physical gross body, and instead her mind and heart ("Mana") got deeply involved in doing Tapa (for which she had set out from her home). (3)

[Note—This verse is significant. It underlines the psychological aspects of entering into enterprise, such as Tapa in this case. When a person sets out from the comfort zone of his home to achieve his goal in life, he is very enthusiastic in the beginning. But as soon as he starts to feel the heat of the new path that is not so well-trodden, an unconventional path that he has chosen for himself, his enthusiasm and zest begins to ebb, and he may become disillusioned and disheartened by initial hardships and failures. But if he is resolute and firm in his convictions, if he has faith in himself and his spirit, if he is determined to succeed, then after the initial hiccoughs all obstacles vanish in thin air and the path clears out of its own for him.

Uma was raised in a king's household, being pampered and well-looked after. The initial days were most testing for her. The hardships of living alone in a forest, being deprived of food and basic physical comforts that she was so accustomed of at her home, may have made her disillusioned and jittery. But this did not happen. She was determined to attain Lord Shiva as the only single goal of her life. So what happened? She succeeded.

The first few days of Tapa life were sort of acclimatization and test for her when she was to judge for herself if she can actually cope with the rigours of Tapa. 'Yes, she could'—she found out to her joy. And from then onwards the journey was much easier!]

[Now in the following verses, we shall read about the severity of Uma's Tapa. Refer also to "Parvati Mangal", verse nos. 38—40.]

She survived by eating edible roots and fruits for a thousand years, and then for the next hundred years ate only leaves and stems. (4)

For some days she lived by eating and drinking only air and water, and for some days she abstained from all foods by observing stern fast. (5)

For three thousand years she survived by eating creepers and leaves that had fallen on the ground and had dried up in a natural way. (6)

Then she abstained from eating even dried and fallen leaves etc. It is from that time that she was called 'Aparnaa' (to commemorate the severity of her Tapa). [The word "Aparnaa" means one who had denied himself even the leaves.] (7)

Observing that Uma's body had become extremely emaciated due the severity of the Tapa done by her, a divine voice known as 'Brahm's voice' (the formless sound heard from the heaven and is believed to be spoken by the Holy Spirit, the Lord God; the voice of an Oracle; the voice of Brahma the creator speaking on behalf of the Lord God)# said from the sky (the heaven)<sup>1</sup>. [Next Doha no. 74 and its following verses narrate what this Brahm's voice said to Uma.] (8)

[Note—The way Uma did Tapa for particular numbers of days coincides symbolically with numbers of Mantras used for offering worship to Lord Shiva as ordained in the Shukla Yajur Veda. Out of the many Mantras of this Vedas, those that are exclusively dedicated to Shiva were extracted and listed as a body of Mantras known as "Rudri". There are said to be 11 forms of Lord Shiva, known as the "11 Rudras".

Uma did Tapa as follows: 1000 years + 100 years (verse no. 4) = '11'00 ('eleven' thousand) years. They symbolise the 11 Rudras or 11 Rudri Mantras.

Then the next verse no. 5 says that she spent some days eating air, drinking water and fasting. Since a Tapa is done in a systematic manner, therefore we can assume that this second phase also followed the same pattern: that is, she survived on air and water for 1000 years and ate nothing for the next 100 years, bringing the total number of days to 1100 years. Like in the previous instance, this completed her 'second' round of Rudri.

This was followed by the third round as narrated in verse nos. 6-7 by which time she had done Tapa for 3000 years + 300 years = '33'00 years. The figure of '33' in '3300' stands for  $11 \times 3 = 33$  Rudri Mantras. That is, Uma symbolically worshipped all the 11 Rudras for 'three times' to imply that she is devoted to them in all the three dimensions of time—the past, the present, and the future.

The 'zero' that is added to the numerals 1, 11, 3 or 33 mean the number of times the main Tapa was multiplied in terms of magnitude or intensity. That is, if others did a Tapa say for 11 years with a certain degree of intensity, the Tapa of Uma was a hundred times more intense.

<sup>1</sup>When the Tapa was successful, there was always a voice from the heaven to indicate it to the person who was engaged in doing Tapa, and this was followed by a request to him or her to seek the desired boon.

When Manu and Satrupa's Tapa was successful, a similar voice was heard from the sky, asking them to seek a boon—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 145.

Similarly, when the Tapa of the demon king Ravana and his brothers were successful, the creator Brahma had spoken to them and asked them to seek a boon: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 177.

#Usually it was 'Brahma, the creator' who spoke on behalf of the Supreme Being. Hence, this voice is aptly called the "voice of the Oracle".]

aba ura dharahu brahma bara bānī. satya sadā santata suci jānī. 2.

[The voice from the sky, the heaven, which was like the voice of an Oracle, said—] ‘Oh Bhavaani! No one has ever done the type of Tapa as you have done, though there were many a patient, courageous and wise sages and hermits<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Now have faith in the eclectic and wise words of Brahm, the supreme Lord of creation. Realising that these words are always truthful, honest and sincere, as well as sacred and venerable, you must keep them in your heart<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: “Parvati Mangal”, verse no. 40 also.

Sages and hermits did Tapa as a routine affair. Their whole life was virtually devoted to Tapa, but it had become more of a religious duty and a sort of ritual for them rather than a concerted and single-minded effort to achieve a particular goal. And amongst them who actually did Tapa in the rigorous and intensive way Uma had done, they were successful in acquiring special super-natural powers and spiritual seniority that others lacked.

Patience and courage are the hall-marks of all dedicated saints, sages and hermits because without these virtues they can’t cope with the rigour of the life they have chosen for themselves, a life that requires strict self-discipline, remaining distanced from the charms of the physical world, overcoming the natural instincts of the body and the desire of the sense organs for gratification, and the other natural pulls and tugs of worldly life.

It’s like the case of a university class. Hundred and thousands of students pass through the portals of a university, but only a few selected ones do something that is path-breaking and unique which will make them remembered in history as legends.

The severity of Uma’s Tapa was one of its kind, and no one had suffered so much for the objective she had in mind—viz. to have a husband. Refer also to: Kalidas’ “Kumar Sambhava”, Canto 5, verse no. 29 which also says that the severity of Uma’ Tapa was unprecedented.

So, the voice of Brahma, the Creator, praised Parvati for her Tapa.

<sup>2</sup>The voice Uma heard was not the voice of an ordinary creature, not even of any ordinary god, but the voice of the Lord of creation. The words that the Lord speaks are never false or cloaked in deceit or driven by vested interest; these words are sacred and honourable. Not everyone is fortunate to hear them; only a few privileged ones hear it. The words of Brahm are always for the good and welfare of the devotee of the Lord. So, mindful of this fact, Uma is advised to bring them to her heart and do as advised by it.

Remember: Brahm does not speak often, and it is only when the Lord is pleased by the devotee that he chooses to address him or her directly. There are other instances where this has happened in Ram Charit Manas. Refer: Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 148 (with respect to Lord Vishnu blessing Manu and Satrupa); and (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 177 (with respect of Brahma blessing the demon brothers, Ravan etc.).

Not only the supreme Lord, even ordinary human sages blessed those upon whom they were pleased—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 164 where we read that the hermit has blessed king Pratapbhanu and asked him to seek any boon he wishes.]

When your father comes to call you back home<sup>1</sup>, at that time you must not resist him but return home immediately<sup>2</sup> (with him). (3)

When you meet the seven celestial sages known as ‘Sapta-rishis’, then you would be reassured about the authenticity of this prophesy made by this Oracle<sup>3</sup>.’ (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was Uma’s father who was instrumental in sending her to do Tapa by overruling her mother’s initial doubts and objections (refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 71—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 72). So, when her father himself comes to her to ask her to go back home, Uma would have no doubts about his intentions.

Another interesting observation is that Uma has been advised to go home without “resistance”. This means that her father had tried to bring her home on previous occasions as well when he had learnt about the immensity of her sufferings as outlined in verse nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 74. Remember: Her father was the king of the mountains, and so obviously he must have kept someone to keep a watch on her. So he was aware of her sufferings during the process of Tapa. He must have either come himself or sent someone in order to persuade Uma to return home, but she must have refused. That is why this Oracle had to tell her “not to resist her father when he comes to ask her to return home”.

<sup>2</sup>The next question is: After doing Tapa, why was it necessary for Uma to “go home” instead of remaining in the hermitage where she did Tapa? Well, the answer to this question is as follows: Uma did Tapa to ‘marry Shiva’, and marriage necessitates that she remains in with her parents at her parental home so that all the formalities and rites associated with marriage and its religious ceremonies can be done according to the sanctioned process of the scriptures. Marriage cannot be done with full rituals and ceremony in a forest hermitage.

<sup>3</sup>Why was it necessary for the voice of Brahm to give a proof of its authenticity to reassure Uma when it said that “when you meet the Sapta-rishis, you will be assured of the truthfulness of this voice and prophesy”.

Well, the reason is that when someone does Tapa, the deity who is offered this form of sacrifice is the one who reveals before the devotee to bless him or her. For instance, when Manu and Satrupa did Tapa, they did it for Lord Vishnu, and it was Vishnu who appeared before them to bless them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 143 (where it is said that they worshipped Lord Vasudeo, another name of Vishnu), and from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 148 (where we learn that the Lord Vishnu revealed himself as Lord Ram with Sita representing goddess Laxmi by his side).

But this did not happen in the case of Uma. It was “Brahm’s voice” and not “Shiva’s voice”. So, in order to remove her doubts, the voice had to give her certain proof by citing events in the future. And the two events that it cited are: (i) her father coming to her with a request to go home, and (ii) the seven sages coming to her.

Brahma, the creator, had made predictions elsewhere also. For instance, later on in the story of Ram Charit Manas it is narrated that when Hanuman entered Lanka and was confronted by the demoness called Lankini, he had hit her viciously with his fist, leading her to fall and vomit blood. At that time Lankini recalled the prophesy made by Brahma when he saw her after granting boons to the demon king Ravana and his brothers Kumbhakaran and Vibhishan. Brahma had told her that “when she would fall down upon being hit by a monkey, she should be warned that the end of the cruel demons was near”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 4.]

[Note—The reason for her happiness and joy was obvious: it was now certain that her efforts at acquiring Lord Shiva as her divine husband were successful. What more would any person want?]

[Now there is a pause in our narration. We shall read below what happened during the intervening time after Sati had died by burning herself in fire at her father Daksha’s place, and the present sequence of events in her new birth as Uma when she was blessed by Brahma that her wishes to marry Shiva are sure to be fulfilled.]

I (sage Yagyawalkya said to sage Bharadwaj) have narrated the beautiful and interesting events in the life of Uma. Now, listen to the other interesting events that are associated with the pleasant story of Lord Shiva. (6)

Ever since the time Sati had gone (to her father’s place during the fire sacrifice) and left her gross body (i.e. died by burning herself in the fire of Yoga), Shiva’s mind and heart became like a recluse: he assumed a renunciate attitude, becoming totally aloof and detached from everything. (7)

[So, what was he doing in the meantime?] He spent his time constantly repeating (doing “Japa” of) the holy name of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>, as well as preaching and listening to the divine story of Lord Ram and the sacred events associated with the life and times of the Lord while he lived on earth<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 52.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 48. It is fascinating to research where Lord Shiva heard the divine story of his beloved Lord Ram during this time. The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas itself, in its Uttar Kand, which is its last Canto or Chapter. There, Lord Shiva himself tells Parvati that in the intervening period of time, from her death in her previous life as Sati, till her reunion with the Lord in her current life, Shiva had been wondering from place to place to listen the divine story of Lord Ram being narrated by renowned sages and saints. During one of such sojourns he had heard the story at the place of saintly crow named Kaagbhusund. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 58.]

While roaming on earth, Lord Shiva visited the hermitages of sages, seers and saints, preaching them and dispensing knowledge of metaphysics and spiritualism at some places, while at other places he described the divine virtues and glories of Lord Ram. (1)

Though he was dispassionate and detached from everything, having no desire whatsoever in his heart, but still he was a compassionate Lord who was moved by the grief and misery of his devotee (here alluding to the sufferings of Uma who had done severe Tapa for him)<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Externally, Lord Shiva maintained a stoic expression of dispassion and neutrality, but internally his heart was uneasy. This uneasiness was not because he had some hidden passions inside him, but because his devotee known as Uma was suffering for him. Being a compassionate Lord, this made him restless, and this is the primary reason why he left his mountainous abode in Mt. Kailash to come down to the plains and visit the different hermitages of sages to preach and listen to the stories of Lord Ram. This helped him to keep his remorseful heart at peace and engaged so that it is kept diverted from his deep-seated sorrows generated by his awareness of the sufferings of Uma.

Shiva has acknowledged this fact—that he was remorseful, very sad and overcome with grief at his separation from Sati due to unfortunate circumstances—later on in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 56.]

In this way, a lot of time passed away. In the meanwhile, affection and devotion for Lord Ram kept on sprouting in the heart of Lord Shiva with renewed vigour and freshness on a daily basis. (3)

Observing the steadfastness and sincerity of Shiva's self-discipline and affection for him (for Lord Ram), and the fact that the eclectic virtue of Bhakti (devotion, submission and dedication) was as permanent in Shiva's heart as an indelible line (marked on stone), (4)---

---Lord Ram felt highly thankful and grateful to Lord Shiva, and was obliged to reveal himself before the latter. When Lord Ram appeared before Shiva, the Lord (Ram) looked most amiable and charming in his beautiful and splendorous form that was radiant with a bright halo of exceptional brilliance and divinity. (5)

Lord Ram praised Shiva in many ways, lauding the latter's virtues and glories. Lord Ram told Shiva—'Who else would have been successful in observing so strict vows as you have done? [That is, no one in this world can be so strict and steady in observing the disciplined way of life as Shiva does—both from the perspective of remaining detached from everything associated with this world as well as from the spiritual perspective by having steady and robust devotion for Lord Ram who personifies the Supreme Being himself.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 57 which endorses this statement.

Lord Ram explains why he was obliged to manifest himself before Lord Shiva. Lord Ram saw that Shiva's devotion for him was unprecedented, that Shiva remembers him day in and day out, and that Shiva's heart was not at peace (refer: verse no. 2 herein above). Since Shiva was Lord Ram's ardent and most faithful devotee, the Lord felt obliged to intervene and help find a way to remove the cause of unease in Shiva's heart.

As we shall find soon, this is exactly what has happened. Lord Ram knew the cause of pain in Shiva's heart: being a compassionate god himself, Shiva was tormented by the sufferings of Uma who wanted Shiva to be her husband. So, Lord Ram advised Shiva to marry her: refer: Doha no. 76 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

Remember: Lord Vishnu, whose manifested form is Lord Ram, reveals himself instantly anywhere if his devotee invokes the Lord with intense love and affection just like the omnipresent 'fire element' that can be produced anywhere if the conditions are proper—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3, and 5-7 that precede Doha no. 185.

So, when Lord Ram found that Shiva's heart was ripe with devotion for him, the Lord immediately revealed himself before Shiva.]

ati punīta girijā kai karanī. bistara sahita kṛpānidhi baranī. 8.

Lord Ram explained to Lord Shiva things in various ways while narrating to him the birth of Parvati. (7)

The merciful Lord Ram narrated the finer details about the immaculate virtues of Girija (the daughter of the mountains; Parvati or Uma). (8)

[Note—Lord Ram knew the reason why Shiva had decided to renounce his ties with Uma/Parvati, the daughter of the king of mountains, in her previous birth as Sati. Shiva had taken a vow that he will not have anything to do with her because she had taken the form of Sita, the consort of Lord Ram whom Shiva adores as his deity and Lord God, because it violated the basic principle of Dharma. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 2 that follows this Doha.

Lord Ram pointed out to Shiva that his vows have been upheld, and that he (Lord Ram), whom Shiva reveres so much, is very pleased with him and his devotion. But now if he marries Uma he would not be violating any of the vows he had taken.

This is because Shiva's vow was that he would not accept Sati in her present form or body (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57). That tainted body of Sati has been burnt in fire, and therefore all its impurities have also been burnt with it. The soul is untainted and eternal; the body commits a sin and is subject to punishment for those sins, but the soul remains pure and holy.

Shiva was a highly self-realised and enlightened god, and he knew this fact. Lord Ram only reminded him of it. Lord Ram explained to Shiva that the tainted body of Sati is already burnt and dead, and that her soul was pure and holy. The soul cannot be blamed for the mischief committed by the body. Besides this, Shiva must remember that he has an obligation to fulfil the desire of his own devotees just like Lord Ram has towards his devotees. So, since Sati's death-wish was to be reunited with Shiva and at the time of death she had invoked Lord Ram to request him to grant her this single wish (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65), he (Ram) was under obligation to fulfil that wish—because the wish of a dying person must be fulfilled. And therefore, he (Lord Ram) has now come personally to Shiva to intercede on behalf of Uma that Shiva must forgive her for past sins and accept her as his wife.

After all, Sati had committed an offence against Lord Ram, so if the latter is ready to forgive her and has even come personally to advocate her cause, then Shiva must relent and also be reasonable enough to forgive her and accept her hand in marriage.]

Lord Ram pleaded with Lord Shiva—‘Now oh Shiva, please pay heed to my prayers if you really have affection for me. [In other words, if you respect me and think that I cannot give you a wrong advice, then you must pay attention to my request.]

I have one request to make to you which please accept—Go and marry the daughter of the mountains.’ (Doha no. 76).

[Note—Lord Ram has virtually instructed Shiva to “go and marry Uma”. Though this instruction is made in polite manner by using such words as “it is my prayer or request; if you have affection for me then please grant me one wish” etc., but after all it was an explicit “order”, a clear “instruction” to “go and marry the daughter of the mountains”.

So we see Shiva had no choice, and he has made this clear in verse nos. 1-4 that follow herein below. Shiva could not imagine defying the orders of his most beloved Lord Ram. It also helped Shiva to overcome his reluctance and any sense of guilt at having to break his vows of remaining a renunciate for the rest of his life—for he had to obey his Lord, Sri Ram whose commands take a precedence over everything else.]

kaha siva jadapi ucita asa nāhīm. nātha bacana puni mēṭi na jāhīm. 1.

sira dhari āyasu kari'a tumhārā. parama dharamu yaha nātha hamārā. 2.

Lord Shiva said to Lord Ram—“Though it is not proper to do so<sup>1</sup> (i.e. marry Uma), but nevertheless oh Lord, it is not possible to defy your words. (1)

It is my most auspicious and holy duty to obey your orders by keeping them on my head (i.e. by bowing my head and accepting your orders)<sup>2</sup>.

[That is, it is obligatory for me, who am your devotee and worshipper, to honour your words and do as you tell me without asking questions. I accept your advice with a bowed head.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was “not proper to do?” Why was Shiva reluctant to marry Uma?

After Shiva had decided that he will renounce all links with Sati and lead a life of renunciation and dispassion like a hermit, spending his time in meditation and contemplation, repeating the holy name of Lord Ram, preaching about him and hearing his divine stories being narrated at different hermitages on sages and saints on earth, and generally living a life of a Sanyasi (a reclusive hermit or ascetic), it will be highly inappropriate to marry and go back to the life of a householder. In this context, refer to the following verses of Ram Charit Manas—(a) Baal Kand:-- (i) Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 57; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 58; (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 76; and (b) Aranya Kand:-- (iv) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 43—to Doha no. 44 (where Lord Ram explains to sage Narad why the former prevented the latter from getting married).

It is not expected even from human beings that once they have renounced the world and declared that they will live a life of a hermit or ascetic, they go back on their vow and re-enter a householder's life by marrying and living with a female partner. If an ordinary human is not expected to do so because it is violative of the sanctions of the scriptures, then how someone as exalted and honourable as Lord Shiva is expected to do so? It will be a highly unacceptable act.

This being the situation, how do we justify the position that Lord Ram is not giving Shiva a wrong advice or instruction that violates the scriptures by telling him to marry Uma? Well, the answer is this: Firstly, Shiva had taken a vow that he will have nothing to do with Sati in her present body because she had unfortunately assumed the form of Sita, Lord Ram's consort (refer: from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57). But that does not mean that Shiva would not accept Sati with a new body, in her new life that had nothing to do with her previous life. The sin that Sati's body committed was burnt with the body of Sati. The Atma or the soul is eternal and incorruptible. So, the Atma of Sati was not tainted by the sins committed by her body. When her Atma assumed a new body of Uma, this new form had no links with the tainted body of the previous life; that body had been ‘burnt to ashes’ (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64). This fact is alluded to by Lord Ram when he tells Shiva that his vows of not accepting Sati as his wife is already fulfilled, and thus Shiva should now honour the Lord's words of marrying Uma (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 77 herein below).

Secondly, Shiva is also an exalted senior God, one of the Trinity Gods. This being the case, it is obligatory upon him to fulfil the wishes of his devotees who do Tapa to please him. There are countless instances in the Purans and other scriptures that when someone did Tapa to please Lord Shiva, the latter appeared and granted the worshipper his desired boon. Therefore, Shiva just could not refuse this privilege to Uma when she did Tapa to have him as her husband.

We have already read that Sati had burnt her body which had become tainted by her assuming the form of Sita, and so all her sins were burnt along with that body. Uma's Tapa had further purified her of whatever traces of past sins that may have dogged her into her new birth. She had reiterated her loyalty towards Lord Shiva by single-mindedly pursuing Tapa to attain the Lord, and in spite of provocative statements made by the Sapta-rishis who had come to test her sincerity and loyalty, he had remained steadfast in her vows to be loyal to Lord Shiva and accept him as her husband no matter what happens.

Thirdly, Uma had already got the blessing of Brahma, the creator, when he appeared before her upon completion of her Tapa to grant her the wish that she would marry Shiva (refer: Doha no. 74 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8). Brahma's words cannot go wrong because he is the one who determines the fate of all living beings; Brahma's words have to be kept.

Shiva regards Lord Ram as his revered deity and Lord, and therefore it is obligatory for him to obey the latter. This is why Shiva says "that Lord Ram's words must be honoured without asking any questions". A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 177 in relation to Bharat accepting the principle that one should always obey his seniors such as parents and guru (moral preceptor and teacher). Shiva explains why he has decided to accept Lord Ram's "orders", which is actually a polite request, in verse nos. 3-4 herein below.

All these events add upto one conclusion: There was no problem if Shiva marries Uma.]

मातु पिता गुर प्रभु कै बानी । बिनहिं बिचार करिअ सुभ जानी ॥ ३ ॥

तुम्ह सब भाँति परम हितकारी । अग्या सिर पर नाथ तुम्हारी ॥ ४ ॥

tumha saba bhāmti parama hitakārī. agyā sira para nātha tumhārī. 4.

One should keep the words of one's parents, a guru (moral preceptor and teacher) and the Lord (here meaning both the worshipped deity as well as one's Master)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

You are my well-wisher in every imaginable way, and therefore I will willingly accept your orders by keeping them on my head (which is another way of saying that I am bowing my head before you and accepting your instructions without questions).'
(4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed at other places in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 177 in relation to Bharat accepting the principle that one should always obey his seniors such as parents and guru (moral preceptor and teacher); and (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 315 where Lord Ram gives this advice to his younger brother Bharat, saying that if one follows the path advised by one's parents, guru and Lord, then even if that path is not auspicious, the person's efforts still won't go in vain.]

कह प्रभु हर तुम्हार पन रहेऊ । अब उर राखेहु जो हम कहेऊ ॥ ६ ॥ prabhu tōṣē'u suni saṅkara bacanā. bhakti bibēka dharma juta racanā. 5.

kaha prabhu hara tumhāra pana rahē'ū. aba ura rākhēhu jō hama kahē'ū. 6.

The Lord (Sri Ram) was satisfied when he heard Lord Shiva's words which were infused with elements of 'Bhakti' (devotion), 'Vivek' (wisdom) and 'Dharma' (righteousness, propriety, noble conduct)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The Lord (Sri Ram) told Shiva—'Oh Har (Shiva)! Your vows have been kept<sup>2</sup>. Now please be kind to keep in mind what I have told you.' (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Three things are mentioned here—viz. 'Bhakti', 'Vivek' and 'Dharma'. Lord Shiva was a devotee of Lord Ram, and had the highest degree of devotion for his revered Lord, i.e. for Lord Ram. Bhakti requires that one should be submissive, devoted and loyal towards the revered deity whom he worships. A devotee must regard his worshipped Lord as his best well-wisher, and all the orders of the Lord are to be honoured without question. So, since Shiva humbly accepted whatever his revered Lord Ram advised him to do, the former's answer is said to be soaked in 'Bhakti'.

Shiva's acceptance had elements of 'Vivek' and 'Dharma' because he was aware of the principle that one must honour the words of his parents, his guru and his Lord. He was also aware of the fact that the body that commits a sin must be punished, but the Atma is incorruptible. Sati had been severely punished because she died by burning herself. Uma was absolutely flawless. Whatever vestiges of past sins that might have remained clinging to her Atma were eliminated when Uma did severe Tapa. Remember: Tapa is highly purifying and enabling. Besides this, it was obligatory for Shiva to honour the wish of his devotee—in this case Uma—who wants to have him as her life-partner. Shiva did not violate any of the principles of moral law and ethics when he decided to obey his Lord's words instructing him to marry Uma.

Shiva's decision to accept Lord Ram's instructions were in line with the principles of Dharma and Vivek, besides being in accordance with the principles of Bhakti.

<sup>2</sup>Shiva had taken a vow that he will not accept Sati in her present body or form because she had assumed the form of Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 56—to Chaupai line no. 2 that follow this Doha. He had kept this vow as long as Sati lived as is clear from reading the subsequent verses, viz. from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 57—right upto Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 60. Shiva had abandoned Sati from his mind and heart; mere presence of her meant nothing to him just like a renunciate ascetic or hermit who is unconcerned and unaffected by his surroundings.

Later on we read that Sati had burnt herself—and this ended her existence once and for all. So, in effect, Shiva lived upto his vows—“not to have any thing to do with Sati as long as she lived”. This is history now. Uma is a new individual, born at a new place, has her own fate and life. So, this was a new beginning, a new chapter. Shiva won't break his vows if he accepted Uma.]

tabahiṁ saptariṣi siva pahīṁ ā'ē. bōlē prabhu ati bacana suhā'ē. 8.

Giving his instructions to Lord Shiva as narrated above, Lord Ram vanished from sight. Lord Shiva enshrined that divine image of his revered Lord Ram in his heart. (7)

Just at that time, the seven celestial sages, known as the 'Sapta Rishis', came to Lord Shiva (as prophesised by Brahma)<sup>1</sup>. Lord Shiva spoke to them in pleasant words (as narrated herein below). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 75.

The “Sapta-rishis” was a group of seven ancient sages or seers consisting of the following—Kashyap, Atri, Jamdagni, Vishwamitra, Vasistha, Bharadwaj and Gautam.

Here in Ram Charit Manas it is just said that the seven sages came to Lord Shiva after Lord Ram vanished from sight. That means, the seven sages were askewd by the creator Brahma to go and meet Shiva before proceeding to meet Parvati.

But in Tulsidas' “Parvati Mangal”, verse no. 75, it is said that the sages came when Lord Shiva remembered them.

These seven sages were the following—Kashyap, Atri, Jamdagni, Vishwamitra, Vasistha, Bharadwaj and Gautam.

The same narration of coming of the Sapta-rishis when Lord Shiva remembered them is also mentioned in Shiva Puran, 2/3/25/7-11.

Another variation in the narrative of Ram Charit Manas and other books, such as Parvati Mangal and Shiva Puran, is that while Lord Shiva asks these sages to go and test the sincerity of Parvati in Ram Charit Manas (refer: Doha no. 77 herein below), he has sent them to the father of Parvati to fix a date for the marriage and do whatever is necessary in Parvat Mangal, verse no. 78.]

Dispel all his doubts and clear the air of confusion and uncertainties that have clouded his mind and heart. (Doha no. 77)

[Note—Brahma knew that Shiva would like to test Parvati's sincerity and devotion. This is because Brahma is the 'creator' and is 'all-knowing'. He knows what will happen in the future point of time. That is why he had told Uma that, first the Sapta Rishis would come to you, and then her father would come to persuade her to return home, at which time she must not resist but oblige him.

The question arises: When Lord Ram has already requested Shiva to marry Parvati, and Shiva has accepted it, then why did he wish to "test Parvati's devotion and sincerity"? The probable reason is that Shiva was sceptical of Parvati as he knew her nature from her past life as Sati—that she was of a fickle mind. Shiva had accepted Lord Ram's orders rather 'reluctantly'—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 77. He wanted to be sure if Parvati has changed for good, or whether she still has the same nature as was in her previous life as Sati.

If Parvati had by chance still exhibited even a trace of her past self, then Shiva would have found an excuse to refuse Parvati's marriage with him. Shiva would then have invoked Lord Ram to tell him that she hasn't changed a bit, that she still carries the old corrupt habit in her new life as Parvati, and therefore it is not at all advisable for him to accept her as his consort, especially when he had taken a stern vow of having nothing to do with her.

But on the contrary, if she had completely undergone a transformation, if she shows reformation and resolution in character, then surely she can be forgiven and accepted in the fold. Even Lord Ram tests the sincerity of his devotee before accepting him or her as one of his own; testing a devotee's sincerity and dedication is acceptable.

Another interesting interpretation is this: Lord Shiva was aware of Parvati's love for him as is clear when we read Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 76 above which says, in essence, that "though Shiva was a renunciate and a recluse, still he was feeling sorry because his devotee (here meaning Parvati) was suffering due to the pain of his separation". So, Shiva had no doubts about Parvati's sincerity, but the world wasn't aware of it, and the world is so nasty that if Shiva accepted Parvati without any test then a lot of wicked tongues would start wagging. Hence, it was necessary to tell the world that he had accepted Parvati after due testing, and this testing was done not by him but by "a jury of seven celestial sages" so that no trace of doubt is left in anybody's mind about the purity and holiness of Parvati. This was very crucial because all the gods and their respective goddesses, as well as the great sages and Brahmins who had gathered to attend the fire sacrifice of Daksha had scorned at Sati's loyalty and faith when she had defied her husband (Shiva) to go and attend her father Daksha's fire sacrifice against his advice not to do so (refer: Doha no. 62 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8), leading to her getting angry and burning herself in disgust—refer: from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 63—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64).

Later on in the story of Ram Charit Manas we shall read that Lord Ram had subjected Sita to the "fire test of purity" at the end of the war at Lanka—refer: Ram

Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 108—to Doha no. 109. Does this mean that Sita was corrupt, or that Lord Ram doubted her integrity? The whole war was fought to liberate her from the clutches of the demons, and then this to happen was incredulous? But Lord Ram was very wise: he knew that it was necessary to keep tongues from wagging and making false accusations.]

The (seven celestial) sages saw Gauri (Parvati) there (i.e. at the place where she had been doing Tapa) as if she was a personified form of Tapa (penance, austerities and sufferance for a noble cause) itself. [She was radiant with the divine aura acquired by doing penances and observing austerities. She personified all the virtues of Tapa, and when the sages saw her they found her in a state of exalted existence that can come only when one has attained the highest level of purity as a fruit of successful Tapa.] (1)

[Note—Refer also: Shiva Puran, 2/3/25/19.

Even the first glance of Parvati convinced the sages that she was absolutely immaculate and worthy of being Shiva's partner. Whatever may be her sins in her previous life as Sati, all those sins have been burnt along with her physical body when she burnt herself in the fire of Yoga (as narrated in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64).

Presently in her new birth as Parvati, her Atma (i.e. her 'pure self' or Soul) was as divine, as holy and as immaculate as it could ever be. Even as the ordinary fire burns all the impurities of anything that is put into it, the rigours of Tapa too leaves the person who undertakes it fully purified and free of any after-effects of sins committed by him or her. This results in the shine of the Atma coming to the fore in the form of a radiant and glorious halo around the concerned person just like the brilliant halo that surrounds the sun in the sky.]

The sages said to Sailkumari (the daughter of the mountains; Parvati)—‘Listen to us, oh Sailkumari! Why are you doing such a severe Tapa? (2)

Whom do you worship, and what is your wish? Why don't you tell us the secret of your heart (that has led you to undertake doing such a severe Tapa)?’ (3)

[Note—Refer also: Shiva Puran, 2/3/25/21 where the sages have asked Parvati—“Oh Sailkumari; why are you doing such severe Tapa? Which deity do you worship; what do you want as a reward? Tell us everything.”]

An interesting point to note here is this: The sages did not adopt any conceit or a fictitious form when they went to Parvati to test her. Compare this to Sati who had assumed the form of Sita, Lord Ram’s wife, when she had gone to test the Lord (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 52). In a way the sages told Parvati that the proper way to test someone is to be honest with him. They had straightforwardly asked Parvati why she was doing Tapa without using any disguise to hide their identity to mislead her.]

Parvati (“Sailkumari”) was very hesitant<sup>1</sup> as she replied—‘Oh Sages! You will laugh when you hear my stupidity, stubbornness and ill-wittedness (“Jad-taai”).’ (4)

My Mana (heart and mind) has become adamant and it won’t listen to any advice or imploring. It wants to raise a wall on water! [This is a metaphoric way of saying that “my mind and heart want something as impossible as desiring to erect a wall on the flowing water of a river or ocean, something which is absolutely impossible. But what can I do? As I have already told you, my Mana is very stubborn.”] (5)

Believing in the words of sage Narad, I am trying to fly in the air without having wings! [That is, like making an impossible attempt to fly without wings, I too am trying to make an attempt to marry Shiva without having the required qualifications for it.] (6)

Oh sages, look at my stupidity that I am trying to become a wife of Lord Shiva! [I know that what I am trying is impossible to achieve—i.e. to marry Shiva. But what can I do? I am stubborn by nature; my mind and heart won’t hear reasoning and logic.]’ (7)

[Note—Parvati did not wish to be disturbed. She had a hunch that these seven sages will prod her to abandon her Tapa and forget about marrying Shiva as this is impossible to achieve. In fact, this is what would happen soon. In their attempt to test the sincerity of Parvati’s devotion for Lord Shiva and her determination to have the Lord as her husband, they will try their best to deter her from pursuing this objective of marrying Shiva and change course. They will go to the extent of highlighting all the perceived negativities of character in Shiva and provide her with better options, such as opting for Lord Vishnu who has fine characters, in order to see how firm she is in her devotion for Shiva, how resolute her mind is, and if she harbours any kinds of doubts about him.

Parvati was fully devoted and committed to Lord Shiva, and so she wanted to pre-empt any nonsensical talk by the sages that would irritate her. That is why she said up front that her mind is stubborn and her heart is not ready to reason. So the sages should please better shut up!

<sup>1</sup>Parvati was “hesitant” to reply. Why was she reluctant? She knew that the persons who have asked her the reason for her Tapa were great sages and they have already told her to speak the truth. For a girl to say that she wants to marry such and such person is a bit difficult for her if she has to say this to even her father in private audience, and here she is forced to disclose this secret desire in public, and that too in front of not one, not two nor three—but ‘seven’ sages. This made her very uneasy because this was a private affair for her. She even could not take the recourse of lies before the sages, not could she refuse to reply. She was in a sort of a quandary.

She feared that the seven sages would ridicule her for her outlandish decision and far-fetched desire to marry Shiva. That is why she said even before they could make any adverse comments that her wish to marry Shiva was like (i) erecting a wall on water (verse no. 5), and (ii) flying without wings (verse no. 6). She expected that these comments would make the sages keep their quiet and go away. But this was not to be. Just like Sati hadn’t got the hint when Shiva had tried to enlighten her about the divinity of Lord Ram and had instead gone ahead to test the latter, these sages too didn’t get a hint of what Parvati meant. Instead, they continued with their ‘testing assignment’.

Such is the wonder of the Lord’s “Maya” (delusion-creating powers) that even the wisest ones fail to pick up the hint when something is destined to happen as devised by the supreme Creator!]

When the sages heard the words of Parvati, they laughed in derision, saying—‘After all, you have been born as a daughter of Mountains!’

[There is a sarcastic undertone in this comment. It means that like the grossness and the dullness of the mountains, whatever is produced in their realm too acquires their basic nature of being gross and dull. The mountains lack greenery and vibrancy of life; they are made up of lifeless and hard rocks. These are metaphors for dullness and grossness of mind and heart. In other words, Parvati is dull and stupid as well as stubborn and hard to reason with like the place where she is born.]

Say, has anyone’s home established if he or she had heeded the words (advice; suggestions) of Narad? (Doha no. 78)

[Note—Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 97 where Maina, the mother of Parvati, also accuses Narad in a similar way. A note appended to Chaupai line nos. 1-2 therein explains the matter further and why the accusations against Narad are misplaced and unjustified.

Narad was the greatest devotee of Lord Vishnu, and a true sage and saint. His constant endeavour was to help the creature attain freedom from the endless cycle of birth and death. Narad always tried to wean away the creature's Atma, i.e. his soul, from being entangled with this world, and instead move towards attaining permanent liberation and deliverance. Narad was a 'Sanyasi' par-excellence, and a Upanishad named "Narad Parivraajak Upanishad" that describes in detail the philosophy of Sanyas (life of worldly renunciation) is attributed to him. This Upanishad is one of the best of its category.

This being so, Narad always dissuaded those with whom he came in contact from getting entangled into the world by marrying and raising a household because then the creature gets sucked in a vortex of worldly attachments, charms and responsibilities from which he finds himself difficult to extract later on in life. It's like putting a foot in quicksand or quagmire or whirlpool: it's quick and easy to get in, and virtually impossible to get out.

What the seven sages meant here is that Parvati was being misled into believing Narad that she can lead a happy householder's life by marrying Shiva. Didn't she know that Shiva lives like an ascetic; in fact he was a patron god of all ascetics? Didn't she know that he has no permanent house, but lives alone in the mountainous caves of Mt. Kailash? Didn't she know that he has taken a vow of not marrying anybody after the incident of Sati defying his advice and assuming the form of Sita?

They meant "Isn't she being stupid to expect the impossible prospect of being happily married to a renunciate ascetic such as Shiva just because a sage named Narad, who is reputed to turn creatures away from getting entangled in worldly affairs, advised her to do Tapa to do so, knowing fully well that Shiva is a reclusive ascetic and can never qualify as a good householder? Isn't she dull-witted and a block-head in the given circumstances to believe Narad and pursue a path that would not give her happiness, but ridicule her instead?"

[The Sapta-rishis said to Parvati—] 'He (Narad) went and gave some advice to the sons of Daksha<sup>1</sup>. The result was that they did not come back to see their homes again. [After hearing Narad's advice, the sons of Daksha developed profound renunciation in their hearts, and so they took to the lives of a 'Sanyasi', i.e. the life of a renunciate mendicant or hermit. They decided not to do Tapa to start a family, and instead do it to attain liberation and deliverance from the cycle of birth and death. They therefore renounced the world completely, never to return home.]<sup>2</sup> (1) family life and become mendicants. What the Sapta-rishis meant to tell Parvati is that when even the sons of an expert father like Daksha were misled by Narad to renounce their homes, how can anyone expect that the daughter of the king of mountains who is surely not as wise as Daksha will not be an easy prey to Narad's tricks?

If Narad had successfully turned thousands of sons of the wise caretaker of the world, i.e. Daksha Prajapati who was appointed by the creator Brahma himself expressly for the purpose of propagating this creation, away from their homes and become mendicants like himself (i.e. like Narad), forgetting about their duty towards their father who had ordered them to do Tapa to start the process of creation, what better can be expected from Narad in the case of Parvati who was also doing Tapa to marry Lord Shiva and start a home and a family?

So, Parvati must be aware of Narad's tricks and be careful in following him. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 60 and note no. 2 that is appended to it.

<sup>2</sup>The story of Daksha and his sons is narrated in (i) Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto 5, verse nos. 1-43, and (ii) Matsya Puran, Canto 5, verse nos. 4-12. The story in brief is as follows:--Daksha married the daughter of another Prajapati named Panchajan. From her he begot ten thousand sons who were jointly called 'Haryashva'. Perhaps the eldest one had this name, and all his siblings were known after him. {According to Matsya Puran, there were only a thousand sons, and not ten thousand.}

Since Daksha had a desire to expand his kingdom to all corners of the earth, he advised his sons to go and do Tapa (penance and austerity) to acquire the ability to populate the earth. They went to a place known as Narayansar where the river Sindhu meets the Arabian ocean. There they took their bath and started doing Tapa.

Sage Narad was on his wonderings, and coincidentally he came that way. Seeing these sons doing Tapa, he asked them the reason. When he learnt that they have decided to endure so much hardship to empower themselves to produce children who would fill all corners of the world, Narad thought that it was a waste of precious time and energy because the same effort could be devoted for attaining spiritual liberation and achieving nobler goals of life. So he decided to enlighten the sons about the futility of the exercise they were undertaking as it would only entangle their souls in the web of worldly affairs and trap them for eternity in the cycle of deeds and their effects. This Tapa could instead be used to give them eternal peace and bliss by way of liberation from this delusory world of falsehoods, illusionary charms and material entanglements that lead to nowhere, and which results in nothing but constant pain and misery instead of happiness, bliss and peace.

Narad approached them and said—'Have you seen the end of the earth? Without this knowledge, how do you know how many children you need to fill it, what is the size of your kingdom, and what resources you have? Even though you are the sons of Prajapati Daksha (who is supposed to be an expert of this knowledge because the word "Daksha" literally means one who is an expert of a subject and skilled in knowledge), it looks you are inept to handle the cosmic machine of the creator because one should not do anything without proper knowledge of its consequences. {That is, you don't know that you will be trapped in your own web if you start procreating and populating the world, that you will be sucked-in the quagmire of worldly miseries and worries once you start a large family, and then your soul will never find peace anywhere in life. A wise man does not do engage in doing Tapa for such a mundane and worldly thing as producing children. Tapa is a highly evolved spiritual exercise one should undertake to attain higher goals of life such as obtaining spiritual bliss and salvation that are not attainable by other ordinary means, and it should not be bartered for such worthless things as desiring sons and daughters, or for any other thing related to a material world that is perishable, a world that is full of pain and grief!

You don't have even the basic knowledge any learned man is expected to have. So how will you ever succeed in doing Tapa which is an extremely hazardous journey, and even if you do succeed you will not know how to judiciously use its eclectic rewards. It's like sitting on a dynamite power-keg which would blow you off if you are not careful.

Let me see. Do you know the answers of the following ten questions that would show you are wise and enlightened enough to be eligible to do Tapa? The questions are these: (i) Do you know that country where there is only one 'Purush' (Chief; Lord; Authority; Sovereign)? (ii) A 'hole' in which one can find a way to go in, but from which no one knows the way out? (iii) A 'river' that flows both ways—up and down (i.e. which rises to inundate high ground on one side of its bank, and undercuts the ground of the other side of its bank)? (iv) A 'house' made of 25 mysterious 'elements'? (v) A 'Swan' who speaks in a mysterious tongue? (vi) A self-rotating 'wheel' which has sharp serrated edges like that of a saw, which is as strong as the Vajra, the formidably hard material used to make the weapon of the king of gods known as Indra? (vii) A 'woman' who can assume countless forms? (viii) A 'Purush' (male) who is the 'husband of Punchaleek'? (ix) The 'end of the earth'? (x) And do you really know the 'meaning of your father's instructions'? If you do not know the correct answers of these questions, you are not competent to do Tapa.'

The sons of Daksha were taken aback. They huddled around the sage and contemplated upon the answers. After a lot of deliberations and discussions, the answer that came to their minds opened a flood-gate of true spiritual wisdom for them, filling them with renunciation and propelling them towards seeking spiritual liberation and deliverance by dropping off the desire to do Tapa to procreate and expand their families. Instead, they became renunciate mendicants who spent the rest of their lives in preaching and seeking self-realisation which led to their ultimate emancipation and salvation.

The answers to Narad's ten questions that dawned upon their mind and intellect after due diligent contemplation and concerted deliberations are summarised as follows—

(i) The 'ling-deha' (the gross physical body) is the country in which the only Purush (Authority) who resides to rule it as its sovereign is known as the 'Atma', the pure consciousness that is also called the individual's 'soul'.

The only 'Purush' or sovereign Authority in this creation is the Supreme Being known as "Ishwar" or Lord God. The rest of this creation is the city under his control.

(ii) The gross physical body of the creature is the symbolic 'hole' in which the Atma remains trapped for eternity if it does not make efforts to leave it and become free. It is easy for the Atma to enter a body, but once it does enter the latter it gets so entangled with the body that it forgets about its true independent identity, and instead begins to treat this body as its 'self'. Hence, it never sees an end to this hole as it remains perpetually 'holed' in it.

(iii) Ishwar is supreme and a witness to all. He is the most exalted and almighty. He is self-sustaining and a sustainer of the rest of this creation. The Atma is a miniscule form of this Ishwar who lives inside each individual as the individual's “self”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 117.

Once this enlightenment dawns on a person, he enters a state of internal bliss and obtains spiritual liberation from where there is no re-entering into the hole created by ignorance and delusions.

(iv) The ‘woman’ is the person’s own “Buddhi” (intellect) which can direct him in any direction it wishes. A man is subject to the whims of his intellect just like a man who is under the control of a woman.

(v) The “Maya” (delusions and its attendant ignorance, worldly attachments and desires) is the so-called ‘woman who changes colours and assumes many forms’. It is hard to recognise the true intentions of such a deceitful woman known as Maya. It is like a dancer who assumes so many postures and changes them so frequently that a man loses his bearings. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 116; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 117.

(vi) The ‘river with two banks and flowing both ways’ is the world of birth and death, the world that has two banks symbolised by a beginning and an end, the world that gives happiness as well as sorrows. On the one hand it gives the creature an opportunity to attain higher goals in life that provide him with happiness and bliss if he is careful, and on the other hand it can push him into the slush of miseries and pain and make him slide further down to the pit of hell. The river flowing upwards and well as downwards is a metaphor for this world having opposite characteristics.

(vii) The creature’s body made up of 25 elements is that mysterious ‘house’ in which the Purush (i.e. the pure consciousness known as the Atma representing the ‘self’ and the Supreme Being) lives. These 25 subtle elements are the building-blocks used to create this house. They are enumerated in the Upanishads as follows—

The Maha Upanishad of Sam Veda, in its Canto 1, verse nos. 4-6 gives a list of the twenty-five Tattvas in the specific sequence as follows—the five sense organs of perception (eye, ear, nose, tongue and skin) [these are the 1st five Tattvas] + the five sense organs of action (hand, leg, mouth, excretory and reproductive) [these are the 2nd five Tattvas] + one Mana (mind) [this is the 11th Tattva] + one Ahankar (pride and ego) [this is the 12th Tattva] + one Pran (vital airs or life-giving winds) [this is the 13th Tattva] + one Atma (consciousness) [this is the 14th Tattva] + one Buddhi (intellect) [this is the 15th Tattva] + the five Tanmatras (the five subtle senses of perception such as seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting and touching) [these are the 16th to 20th Tattvas] + the five primary elements called the Panch Bhuts (earth, water, fire, air and sky) [these form the 21st to 25th Tattvas] = total twenty five Tattvas. [5 + 5 + 1 + 1 + 1 + 1 + 1 + 5 + 5 = 25.]

Atharva Veda’s Narad Parivrajak Upanishad, Canto 6, verse no. 2, stanza no. 6 enumerates the twenty-five Tattvas as follows—“The subtle body has twenty-five components or parts or organs called the Tattvas (elements), and they are the following—the five perceptions (of smell, sight, hearing, taste and touch), the five faculties of action (accepting, going, speaking, sensual or sexual awareness and the desire to excrete or eliminate waste), the five Prans (i.e. the vital winds or airs that sustain life inside the body—Pran or breath, Apaana, Samaana, Vyan and Udaana), the five objects of perception (things seen, things heard, things smelt, things tasted and things felt), the four Antahakarans (i.e. the four aspects of the inner self which are Mana or mind, Buddhi or intellect, Chitta or sub-conscious, and Ahankar or ego), and one un-manifest Prakriti (or the latent, hidden but inherent nature and temperament of a creature). [Refer also to Mahopanishad, 1/4 – 6 of Sam Veda tradition.]”

The Shaarirako-panishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, in its verse no. 18-20, describes the twenty five elements of creation at the macro level of creation. To quote—“The five gross organs of perception present in the body such as the ear, skin, eye, tongue and nose make up the five gross units or elements of creation at the micro level of the body of the creature. [Total 5 organs of perception.]

Then there are the five organs of action such as the anus, genital, hand, leg and speech (mouth). These are the five gross organs which add their count to the number of elements or units or dimensions that exist in this creation at the micro level. [Total 5 organs of action.]

Besides these, there are the five subtle sense perceptions such as the perceptions of hearing (relevant to the ear), feeling or touching (relevant to the skin), seeing various forms and shapes (relevant to the eye and the faculty of sight), taste (relevant to the tongue) and smell (relevant to the nose). [Total 5 senses of perception.]

Thus the tally comes to twenty three elements of creation as follows—8 Vikaars<sup>1</sup> + 5 organs of perceptions<sup>2</sup> + 5 organs of action<sup>3</sup> + 5 senses of perceptions<sup>4</sup> = total 23 (18-19).

The twenty fourth element or unit or dimension of creation is said to be the invisible and un-manifest cosmic Nature. [This brings the tally to 23 + 1 = 24.]

And finally, there is the ultimate chief Authority of creation, called the supreme Purush, the Supreme Being, who forms the last unit of creation. This entity is immutable and indivisible, it is non-dual and eternal, it is infinite and imperishable, and it is all-pervading, all-incorporating and all-encompassing. Therefore there is nothing beyond it to count; it is the final frontier; there is nothing that exists beyond it that can be counted as an independent entity superseding the Chief Purush.

Thus we come to the total tally of twenty five elements. [The tally is arrived as follows—23 elements + 1 invisible and un-manifest cosmic Nature called Prakriti + 1 Supreme Being called Brahm or the Viraat Purush = total 25 elements.]

In this way, the entire universe or cosmos is made up of twenty five elements.”
 {1The eight Vikaars according to verse no. 17 of the Shaarirak Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, they are the following— They are the following—one Mana (mind) + one Buddhi (intellect) + one Ahankar (pride and arrogance) + one Akash element + one air element + one fire element + one water element + one earth element = total of eight elements that cast their shadow on the purity of Nature (just like the shadow of the earth casts its shadow on the bright moon to result in the lunar eclipse).

According to Sankhya Shastra, there are twenty-five fundamental Elements or Tattwas as follows—one Avyakta (the un-manifest entity known as Prakriti or cosmic Nature) + one Buddhi (intellect, wisdom, discrimination) + one Ahankar (the inherent ego and pride that is integral to all the creatures) + five Tanmatras (senses—sight, hearing, smell, touch and taste) + eleven organs (five organs of perception—eye, ear, nose, skin and tongue respectively + five organs of action—hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genital) + one Purush (the macrocosmic Consciousness; the cosmic Self or Atma or Soul; the Male aspect of creation; the Viraat Purush who is all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent, eternal, infinite, un-manifest and almighty Lord of creation; the macrocosmic gross body of creation).

There is another version as to what constitutes the twenty-five Tattvas. They are the following—Purush (the primal cosmic Male; the Viraat Purush), Prakriti (primal Nature), Mahtattva (the powerful Buddhi or intellect), Ahankar (ego, pride), the five organs of perception (i.e. the eye, nose, ear, tongue and skin), the five organs of action (i.e. the hand, leg, mouth, excretory and genitals), the Mana (mind), the five perceptions (such as the spoken word or speech, sight, smell, touch and taste), the five Bhuts (i.e. the five primary elements, the earth, water, fire, air and space or sky) = 25.

(viii) The ‘Swan’ that speaks in a mystical and mysterious language is the scripture that teaches a creature to become free from worldly delusions and see the path of truth and reality. The scriptures are compared to the Swan because this bird is believed to pick up only the best and the purest things to eat, lives in clean water, and is coloured white which is the colour of purity and holiness. The language the scriptures speak is ‘mystical and mysterious’ because it is difficult to understand them and their true intent. More often than not they are misinterpreted. And their teaching is also unconventional as they tend to pull the creature away from the entanglements of the material world that look so enticing and attractive on their face that anyone who says that the charms of the world would lead to pain and misery is deemed to be out of his senses.

(ix) The ‘self-rotating wheel’ is the “Kaal Chakra”, the wheel of time and destiny. This wheel keeps on rotating endlessly and sucks in everything that comes within its grasp, sparing none and compromising on nothing.

(x) The ‘father’ is the selfless scripture, and the ‘real meaning or the real intent of the orders’ of this father is to attain eternal peace, happiness and bliss. This is possible by self-realisation that comes by meditating upon ‘self’ and contemplating upon the truth and reality of creation and its various components. This will help the ‘son’, the creature, to attain eternal peace, happiness and bliss. Doing Tapa is one of the ways to attain this objective in life. It teaches the creature to practice exemplary self-restraint and austerity; it inculcates in him the desire to atone for his past sins by doing penance that purifies his inner-self and enables him to attain the higher state of existence at a transcendental plane of Consciousness.

Just as no loving father would want that his son should suffer and no father would give his son a wrong advice, the scriptures also do not misguide anyone. In other words, Narad advised the sons of Daksha that they should use the energy derived from Tapa for their spiritual well-being and upliftment because it would benefit them in every way, and they should not fritter away this opportunity by wasting their energy in gross activities as procreation and indulgence in worldly affairs.

The effect of this confabulation with Narad was so profound that these thousand sons of Daksha did Tapa but utilised its rewards for their spiritual upliftment. They renounced the material world and decided to become mendicants. They never went back to their homes and forgot about raising families and populating the world.

Now when their father Daksha came to know about all this, he became angry. But the creator Brahma, the father of Narad as well as of Daksha, intervened to pacify him. Brahma requested Daksha to try all over again.

Hence, Daksha once again produced another batch of a thousand sons named ‘Sablaashva’ from his wife, the daughter of Panchajanya. Like his earlier sons, Daksha advised these sons to go and do Tapa to get themselves empowered to populate the earth. These sons were also preached by Narad in the same way as he had done to the first batch of Daksha’s sons. The ‘Sablaashva’ sons too renounced the world and became mendicants.

This time Daksha was furious. He cursed Narad that he would never be able to marry and settle down to raise a family and enjoy its comforts and pleasures, and that he would always remain wondering from place to place in the 3 Lokas (worlds) like a friar or mendicant or hermit. {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto 5, verse no. 43.}

The second part of the story is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto 6. In its verse nos. 1-3 it is narrated that Daksha Prajapati begot sixty daughters from his wife named ‘Asikni’. These daughters were married off to different Rishis (ancient sages), and their children then populated the world. Out of the sixty daughters, ten were married to Dharma, thirteen to sage Kashyap, twenty-seven to the Moon God, two each to Bhut, Angiraa and Krishaashva, and the remaining four daughters to Taaksharya (serpent).

The rest of this Canto no. 6, verse nos. 4-45 then goes on to describe in detail the names of these sixty daughters of Daksha Prajapati and the huge families they produced which finally populated the entire earth.]

चित्रकेतु कर घरु उन घाला । कनककसिपु कर पुनि अस हाला ॥ २ ॥

citrakētu kara gharu una ghālā. kanakakasipu kara puni asa hālā. 2.

Similarly, Narad had ruined the household of Chitraketu<sup>1</sup>, and the fate of Kanakakshipu was no better<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—The Sapt-rishis cite two more instances to persuade Parvati to not follow Narad’s advice. One was related to the story of king ‘Chitraketu’, and the other to Prahalad, the son of Hiranayakashipu who was also known as ‘Kanakakshipu’.

Chitraketu was the sovereign of the country called Shursen. It is believed that he had 1 crore [1 crore = 10 million] queens, but no children. One day sage Angiraa came to his court. The king reverentially welcomed the sage. After formalities were over, the sage asked the king why he looked so worried and gloomy. The king replied that he has no sons (heirs) and it is causing him immense distress. He asked the sage if there is a solution for it.

Sage Angiraa organised a son-begetting fire sacrifice, and at the end of the rituals he told the eldest and the best queen of Chitraketu, named Krit-duti, to eat the remaining part of the sacrificial pudding as sanctified food that was especially empowered by relevant Mantras of the deity known as ‘Twastaa’, the deity which fulfils all desires and gives contentedness to the worshipper. The sage told the king that with this empowered food, he will beget a son, but this son will be the cause of his happiness as well as sorrows. Then the sage went away.

When the son was born, the king donated liberally. Since Krit-duti, his eldest queen, had borne a son, the king began to give her preferential treatment which created jealousy among his other queens. Once when the child was asleep and the mother was engaged in some household affair, the jealous step-mothers put some kind of poison on his lips because of which the boy died.

For quite some time, the child's mother was unaware of his death. When she sent an attendant to bring the child to her, the latter fainted when she saw the boy dead on his couch. Both the parents, the king and the queen, were overcome with grief.

Just at that moment, sages Angiraa and Narad came there disguised as mendicants. They consoled the king by saying—‘Why do you grieve? Think who this boy was for whom you lament so much. Think: what relationship this boy has with you; who were you of this boy in his previous life, and would be in his next life. Even as grains of sand flow in a river and collect to form big mounds at remote places from the place of their origin, a creature trapped in the endlessly rotating wheel of Kaal and Karma (time and deeds) is born and reborn in the endless cycle of birth and death as this wheel turns. This naturally causes a continuous cycle of union and separation.

Just as some of the seeds produce fruits (trees) and some don't, the influence of Maya (delusions) creates a sense of a happy union and a sorrowful separation between two independent individuals. Just like the grains of dust or sand coming together or parting away as they flow with the current of water in a river, the individuals come together or move away as they flow in the current of the river of Kaal (time and circumstance) and Karma (deeds and their effects).

All such relationships are transitory and illusory; nothing is permanent. Why do you grieve; why and for whom do you lament? I, you and the rest of the creatures of this world were not in their previous birth as they are now, and nor will they be after their death at the end of this life.’ {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto 15, verse no. 108.}

The king was consoled and enlightenment dawned on his mental horizon. He wiped his tears and asked the mendicants who they were. Indeed you are highly enlightened and wise, and it is so fortunate that great souls like you wonder in this world to console ordinary people like us when they are submerged in a dark ocean of grief and sorrows, and provide them mental peace, succour and solace.’

Then sage Angiraa revealed the true identity of himself and Narad, and told king Chitraketu—‘You are a devotee of the Lord and wise, therefore it is not proper for you to feel as sorrowful as it seems you are for such mundane worldly affairs as losing a son with whom your soul has no relationship. When I visited you last time I found that it was fruitless to preach you the profound philosophy of spiritualism and metaphysics because you had still not tasted the bitter fruit of worldly attachments and involvements. So I agreed to give you a son so that you can have a first-hand experience of how miserable is this world and how miserable life becomes once one gets entangled in its affairs—such as first raising a family, then spending the entire rest of the life caring for it, and even at the final moments just before death worrying about it and the things left undone. That is, once you allow yourself to get entangled in worldly relations and developing a fallacious notion that such and such person is my son, my daughter or my family, you get sucked in a vortex of eternal misery and grief. Whatever happiness and comfort you do get are all transitory as well as illusory by their inherent nature because in the long run they only give pain, grief and unhappiness.

A home, a family, a wife and a son, wealth and worldly prosperity—all are transient, imaginary, and give nothing but misery and grief in the long run. All things related to this material world are as transient and hollow as the world, which forms their basis, is.

Hence, be at peace with yourself; don't allow yourself to be trapped in a mirage.'

After this, Narad preached the Mantro-panishad to the king, and advised him to faithfully recite it (i.e. contemplate upon its meaning and try to understand its subtle spiritual implications; not just read it mechanically) for seven days at the end of which Lord Sankarshan would reveal himself before him.

Then Narad decided to further enlighten the king about what sage Angiraa spoke above. So he told the Spirit of the son whose body was lying on the ground, 'Oh Jivatma (the pure conscious Soul of the living being)! Look at the way the king, the queen and others are grieving for you. Re-enter your body which is lying on the ground to provide them mental peace; live upto your duties and expectations in this world. Provide comfort to your so-called father, and sit on the throne as ordered by him because once you have entered the body which the world recognises as being that of the king's son, you must live to fulfil your moral obligations as ordained by the Creator.'

The son woke up as from a deep sleep. He said—'I have been wondering in countless lives in different worlds, assuming countless forms and having as many relationships, according to the deeds I had done in my previous births. Who is anybody's parent or child? In some birth these people may have been my children, and in others I was their child. I had been a child of so many faceless and unknown creatures in my previous lives on the one hand, and had parented so many of them in my other lives on the other hand. Everyone is someone's parent, child, friend, foe, partner, servant or lord in one or the other birth.

So, how do these people think that I am their child and grieve for me; it is not possible that I was their greatest enemy in my previous life where they simply loathed me?

Just as gold, silver and other commodities keep changing hands amongst the traders, the Jivatma keeps on changing relationships in every new birth depending upon the obligations it had incurred during the course of its previous life just like an accountant carries forward the credit or the debit balances from the previous accounting year to the next. Till the time two individual Jivatmas are together, they have some relationship with each other. Once they separate, this relationship vanishes like a bubble of water.

[The gold or silver remains the same, only the person who holds control over them for a certain period of time changes. For a given period of time, the gold belongs to a certain person named "A", and then it changes hand to belong to another person named "B". As long as "A" has this gold, he loves it as his asset and cares for it. Once the same piece of gold goes to "B", the first person loses interest in it.]

The Atma (Soul; the pure Consciousness that is the real 'self' of all living beings as opposed to their gross body) is eternal and independent; it is subtle and sublime; it is self-illuminated and without any relationships. ....' {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Cantos. 14-15; Canto 16, verse nos. 1-11.}

After this initial enlightening discourse, the Jivatma said—'Listen, I will tell you about my previous life. I was a king of a country called Paanchaal. I had developed a sense of profound detachment and renunciation. I had once gone to a village. This lady who has become my 'mother' in this birth had given me some dry cakes made from cowdung to light up a fire to cook my meal because I was feeling hungry. These cakes had a large colony of black ants. I did not pay much attention and set these cakes on fire to cook my meal, as a result of which all the ants died. I cooked my frugal meal and after offering it to Shaligram (a pebble-like stone worshipped as a symbol of Lord Vishnu), I ate the food. The ants which died have become my step-mothers in this life. They wished to take revenge upon me, and therefore they killed me by poisoning. Since the food cooked by burning the cowdung cake infested with ants was duly offered to Lord Vishnu before I ate it, and since I had done it without any knowledge of killing of the ants, my sin was not so serious and its after-effects were reduced substantially. Hence, all those ants got together as my step-mothers to kill me in one go (i.e. only once) in this life. Otherwise, I would have had to suffer in thousands of more births.

I have fulfilled my obligations; I have repaid for my sins. I have nothing to do with these people any more. [My ‘mother’ gave me happiness by providing the cowdung cakes so that I could cook and satisfy my hunger. So I repaid my debts to her by giving her the joys a mother yearns for by becoming her child. Similarly, I repaid my debts to the ants by giving pleasures to these step-mothers who avenged my past mistake of killing them all in their previous life as ants.]

Saying this, the Jivatma left the body permanently. King Chitraketu was stunned and enlightened at the same time. He renounced the world and left home. Sage Narad gave him the Mantra of Lord Sankarshan (Vishnu), and advised him to pray to the Lord by offering hymns to him. When the king did Japa with this Mantra (i.e. repeated the Mantra) for seven days with devotion, he had a vision of Lord Seshnath, the celestial serpent on whose coiled back Lord Vishnu reclines on the ocean of milk in the heaven. King Chitraketu was given an air-vehicle on which he used to roam in the sky. Once he was cursed by Parvati, as a result of which he became the demon named Vrittasur. {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto nos. 9-12.}

<sup>2</sup>The reference to “Kanakashipu”—This is the story of Prahalad, the son of the demon Hiranyakashapu. The entire episode is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 7, Cantos 3—9.

When Prahalad was still in his mother’s womb, sage Narad had taught her about the principles of spiritualism and devotion for Lord Vishnu. {Refer: Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 7, Canto 7, verse nos. 15-55.}

Prahalad’s father was a demon and a sworn enemy of Vishnu. This led to bitterness between the son and the father. Hiranyakashapu never derived any pleasure and peace one expects from having a son. On the contrary, his son was a source of perpetual pain for him. It was his son Prahalad that ultimately led to Hiranyakashapu’s death when Lord Vishnu revealed himself as half-man and half-lion, an incarnation known as “Narsingh”, to slay Prahalad’s father because the latter was tormenting his son, a devotee of Lord Vishnu, and had even tried to kill him with a sword.

The idea behind the Sapta-rishis citing these two instances was to persuade Parvati not to heed Narad’s advice as it always led to family discord. Remember: The Sapta-rishis were tasked by Lord Shiva to test the level of devotion that Parvati had for the Lord, to see if she is fickle minded or has firm determination. So, the Sapta-rishis hit at the very root of Parvati’s conviction in order to test her determination by telling her that if she followed Narad’s advice she is bound to suffer like Chitraketu and Hiranyakashapu.]

नारद सिख जे सुनहिं नर नारी । अवसि होहिं तजि भवनु भिखारी ॥ ३ ॥
मन कपटी तन सज्जन चीन्हा । आपु सरिस सबही चह कीन्हा ॥ ४ ॥

nārada sikha jē sunahim nara nārī. avasi hōhim taji bhavanu bhikhārī. 3.
mana kapaṭī tana sajjana cīnhā. āpu sarisa sabahī caha kīnhā. 4.

[The Sapta-rishis continued to admonish Parvati and tried to sway her decision of firmly following the path advised by sage Narad—‘that she should do Tapa to request the Supreme Lord to grant her the boon of marrying Shiva as the latter was her eternal husband’. To achieve this aim, the Sapta-rishis derided Narad and told Parvati that anyone who had believed him and followed the path showed by him had been deprived of his home and hearth; they had to leave the comfort of their homes to spend the rest of their lives begging for food like wondering mendicants. So, what happiness does she expect by following Narad’s advice? It’s insane to do so.]

‘Any man or woman who pays attention to the advice of Narad is sure to leave his or her home to become a beggar (i.e. a mendicant who begs for food). [In other words, it is insane for you to believe that if you do as Narad had advised you, you will get happiness in life. You want to marry and settle down with your husband in a home. This is not possible if you do as Narad has told you for the simple reason that whosoever followed his advice had become homeless. They had become mendicants and hermits who had to beg even for the basic requirement of food to feed themselves, let alone derive comfort of a happy married life which you aim to achieve.] (3)

His (Narad’s) Mana (heart and mind) is full of deceit though he looks so saintly from his external appearances. Indeed, he wishes everyone to become one like him<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This statement has two connotations—(i) On the face of it this means that Narad is so wicked that he wants everyone to become wondering mendicants as he himself is. He does not want others to enjoy the comforts of a homely life; he is jealous of others. (ii) But the other meaning is the real substance of this statement: it means that Narad wants the creature to find liberation for his soul from the entangling web of this world. Narad is not jealous of anyone’s happiness and comfort, but he wants that the creature’s happiness and peace is not limited to being superficial and transient but that it should be permanent and real. This is possible only when the creature frees himself from the entanglement of this material world of countless contradictions, and instead of pursuing this world the creature pursues the path of spiritual enlightenment and self-realisation that leads to liberation and deliverance for his soul, his Atma. Whereas pursuing the world would give him only transient happiness and illusive peace, pursuing the path of self-realisation and enlightenment would bestow upon him eternal happiness and peace of the highest kind.

It’s such an irony that a great and pious sage of an immaculate character and noble intentions as Narad is accused repeatedly of being deceitful and wicked. Even Parvati’s mother has vehemently accused Narad of spoiling the life of her daughter by advising her to do Tapa for such an odd husband as Lord Shiva—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha no. 97.

Even in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 6, Canto 5, verse no. 36 we read that Daksha has also accused Narad of the same things as the Sapta-rishis have alleged here—that “Narad assumes the external form of a holy man but is wicked internally, wishing bad of everyone.”]

तेहि कें बचन मानि बिस्वासा । तुम्ह चाहहु पति सहज उदासा ॥ ५ ॥

 pañca kahēm̃ sivam̃ satī bibāhī. puni avaḍēri marā'ēnhi tāhī. 8.

It is such an irony that you have believed such a (dubious) sage and have relied upon his words to wish to have a husband who is by nature dispassionate and disinterested in worldly affairs (such as marrying and raising a family, or seeking comforts and pleasures associated with a householder's life)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Now, the Sapta-risihis sort of exaggerate the perceived negativities in the character of Lord Shiva in an attempt to see if this sways Parvati's resolve to devote her life to the Lord, and to examine whether she demurs and gives a second thought to her decision to marry Shiva after learning about his superficial drawbacks<sup>2</sup>.]

He is 'Nirguna' (i.e. has no worthwhile quality)<sup>3</sup>, he is 'Nirlajja' (has no shame or does not feel guilty for the way of life he leads)<sup>4</sup>, he has a weird appearance and wears a garland of skulls, he has no family line ("Akul"; has no parents and ancestors)<sup>5</sup>, he has no home and therefore no designated place where he could be found for sure ("Ageha")<sup>6</sup>, he remains naked ("Digambar")<sup>7</sup>, and has serpents wrapped around his body ("Vyaali")<sup>8</sup>. (6)

Tell us, what comfort or happiness does one expect to get by marrying such a groom? It is such a foolish thing for you to be misled by the advice of an imposter (Narad)<sup>9</sup>! (7)

Lord Shiva had first married Sati at the instance of some friends (i.e. his compatriots, the gods)<sup>10</sup>, but later on he had manouvered things in such a way that Sati had to kill herself. [This refers to Parvati's earlier life in which she had died by burning in the fire of Yoga at her father's place.]<sup>11</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a reference to Lord Shiva who is a renunciate God not interested in mundane affairs of life, who lives like a mendicant or an ascetic who prefers to remain submerged in deep mediation for most of the time, who remains aloof from all material pleasures and indifferent to all worldly attachments, who has no home per-se and lives on the snow-covered peaks of Mt.Kailash, who wonders alone in cremation grounds trying to provide liberation and deliverance to the soul of the dead by uttering the holy and divine name of Lord Ram in the latter's ears, and so on and so forth. In short, Lord Shiva whom Parvati wants to marry is not at all fit to become a husband of a lady who wishes to establish a home and live a peaceful life as a householder.

<sup>2</sup>For a self-realised and enlightened person who has tasted the nectar of eternal bliss and peace obtained by maintaining a safe distance from the turbulent world, whether he is an immortal god or an ordinary mortal creature, remaining aloof from involvement with the world and renouncing any links with it comes naturally—because such renunciation and detachment gives him his peace of mind and bliss of heart. Since getting tied in the bond of marriage sucks a person in the whirlpool of worldly responsibilities and obligations from which, once accepted, it is difficult to get out, a self-realised and spiritually enlightened person would always strive to avoid this shackle and would prefer to remain free as a sky-borne bird.

The Atma is like a free bird that wishes to remain free from any bondage, whilst the bond of marriage is like the same bird being caged for life.

The character traits that are considered as negative or shortcomings in Shiva's character appear to be so when one views them from the perspective of the world and how it judges someone. The gross world regards possession of material things and enjoying them as positive signs of success and a healthy mind that thinks of material growth, development, enhancement and expansion. But the world forgets that all things that are related to the sense organs of the gross body are as transient and perishable as the body and the world itself in which the body lives. The world and its physical charms are like the mirage of a dry desert that pulls a thirsty person toward itself only to lead him to his death because there is no water in that mirage.

Similarly, imagining peace, happiness, joy, pleasure and comfort in the world and its material things is as foolish as trying to find water in the desert mirage. Only a few who are self-realised and exceptionally wise and enlightened strive to rise above the grossness of the world and attain a level of exalted existence, but for this to happen, for this noble aim to be realised they have to distance themselves from the world, become detached from it and renounce its illusionary charms and comforts.

Lord Shiva is one such god. Being the Lord in-charge of death, he has witnessed the pain associated with life in this world, and how a creature feels unfulfilled at the end of his life in spite of his having gained every possible successes in life. Shiva sees that even those who claimed the highest degree of achievement and success in this world do not find peace at the time of death. They have to take a new birth because they are trapped in the wheel of Karma, the wheel that traps a creature's Atma or soul in an endless cycle of birth and death depending on the deeds he or she does in previous life. On the other hand, those who had realised the futility of worldly pursuit and had spent their time in introspection and self-realisation find peace at the time of death; they have no desires left to be fulfilled and they die peacefully and happily.

Having realised that there is no pith in this world, that the gross physical world of material sense objects does not give any kind of sustainable happiness, joy, comfort, peace and bliss, Lord Shiva had decided to keep a safe distance from it. Rather he prefers to remain submerged in the ocean of eternal bliss that comes by meditation and contemplation, by remaining aloof from the turmoil of the surrounding world and maintaining internal calm and poise. This is possible only when one voluntarily abstains from getting sucked in the quagmire known as the world. And for this freedom to be maintained it is necessary to avoid all kinds of shackles and bonds that come on their own, even uninvited, once one marries and allows himself to be involved in the affairs of the gross world that is engaged in an endless cycle of procreation and death, a world where needs and desires have no end, and where one success, achievement or acquisition stokes the fire for newer and more of such things.

<sup>3</sup>The word “Nirguna” means without any attributes. The supreme Brahm, the Supreme Being, is said to be “Nirguna” by the scriptures such as the Upanishads because he possesses all the attributes that exist in this creation, which nullify or neutralise each other to render Brahm a neutral entity. It is like the case of an “Atom” which is neutral from the outside because it’s negatively and positively charged particles, the electrons and the protons, cancel each other out to produce a neutral Atom.

But does this neutrality of the Atom mean that it is powerless and impotent? Who in this modern world not knows the stupendous power of ‘Atomic energy’ and its astounding potentials? Similarly, though Brahm is a neutral entity, its powers are so immense that not only has Brahm unleashed the genie known as this creation but expertly handles its affairs and exercises full control over it.

Lord Shiva is not an ordinary god, but Brahm personified; he is a “Maha-Deva”, the ‘Great God’.

The word itself briefly means the eclectic, glorious and beautiful virtues of truthfulness, purity, auspiciousness, wisdom, enlightenment, erudition, sagacity, blissfulness, dispassion, detachment, holiness and divinity. These are accompanied by a high degree of peace, tranquility, serenity, and their attendant happiness, joy and bliss. Since ‘truthfulness and auspiciousness’ are qualities that are beautiful, this word also means something that is beautiful and beyond reproach.

Briefly therefore, the word ‘Shiva’ means ‘one who is auspicious, always pure, holy, divine, truthful, beautiful and blissful’. Shiva is the Lord who is self-realised and a personified form of the cosmic Consciousness and the Absolute Truth.

The Maho-panishad of Sam Veda tradition, in its Canto 1, verse no. 7 describes that Shiva was born from the forehead of the Viraat Purush, the macrocosmic, invisible and all-inclusive gross body of Brahm, the Supreme Being.

The Panch Brahm Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, verse no. 41 espouses that Shiva lives in the heart of the creature as an embodiment of ‘Sat-Chit-Anand’, i.e. as his Atma—“Shiva, as Sat-Chit-Anand personified, always lives in the heart. He is a constant witness of all that is happening. That is why the heart is regarded as the doorway to liberation and deliverance from the traps that have been laid out by this delusory and cunning world of artificiality to ensnare the creature in its tentacles.”

The Bhasma Jabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition was preached by Lord Shiva himself to sage Jabal Bhusund, and it highlights the fact that Lord Shiva is no ordinary God, or even a senior one being a member of the Trinity of Gods consisting of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Rudra the concluder, but is the supreme transcendental Brahm himself personified. Shiva is the Supreme Being himself. Refer Bhasma Jabal Upanishad, Canto 1, paragraph no. 1; Canto 2, paragraph no. 3, 6-8.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse nos. 10, 14 assert that Shiva is the creator of everything in this creation, and Canto 1, verse no. 13 says that Shiva represents the creation itself much like Brahm, the Supreme Being who is also treated as being an embodiment of the entire creation.

<sup>4</sup>Lord Shiva is not at all ashamed of the way he lives because he knows that he is following the Truth and the call of his inner-self that gives him eternal peace, happiness and bliss, and that he is fortunate not to have been misled by the illusive charms of the material world. He is proud of his renunciate way of life instead of feeling guilty and ashamed of it.

<sup>5</sup>Only a living being who has a gross physical body has a parent. One who has no physical body does not have a parent. The parent is the one who gives shape to the gross physical body of the living organism, while the Atma or the soul that lives inside this body of the organism is independent of the parent.

Shiva is not a god with a physical body, but the eternal and pure cosmic Consciousness that is known variously as the Atma or the Soul, or even as Brahm. The Atma is pure Consciousness that has no beginning or end. That is Lord Shiva, who is a personified form of cosmic Consciousness, is also eternal and imperishable. The entire creation has its origin in Brahm represented by Shiva, and it is not vice versa. This being the case, Shiva has no parent from whom his origin can be traced in the conventional sense. Only mortal beings who have a gross body can trace their origin to a parent who gives birth to the body that the world recognises as a particular creature. But the Atma or the pure conscious soul of the living being that lives in his gross body is not created by any of the parents. Shiva represents this element known as the 'Atma' which is not related to anyone, and is not created by anyone for the simple reason that it is an eternal and imperishable entity that was present before this creation came into being, and will be there after this creation.

<sup>6</sup>Lord Shiva is said to be "Ageha"—i.e. he has no known or certain home, and there it is difficult to know where he is or how to access him.

It will be very easy to understand this aspect of Shiva if one understands that "Shiva" represents the essential element known as the "Consciousness" of this creation. This element is subtle and sublime; it is uniformly distributed throughout the creation, and there is no place where it is not present. So it is very difficult to say that Shiva ("Consciousness") is present or not present here or there in any certain term. Remember: The scriptures have unanimously declared that Brahm (Shiva) is 'Neti-Neti', i.e. 'not this not that'. Therefore, it is unwise to delineate any specific place as the habitat of Shiva. He lives in the form of the 'Truth' everywhere; he lives as the 'Atma' everywhere.

The elements of 'Truth' and the 'Atma' are so unique by their inherent nature that while for some they are easily accessible, for others they defy understanding. That is, they are "Ageha"—not known, understandable or accessible easily.

<sup>7</sup>The Yogtattva Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, in its verse nos. 98-102 says that Shiva is the patron deity and personification of the sky element. Since Shiva represents Brahm who is attributeless, all-pervading and all-encompassing, an entity that is uniformly present in this creation, enclosing the entire creation from the outside and at the same time permeating in each of its pore, the only element that is the nearest analogue to it is the 'sky element'.

Remaining "naked" is a metaphoric way of saying that Shiva has nothing to conceal, that he wears the sky as his garment. A true ascetic also lives in this way as he has nothing to hide from the world and he has no possession to conceal from theft.

<sup>8</sup>Refer also to "Parvati Mangal", verse nos. 49, 51, 53-56 which says exactly a similar thing.

The Yogtattva Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, in its verse nos. 92-94 says that Lord Shiva, in his form as Rudra, is the patron deity and personification of the fire element, and it is no wonder then that he is surrounded by 'fire-spitting' serpents as a symbolism of this fact.

The Dakshin Murti Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, in its verse nos. 8, 10, 13, 15 and 19 affirms that Shiva is invariably wrapped by serpents.

The significance of the serpents wrapped around his body—The snakes that are wrapped around Lord Shiva show that he is beyond the power of death and poison.

These coiled serpents around his body indicate the fact that he constantly reminds himself of imminent death, because serpents are very poisonous and symbolise immediate death. They also remind him about the unholy and poisonous nature of the gross world. This helps him to remain focused on his spiritual aim of self-realisation instead of being attracted by the material charms of this material world of sense objects and getting deluded by them.

The serpents also signify that Shiva is the Lord of death; he is death personified. Since he is able to wrap the serpents around his body and they cannot harm him, it indicates the fact that he has conquered death. That is why he is called 'Mrityunjay', the conqueror of death.

Again, the coiled serpents represent the 'Kundalini', the coiled subtle cosmic energy center at the base of the spine which when activated can entitle the spiritual aspirant to experience a burst of stupendous spiritual energy which provides him a glimpse of his own divine powers as well as the powers of the cosmic Consciousness present inside his bosom as his Atma. This Kundalini is activated by doing numerous Yoga exercises as described in the Upanishads on the subject of Yoga.

The coiled serpents may also represent cycles of time in the macrocosm and the basic energy of life in the microcosm in the form of sexual energy.

These reptiles are very ferocious, dangerous, poisonous, and a symbol of male potency. The symbolism is that Shiva is a very potent God who can be extremely ruthless and unforgiving towards sinful creatures. He has exercised extreme self control and has 'girdled' or readied himself in preparation for enduring the greatest of hardships and sufferance for self-realisation as well as to provide the world with liberation and deliverance. The serpents warn his enemies not to fool around with him. That is also why he has fire in one of his hands. This fire signifies his ability to reduce to ashes the entire physical world consisting of falsehood and sins as well as eliminate all impurities, imperfections, faults and shortcomings that cripple the creature's spiritual well being.

<sup>9</sup>Narad has been called an 'imposter'—a "Thug"—by the Sapta-rishis to impress upon Parvati that she thinks he is a saint because of his external features and clothes, but she is not aware how he acts as a spoil-sport for all who want to fall in the trap of worldly affairs. Parvati has done severe Tapa, and instead of seeking spiritual liberation, deliverance, salvation and emancipation, she seeks to get entangled in relationships by getting married. Marriage is certainly a shackle for the creature as it forces him or her into a bond and its associated obligations and responsibilities that later on it becomes virtually impossible to break free. It is like bartering eternal freedom and its inherent peace and happiness for imaginary comfort and pleasure that comes with marriage.

This statement has a double meaning—on the face of it the statement seems to be highly derogatory for Narad and scorns at him, but when looked deeply it means that Narad is so holy, pious and noble that in spite of inviting ridicule and scorn he continues to do his moral duty of pulling away the creature from falling into the vicious whirlpool of worldly entanglements, and instead showing him the path that would give eternal peace and happiness that comes by having devotion for Lord God and by renouncing all attachments with this gross material world.

<sup>10</sup>Shiva was not at all interested in marrying. It was on the insistence of Brahma the creator and other gods that he had consented to marry Sati, the daughter of Daksha Prajapati. This story is narrated in Padma Puran, Sristi Khanda, Canto 24. It was narrated by sage Pulastya to Bhishma as follows—

In some ancient time, the entire creation consisting of different worlds such as the Bhuloka (earth), the Bhurvaloka (the sky), the Swargaloka (the heaven), and Maharloka (the nether world) came to an end by being burnt. At that time, the essential life-forces of all living beings, i.e. their individual Atma or soul, got together into a single entity known as the cosmic Atma and went to take rest in the heart of Lord Vishnu who was none but the “Viraat Purush”, the cosmic form of the Supreme Being who is the final resting place for all the creatures.

After the ‘cooling-off period’ when the time came for reactivating the process of creation (because creation and destruction is an endless cycle for the simple reason that the energy of one creation does not vanish but re-emerges in another form and at another time according to the principle that “energy can change form but never vanish”; the ‘energy’ here refers to the cosmic Consciousness that is an eternal non-perishable power-house of all life in this universe), two primary entities first emerged—(i) one was the “Purush” (the positive charge or aspect of the cosmic energy that was represented by the ‘cosmic Male’), and (ii) the other was the “Prakriti” (the negative charge or aspect of the cosmic energy that was represented by the ‘cosmic Female’).

The “Purush” and the “Prakriti” were two faces of Brahm, the cosmic Consciousness from which the creation would emerge.

These two opposing factors neutralized each other when they were in the form of their primary aspect of Brahm, but when they were separated as “Purush” and “Prakriti” and brought together, a third element emerged. This was known as “Ahankar” (pride in one’s ability to do something). That is, now they (Purush + Prakriti) thought they could together ‘do’ something that was extraordinary, and ‘achieve’ something stupendous and astounding.

Thus, the primarily neutral Brahm now had become tainted with ‘Ahankar’, leading him to fall in the quagmire known as “Sristi” or creation which was nothing but the ‘creation’ of his own mind that thought that it ‘can do this and that’.

If something is created, it must be sustained and looked after. This cosmic need translated into the formation of Brahma the creator, and Vishnu the sustainer. [In other words, these two primary and senior gods were actually the same Brahm assuming two functions of creation in two distinct forms—one was to ‘create’ in the form of Brahma, and the other was to ‘sustain’ what has been created in the form of Vishnu.]

These two entities developed competitive attitude and were jealous of each other. They competed with each other—‘let’s see who produces a creation first and who would successfully populate the world below, i.e. the earth’. [Remember: This is how and why the world that would eventually come into being had these attributes firmly ingrained in its psyche—having pride, competition and envy.]

Since Vishnu is regarded as the first and foremost form of Brahm (the Supreme Being; the cosmic Soul) in his cosmic form known as the “Viraat Purush” (literally meaning a vast and colossal form of the Supreme Being that encompasses everything in creation), all these developments created a lot of agitation in his heart. This agitation literally heated his heart where the ‘souls of all the creatures of the previous creation, which had joined together to form one composite mass, had come to take rest'. In other words, the souls of all these creatures had merged with the soul of Vishnu to become one with it and indistinguishable from it. In fact, this is the metaphysical philosophy of the destiny of the individual soul of all living beings—that they would ultimately find rest when they merge with the primary Soul of creation.

The heat generated in the agitated Vishnu's heart caused the ignition of a fire with bright yellow flames like the raging fire of a furnace. This resulted in the melting of the combined souls of the creatures of the previous creation. This melted matter began to flow downwards towards the earth and was about to land on it (in order to 'seed' the earth with the first elements of life represented by the 'soul') when Brahma's son known as Daksha held the flowing liquid in the sky itself before it could actually touch the surface of the earth, and then drank it.

Since this divine liquid which Daksha drank was empowered to 'create life', he begot a daughter with a body as beautiful and charming as a blue lotus. The reason was that Vishnu, from whom this liquid emerged, too had a body as charming as a blue-coloured lotus flower. In other words, the daughter of Daksha bore the genes of Lord Vishnu and had inherited the latter's character. This daughter was known as "Lalitaa".

[The 'blue colour' represented the sky element, and indicated that Lord Vishnu is indeed the Viraat Purush who not only pervades the entire creation but also harbours this creation in his body like the 'sky' which not only fills the entire space of this creation, but the creation itself is lodged in the bosom of the sky.]

Daksha then married Lalitaa, who had a body like a 'blue-lotus', to Lord Neel-Kantha (Shiva) because his features—"blue throat"—matched with the bride. This marriage was formalized on the day of Chaitra Shukla Tritiyaa (i.e. the 3rd day of the bright half of the 1st lunar month of the Hindu calendar, which is roughly March-April).

According to 'Kalika-Puran', when the time of creation arrived, both Brahma (creator) and Vishnu (sustainer) started making efforts in this direction by coordinating their efforts and invoking their own 'Shaktis' (dynamic powers). But the third god of the Trinity, i.e. Lord Shiva, took no interest and continued to remain submerged in the bliss obtained by meditation. Seeing that Shiva is disinterested, Brahma motivated his son Daksha to pray to Lord Vishnu so that the latter gives his "Maya" (delusion creating powers) personified as a maiden to him (Daksha) as his daughter.

As the name suggests, this daughter, who was a personified form of "Maya" (delusions), was successful in casting a spell of magical charm on Shiva's mind and heart that for once the Lord fell for the trap and gave his consent to marry her when he saw her outstanding beauty, and also because she had done Tapa to have him as her husband.

The fact that it was on the insistence of Brahma and others that Daksha married his daughter Sati to Shiva is reiterated by Daksha himself in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 4, Canto 2, verse no. 17.

This facet of the story is also reiterated in Skanda Puran, Maheshwar Khanda, Canto 1.

<sup>11</sup>This entire episode of Sati killing herself and the reason for it has already been narrated earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.

This is very interesting. In a subtle way, the Sapta-rishis are reminding Parvati about her previous life and the fact that she had asked Lord Hari at the time of her death to grant her a boon that she remains devoted to Lord Shiva even in her new life—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65. Therefore, she is being warned not to deviate from her chosen path inspite of all the nonsense the Sapta-rishis are saying. It was also to give her a hint that whatever they are saying is wrong because she was well aware that the cause of her death as Sati was not due to any machinations of Shiva but her own fault. She had realised her mistake even as Sati, and wished to atone for it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 54; (ii) Doha no. 57 along with its following Chaupai line nos. 1-4; and (iii) from Doha no. 58—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 60.

Well, as we read on we shall discover that Parvati had caught this hint, and so she remained steadfast on her vows of marrying Shiva inspite of these seven sages trying their best to dilute her determination. She rejects all their contentions and arguments and tells them to scoot from there.]

दो०. अब सुख सोवत सोचु नहिं भीख मागि भव खाहिं ।
सहज एकाकिन्ह के भवन कबहुँ कि नारि खटाहिं ॥ ७९ ॥
dōhā.

aba sukha sōvata sōcu nahim̐ bhīkha māgi bhava khāhim̐.
sahaja ēkākinha kē bhavana kabahum̐ ki nāri khaṭāhim̐. 79.

Now he (Lord Shiva) sleeps peacefully without any regrets or worries (with reference to what has been said in verse no. 8 herein above). He begs for food and eats the whole mortal world as his meal (a reference to the fact that Lord Shiva is the God of the Trinity who is responsible for conclusion of creation, being the patron god of death).

Say, can a woman ever find a right place to live in the home of someone who is inherently single and prefers to live alone, shunning all company? (Doha no. 79)

[Note—A similar narration is given in Shiva Puran, 2/3/25/50-51.

Refer also to “Parvati Mangal”, verse no. 50.

In Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes this Doha, the Sapta-rishis have told blatant lies to Parvati about Shiva maneuvering Sati’s death. Now they compound the lie by saying that Shiva ‘sleeps peacefully without a worry in the world’, i.e. lives happily once he has got rid of Sati. This is not the case at all as is clear when we read the text from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 76 that clearly tell us that ever since Sati had died Shiva’s mind and heart were uneasy because the Lord was tormented due to the sufferings of his devotee. Here this ‘devotee’ is Sati and no one else. This is also proved when we read how Sati had deeply regretted her mistake of assuming the form of Sita, the consort of Lord Ram, a misdeed for which her husband Shiva had decided to leave her. Her mind and heart were on the boil and she wished to die because living without having respect and affection from her husband was unbearable for her, and life for her had become a constant torment (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 58). She decided to die (refer: Doha no. 59 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8).

At the time of death, she had prayed to Lord Ram, the Supreme Being whom her husband adored and worshipped, to let her serve Shiva even in her next birth, and it is for this reason that she was born as Uma or Parvati, the daughter of the king of mountains (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65).

Earlier we have also read that it was she who had been stubborn to test the integrity of Lord Ram inspite of her husband's insistence not to do so (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 51 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8). In the process she had committed two grave sins—one was to disbelieve her husband (refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 54), and the other was to tell him lies (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1, 5 that precede Doha no. 56).

In other words, all the sufferings of Sati were her own doing, and Lord Shiva was not the cause of any of them. There is no question therefore of Shiva being the cause of Sati's death as alleged by the Sapta-rishis.

In this new birth, Parvati had done severe Tapa out of her own free will to marry Shiva; no one had forced her to do it, and when she had left her home to do Tapa she was very happy and cheerful about it (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 72—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 73).

She was also aware that Shiva was the Lord who had always lived like an ascetic, and he was indeed the patron deity of ascetics. She was also aware that Shiva was the third God of the Trinity who was responsible for bringing about the conclusion or end of whatever that is born or created. She was, after all, Shiva's consort in her past life as Sati, and therefore these facts were not hidden from her. But this does not mean that Shiva was a fiend who would first get his wife killed by machinations, then go around like a mad person begging for food and feeding his stomach with non-eatables as implied by the Sapta-rishis when they derided Shiva by saying he "begs for food and eats the whole world after having first gotten rid of his wife Sati". It was utterly nonsense!

As far as Shiva not being the proper companion for a woman because he prefers to live like an ascetic or sage engrossed in deep meditation and contemplation, this is a wrong surmising because there were numerous great sages and seers who lived a life of exemplary self-restraint like an ascetic or hermit but at the same time had wives. Some of these examples in Ram Charit Manas itself are the following—(i) sage Vasistha, the royal priest of Ayodhya and the guru of Lord Ram, who had a wife named Arundhati, (ii) another is sage Atri who had a wife named Anusuya, (iii) and then we have sage Gautam whose chaste wife was Ahilya. So to say that a woman has no place in the home (hermitage) of a learned ascetic is wrong.

The one-sided monologue of the Sapta-rishis was causing immense irritation to Parvati as will be clear when she sternly ridicules and admonishes them, and tells them to mind their own business, to shut up and leave her alone as she will not abandon the advice given by Narad nor her decision to marry Shiva (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 80—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 81 herein below).]

It is still not too late (to make amends). Listen to our advice—we have thoroughly thought over the matter and have arrived at the choice of a wonderful groom who is most suitable for you. (1)

This groom whom we advice for you is very handsome, most holy and divine, one who provides happiness and joy, and one who is most polite and civilised (as opposed to the one whom you wish to marry, i.e. Lord Shiva). Even the Vedas (the scriptures) sing and praise glories and virtues of the groom we are suggesting for you. (2)

He is free from all the faults (which we have enumerated above in preceding verses), and instead he is a treasury of all the good qualities and virtues. He is the Lord of ‘Sri’ (“Sripati”; husband of Laxmi)<sup>1</sup>, and lives in the exalted heaven known as “Vaikuntha”. [This is a clear reference to Lord Vishnu as he is the Lord of Laxmi and resides in Vaikuntha too.] (3)

We shall bring such a magnificent groom to meet you<sup>2</sup>.

When Bhavani<sup>3</sup> (Parvati) heard them out, she smiled (sarcastically and annoyingly) and said—(4)

[Note—The naughty Sapta-rishis continued to tease Parvati in their attempt to test her devotion for Lord Shiva, and whether or not she was sincere about it. First they tried to sway her determination by criticising Shiva and her decision to marry him, and then presuming that she had developed some doubts in her mind and was thus open to having second thoughts, they advocated an alternative to her. They did not realise that their effort was infuriating Parvati, and she was losing her cool with them—as will be clear in the following verses.

<sup>1</sup>Any alert observer will note that the Sapta-rishis are giving enough hints to Parvati that she must be very careful and take their advice with a lot of salt, not a pinch of salt but a spoonful as it were. They propose a groom for her who is already ‘married’, as he is a husband of Laxmi—is “Sri-Pati”. Then they say that he is immaculate and his glories are sung by the scriptures. How would the scripture favour someone who keeps ‘two wives’, symbolising that he is polygamous, passionate and lustful, who is not contented by having one devoted wife but wants to satisfy his passions by having two wives?

They were criticising Lord Shiva who was highly enlightened and practiced exemplary self-restraint, and now praise someone who seems to be a passionate fellow who would like to have two wives. Even a casual attention would have alerted Parvati that these so-called saintly people standing before her were cunning and deceitful, and so she would be wise to be careful and not fall in their trap.

After all, the way the Sapta-rishis talked and used disparaging language to criticise Lord Shiva (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 79), sage Narad (refer: Chaupai line nos. 4, 7 that precede Doha no. 79), Parvati herself and her father (calling the two dumb and stupid like the mountains—refer: Doha no. 78) must have been enough to make Parvati angry at them.

She surely must have realised by now that these fellows who had been trying to persuade her to abandon her decision to marry Shiva were not holy men at all, as holy men never talk the way they were talking. Holy men would never pour scorn on Lord Shiva who is an exalted God and one of the Trinity Gods. Holy men never criticise any other sage or saint as these fellows were doing for Narad. Any civilised person would not tell a daughter that she is as stupid as her father who is dumb like the mountains where he and his daughter live.

And to add salt to injury, these fellows give her the advice that she marries a god who is already married!

<sup>2</sup>What nonsense, thought Parvati. These Sapta-rishis seem to have some vested interest. Why are they so much in a hurry that they would ‘bring the groom here’ in the forest? Don’t they know anything about good behaviour and ethical conduct? Parvati’s parents live; they aren’t dead. How can she say ‘yes’ to someone else other than Lord Shiva to become her husband without the approval of her parents, especially when her parents had given her permission to do Tapa with the express condition that she would accept Shiva as her husband if the Tapa is successful and she is asked to chose a boon? Don’t they know that their proposal is extremely unrighteous and unethical? How can they even gather the guts to say such a nasty thing to her?

<sup>3</sup>The use of the word “Bhavaani” for Parvati is very significant here as it paves the way for her stern reply that follows. One of the name of Lord Shiva is “Bhava”, and therefore by calling Parvati as “Bhavaani” it is clearly meant that she is already a wife of Lord Shiva. Hence, trying to cheat her and poison her mind to become disloyal to her husband is a very sinful act that the Sapta-rishis are committing.

If this is the case, then why weren’t they punished? The answer is that they were merely ‘testing Parvati’s devotion for Shiva and her sincerity’, and they had no malafide intentions. They had not come out of their own will to tease her or insult her or anyone else, but were doing so to test her. They had been expressly sent by Shiva himself to test Parvati—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 77 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

We shall read below that finally the Sapta-rishis have bowed before Parvati and paid their obeisance to her by lauding her and hailing her devotion for Shiva—refer: Doha no. 81 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it.]

सत्य कहेहु गिरिभव तनु एहा । हठ न छूट छूटै बरु देहा ॥ ५ ॥
कनकउ पुनि पषान तें होई । जारेहुँ सहजु न परिहर सोई ॥ ६ ॥

satya kahēhu giribhava tanu ēhā. haṭha na chūṭa chūṭai baru dēhā. 5.
kanaka'u puni paṣāna tēm hō'ī. jārēhum' sahaju na parihara sō'ī. 6.

[*Parvati had tried her best to hear out the Sapta-rishis patiently, but her patience was progressively wearing out in the light of the way the seven sages had tried to deride Lord Shiva, her object of adoration and devotion, in addition to defaming sage Narad, her father and even herself by proposing to marry her to Vishnu who was already married to Laxmi, and even that by doing it secretly without the knowledge and consent of her parents. This was surely incredulous and unethical act on their part, and it hugely embarrassed and infuriated Parvati.

So now we find that when she had had enough of this nonsense, she finally decided to cut it short. Hence, she curtly told the Sapta-rishis—]

‘Yes, you are truthful when you say that I am stubborn because I am born in the land of the mountains (and therefore inherit the dumbness and stubbornness of the mountains)<sup>1</sup>.

This being the case, I will not abandon my vows or rescind on my decision (to marry Lord Shiva) even if I have to leave this body (or die for my stubbornness and stupidity). (5)

See, gold is also produced from a rock (i.e. from the gold mines found in the earth, and is as hard and lifeless as the rock of a mountain). But when this gold is put in fire (in a symbolic gesture to punish it so that it can change its rocky, hard and gross nature), it does not yield but remains as stubborn as before<sup>2</sup>.

[The gold is not afraid of being punished by being put in fire, but continues to remain hard, rocky and lifeless. But tell me oh sages, can anyone say a piece of gold is the same as a piece of ordinary rock? Fire only enhances its value and purifies it further; the stubbornness of gold pays it rich dividends in the sense that it becomes more valuable. My Tapa and my firm determination to remain steadfast in my vows to marry Shiva will come in good stead for me. You need not worry about me or my future. Thank you!!] (6)

[Note—*Refer also to “Parvati Mangal”, verse nos. 58—65 which are very explicit in the way Parvati has defended her position and her decision to marry Lord Shiva. Refer also to Shiva Puran, 2/3/25/57.

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea is expressed elsewhere also—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 205. It is in the context of Bharat who says that the unique quality of gold is that the more you heat it in fire the more purified and valuable it becomes instead of evaporating like water or getting reduced to ashes like wood, or even cracking and getting dark by heat and soot as in the case of rock or stone.]

I am not going to overlook the advice given by sage Narad; I am not going to disregard his words and discard them for being useless and meant to mislead me<sup>1</sup>. I am not afraid if by doing so my home is established or it is ruined and demolished for good. (7)

A person who doubts the words of his or her Guru (teacher, preceptor and guide) can never find happiness or any success even in his or her dream. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 81.

This is one important lesson we learn here—that one should rely upon one's guru and have faith in him. If one does so, one is sure to end up happy and satisfied as it happened with Parvati. Suppose she had been distracted by the proddings and allurements of the Sapta-rishis, and had doubted Narad's sage advice to her father. What would have been her fate then? She would have lost the chance to atone for the sins she had committed in her previous life as Sati for disobeying Lord Shiva by committing herself to loyally serve the Lord in her new birth. She would have fallen in the eyes of the world as an indecisive and fickle-minded lady who had first disobeyed her husband Lord Shiva in her previous life as Sati, and once again she had disobeyed Narad in her present life as Parvati. It would be an ignominious way to live with these scars on her character. Who will marry her then?

In the event as it happened, we shall read that being loyal to her guru's words paid rich dividends to her: she was profusely praised by her tormentor sages, the Sapta-rishis (in Doha no. 81 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8), and later on lived a happy and contented life as a consort of Lord Shiva. This was a rare honour because her marriage with Lord Shiva bestowed upon her the privilege of being called the "Mother of the world" (refer: 1st half of Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103.]

जेहि कर मनु रम जाहि सन तेहि तेही सन काम ॥ ८० ॥

dōhā.

mahādēva avaguna bhavana biṣnu sakala guna dhāma.
jēhi kara manu rama jāhi sana tēhi tēhī sana kāma. 80.

It's alright (what you say) that Mahadeva<sup>1</sup> (the Great God; Lord Shiva) is an abode of all vices and faults, and Vishnu is an abode of all good virtues.

But the point is that one is concerned with and attracted to him alone who gives comfort, happiness and peace to one's Mana (mind and heart)<sup>2</sup>.

[Therefore, may be it is true that Vishnu is an excellent god who possesses all the fine virtues that exist in this creation, but sorry Sirs, I am not at all interested in him. I admire Lord Shiva and have fallen for him whom you say is a den of faults, but what can I do? Love is such a bad thing that once it gets hold of you, your mind and heart becomes as dumb as you yourself have told me I am in Doha no. 78 herein above. So please don't insist because I won't mend my ways.] (Doha no. 80)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The use of the word “Mahadeva” is very significant here. The word means “a Great God”, someone who is superior to others. Here, Parvati has not used any honourable title for Vishnu, she has just called him by his name, whereas for Shiva she uses an honourable title of a “Mahadeva”. In other words, she wants to tell the Sapta-rishis that as far as she is concerned, Vishnu is one of the other so many gods of the pantheon, while Shiva is the ‘greatest of them all’, being a ‘Maha (great) Deva (god)’.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 81 where Parvati is very explicit in her proclamation that this is her firm determination that she would either marry Shiva or remain unmarried for thousand of births.

Parvati rebukes the Sapta-rishis by saying that what they had said about Vishnu as being full of excellent virtues may be correct, but she isn’t bothered. She has fallen in love with Shiva, the Maha-Deva, and love being a blinding force, she can’t see anything else.

Further, she told the Sapta-rishis that they have already proclaimed her to be as dumb and stupid as the mountains where she was born (Doha no. 78), so what’s the use of preaching wisdom to a dumb-witted blockhead in any case? Therefore, it will be good if they please shut-up and go away—refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 81.]

चौ०. जौं तुम्ह मिलतेहु प्रथम मुनीसा । सुनतिउं सिख तुम्हारि धरि सीसा ॥ १ ॥ aba maim̐ janmu sambhu hita hārā. kō guna dūṣana karai bicārā. 2.

[Parvati did not wish to look insulting to the Sapta-rishis in order to avoid any unpleasant situation when they could find an excuse to curse her for not obeying them. So she played it cool and acted in a diplomatic manner.]

‘If you had met me first (i.e. prior to Narad), I would have put my head at your feet and would have listened to your advice and accepted it with due respect. (1)

But (it is too late now because) I have sacrificed my life in favour of Shambhu (Lord Shiva), and once this is done there is no use in thinking of the virtues and faults at this late stage. (2)

[Note—This statement of Parvati was clearly intended to pacify the Sapta-rishis. Parvati has told them that she would not defy the words of Narad no matter how much they entreat her to do so—refer: (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 80, and (ii) once again in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 81.

She feared that these seven sages would treat her decision not to overlook Narad’s words as an affront to themselves, especially when they were so critical of Narad (refer: Baal Kand, 2nd line of Doha no. 78 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-5 herein above).

So she acted wisely by saying that if they had come to her first, she would have “put her head at their feet, and obeyed their advice”. But they must realise, being sages themselves, that it is unrighteous and unethical to disobey one’s Guru as a matter of principle (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 80 herein above). This logical and intelligent handling of a sticky situation pleased the Sapta-rishis as they could not counter it.

Putting one’s head at the feet of elders and obeying them is an honourable thing to do. There are many references in Ram Charit Manas where this tradition is upheld. Some of the instances are the following—(i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 77; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 174; (iii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 177; (iv) Ayodhya Kand, 2nd line of Doha no. 269; and (v) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 318.]

If your heart is so determined that you can’t refrain yourself from match-making (and perhaps finding a suitable partner for Vishnu for whom you act like a marriage agent)-
 --(3)

---Then for active and diligent persons who do not know what is laziness as they are very energetic in whatever they decide to do, there is no dearth of either a groom or a bride in this vast world because they are plenty of them there.<sup>1</sup> (4)

Now listen to me. It is my firm vow that I will marry only Shiva and no one else even if I have to remain unmarried for thousands of births. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati must have told the Sapta-rishis—“I preethee, you can find so many eligible bachelors to become a groom, and equal numbers of girls to become a bride for them. Why do you insist and poke me unnecessarily when I am unwilling and not interested in playing ball with you! This world is a vast place, and you can surely find greener pastures elsewhere. You have already said that I belong to the mountains which are un-inhabitable places. Please go to greener pastures where you will find wonderful maidens eagerly wanting to line-up for an interview with you so that you can help them find a suitable match. Or else, you would find a suitable maiden for Vishnu who has commissioned you to find a girl for him!

Forget about me, and also forget about finding a suitable bride for Vishnu in the hostile mountainous terrain. Go to the world where I am sure you will meet not one, not two, but countless girls suitable for your purpose. Please don’t waste your precious time here.”]

I will not abandon or disregard Narad's words (advice) even if Lord Shiva (for whom I have done such a severe Tapa, who is the Lord of my life, and to whom I am fully devoted and committed) himself tells me to do so.<sup>1</sup> (6)

[Parvati was very exasperated by now, so she bluntly told the sages—] I fall at your feet and most politely ask you to go home as it is getting too late. [I am fed-up with you. Please go away from here and leave me alone. Thank you for all your time and advice which, however, I don't need.]' (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 80. The reason is implied in these two verses: "One should not disobey one's guru. If one does so, he can never hope to have happiness and success anywhere in the world. Since Narad is my guru in the sense that he was the first sage who had shown me the light at the end of the dark tunnel represented by bad fate, I must not and would not disobey him no matter what happens."

We have read in Doha no. 67 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 that Parvati's groom was destined to have certain peculiar characters which are like those of a hermit or an ascetic, and certainly not like a householder. When her parents were shell-shocked to hear this prophesy, they had requested Narad to advice a way out of this logjam (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 68). It was then the noble sage had advised them that if Parvati does Tapa and manages to please Lord Shiva to accept her, then it is possible that the miseries in her fate could be mitigated to a great extent because Lord Shiva has that power which can mitigate sufferings of his devotees (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1, 4 that precede Doha no. 69; and Chaupai line nos. 3, 5-8 that precede Doha no. 70).

Narad was not trying to push her downstream to drown in the river of her fate, but he was being helpful by showing a way out from the whirlpool in which she was bound to fall and get sucked if no remedial measures were devised now. And this remedy that could change her fortune was doing Tapa and pleasing Lord Shiva, which she followed diligently. She had succeeded in her endeavour as is clear when the heavenly voice endorsed her efforts (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 74 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8).]

When the wise sages (i.e. the Sapta-rishis) observed the high level of devotion and affection that Parvati had for Lord Shiva, they exclaimed in joy—'Glory to you oh Jagdama (Mother of the world)! All glory to you oh Bhavaani (the divine consort of Lord Bhava, one of the many names of Lord Shiva)!<sup>1</sup> We hail you and glorify you. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 88 where the same words have been used and the same idea expressed by sage Narad later on in the story when he comes with these Sapta-rishis and Parvati's father to reassure her wailing mother and the rest of the family who were utterly confused about the glory of Lord Shiva by merely watching the Lord's external features and physical appearance which were most unconventional and on the face belied everything about his divinity and mystical powers.]

You are indeed a personified form of “Maya” (the dynamic power of the Lord God which is responsible for the creation coming into being), and Shiva is indeed the “Bhagwaan” (the Lord God, the Supreme Being).

Indeed you two are the Father and the Mother of the entire world<sup>1</sup>.

Saying this and bowing their heads at the holy feet of Parvati, the seven sages went away from there, their bodies getting thrilled repeatedly. (81)

[Note—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 98.

The sages were feeling highly privileged and glad that they had the rare opportunity to have such a close interaction with Parvati that they would cherish for the rest of their lives. They were happy that they would be remembered in history as being the ones who were instrumental in bringing about the union of Parvati and Shiva. This is because Shiva would depend upon their report, and since they had decided that they will give a brilliant report card for Parvati, it was sure that Shiva would marry her, making them and their role immortal in the annals of history.

They knew that after the marriage of Shiva and Parvati, no one would ever get another chance to interact so closely with Parvati and question her. So, this was a rare privilege that they had had.

Parvati must have given a huge sigh of relief when her tormentors, the Sapta-rishis, had gone their way.

This fulfilled the first prophesy of the heavenly voice which had said that the Sapta-rishis would be visiting Parvati. So now she prepared herself for the second prophesy which was that her father would come soon to her with a request to go home. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 75.]

The sages went away from there, and sent Himwant (the father of Parvati and the king of the snow-covered mountains) to where she was doing Tapa. He prayed to Girija (the daughter of the mountains) and persuaded her to return home. (1)

[Note—The sages are following the instructions of Lord Shiva as narrated in Doha no. 77 where they were ordered to “test Uma first to remove all doubts, and then motivate her father to bring her home”.

The place where Parvati did her Tapa was away from the capital of the kingdom of the mountains. The place of her Tapa was situated in the ‘Gandhamaardhan mountain’, while the capital was located at ‘Aushadhi-Prastha’ (literally a place rich in medicinal plants and herbs)—refer: Kalidas’ epic poem “Kumar-Sambhav”, Sarga (Canto) 6, verse no. 33, 36-46.]

bha'ē magana siva sunata sanēhā. haraṣi saptariṣi gavanē gēhā. 3.

After that, the Sapta-rishis went back to Lord Shiva to report on the developments. They told him the entire episode related to Uma as it happened. (2)

Lord Shiva listened to it attentively and with immense satisfaction. He became delighted to learn about Parvati’s affection and devotion for him.

Having finished their mission, the exhilarated Sapta-rishis went back to their own abode. (3)

मनु थिर करि तब संभु सुजाना । लगे करन रघुनायक ध्याना ॥ ४ ॥ manu thira kari taba sambhu sujānā. lagē karana raghunāyaka dhyānā. 4.

Then, the wise Lord Shiva exercised self-restraint over him Mana (mind and heart) and began to meditate upon Lord Ram (who was his revered deity). (4)

[Note—Shiva is a highly exalted ascetic who practices meditation and contemplation as a routine matter. He is invariably depicted in all iconography as being seated in a meditative Mudra (posture) with half-closed eyes and lost in contemplation and deep thought. He closed his eyes and remembered the image of his beloved Lord Ram. This helped him to stabilise his mind and heart (Mana) and prevent himself to become excited and lose self-control. Being an ascetic he was fully aware of the importance of maintaining internal calm and poise so that the perpetual bliss that he enjoyed is not at all disturbed by any of the mundane affairs related to the many activities and processes of this creation from which he wished to remain aloof.

Shiva had always taken recourse to this method of meditating upon Lord Ram as a means to calm down and find internal peace for himself—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 52; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 57; Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 58; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 52; Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 75; and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 83. In each of these cases we find that Shiva draws peace by meditating upon Lord Ram.

The lesson that one draws from these verses is that in order to maintain internal calm and blissful state one should rely upon meditation and contemplation as an infallible instrument.]

तारकु असुर भयउ तेहि काला । भुज प्रताप बल तेज बिसाला ॥ ५ ॥
तेहि सब लोक लोकपति जीते । भए देव सुख संपति रीते ॥ ६ ॥

tāraku asura bhaya'u tēhi kālā. bhuja pratāpa bala tēja bisālā. 5.
tēhiṁ saba lōka lōkapati jītē. bha'ē dēva sukha sampati rītē. 6.

It so happened that around that time, a demon named Tarkaasur<sup>1</sup> was born. He was very strong-armed, majestic and powerful. (5)

He conquered all the three worlds<sup>2</sup>, resulting in the gods being deprived of their peace and prosperity. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>“Tarkaasur”—Tarakasur was the son of Vajraanga and his consort Varaangi. He had done severe Tapa (austerity and penance) as a result of which the creator Brahma had granted him several boons which had made him invincible. He was killed by Lord Subramanya, the son of Shiva and Parvati. He had three sons—Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali. They had also pleased Brahma and by his blessings built three great cities, collectively called ‘Tripura’. These cities were made of gold, silver and iron. These three demon brothers were collectively called Tripurasur—the demons of the three cities. When they became a nuisance for the Gods, Shiva destroyed these three cities and the demons with one arrow. Therefore he got the name of Tripurari—one who destroyed the three enemy cities.

The story of Tripurasur with a slight variation is narrated in Bhagwat Mahapurāṇ, 7/10/53-58. According to it, once when the demons were defeated by the gods, they went to take refuge with the greatest demon of them all, the mighty demon named ‘Maya Daanav’. He was the one who had created the golden city of Lanka for Ravana.

Maya Danav created three huge planes made of gold, silver and iron. These planes were so huge that they resembled entire cities and were well provided for with all the things necessary for comfortable living. Maya Daanav handed them to the three chief demons named Taaraaksha, Kamlaaksha and Vindyumaali who were said to be the son of Tarkasur. The special quality of these planes was that they were hidden from view and flew stealthily. Emboldened by being invisible, the demons went on the rampage, plundering and laying to waste the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the sky. The gods could not fight them as these demons were invisible. Besides this, these three city-like planes had a pond of nectar each, the contents of which made the demons invincible and beyond the reach of death.

Frustrated and flabbergasted, the gods approached Lord Shiva to get rid of the demons. Lord Shiva invoked his specially empowered arrow known as the ‘Pashupatastra’. When shot, it produced countless arrows spewing fierce tongues of flame. Though these arrows burnt the three cities or planes (“Tripurs”), the demons however managed to survive by taking a dip in the pond of nectar that was present in each of the three places.

Confused, Lord Shiva invoked Lord Vishnu, the maverick Lord who knows every trick in creation as he is the Supreme Being, to find some solution. Vishnu disguised himself as a cow and made the Creator Brahma a calf. They went to these ponds and drank the nectar. The demons were so dazed by the Lord’s Maya (delusion creating powers) that they could not respond and react. After that, Vishnu prepared for the great war—creating the chariot from Dharma (righteousness), the charioteer from Gyan (knowledge), the war standard from Vairagya (renunciation), the horses from Aishwarya (fame and might), bow from Tapa (penance), the body armour from Vidya (skills), arrows from Kriya (deeds and dynamism), and all other paraphernalia of war by employing other mystical powers he had.

Then, on an auspicious moment of the asterism of “Abhijit” (conquer now), Lord Shiva rode this chariot and burnt the three cities by a single arrow.

According to the Ramayana of Valmiki, Baal Kand, Canto 75, two great bows were made from the bones of Dadhichi. One was known as “Sarang” and the other was known as “Pinak”. The former was held by Lord Vishnu, and the latter by Lord Shiva. Vishnu killed the demons with his Sarang bow, while Shiva used his Pinak to destroy the three cities.

Another version of who the demon “Tripurasur” was appears in Skanda Puran, Aawantya Reva-Khand. It says that the son of the demon king Bali was known as ‘Baana-sur’. He had thousand arms. He worshipped Lord Shiva for a thousand years. Pleased with him, Lord Shiva asked him to seek a boon, upon which Baanasur requested the Lord to provide him with a city that is so invincible that none of the gods can ever conquer it, except of course by Lord Shiva whom he had worshipped as his deity. Shiva granted him his wish.

The cunning Baanasur then decided to please the other three gods of the Trinity, i.e. Lords Vishnu and Brahma. So he worshipped them one by one and extracted similar boons from them as he had done from Shiva. Once done, he now had three invincible cities that symbolized his sway and domain covering the three dimensions of creation—viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world. Then he went mad with recklessness, plundering and pillaging at will. Terrified, the gods approached Lord Shiva as he was the one who had initially blessed Baanasur, and also because the demon had himself exempted Shiva from the boon of immunity from destruction. Then, Shiva stringed his bow called Pinak, mounted an arrow called Aghor, and angrily shot it at the three cities ruled by Baanasur. This arrow instantly burnt and reduced the three cities to ashes. Their residue fell in the holy river Narmada. Then Baanasur fervently prayed to Lord Shiva to be pleased with him and give him abode in his own divine Loka known as the ‘Shiva-Loka’, the divine abode of Shiva in the heaven.

The Sharav Upanishad of Atharva Veda, verse no. 14 describes that Lord Shiva is also known as the slayer of the demon Tirpurasur. Hence, Shiva or Rudra is also called Tripurari. The three cities ruled by Tripurasur symbolised the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the nether world.

The story of the birth of Tarkaasur in ‘Padma Puran, Sristi Khanda’ is as follows—By the blessings of sage Kashyap, mother Diti gave birth to a son named

‘Vajraanga’ because his body was as strong as Vajra, the hardest and the strongest material in existence. [Vajra + Anga (body)]

As soon as he was born he became an expert in the knowledge of all the scriptures. On the instructions of his mother he went to the heaven and ensnared Indra (the king of gods) and brought him captive before his mother. At the intervention of Brahma (the creator) and sage Kashyap (his father), Vajraanga freed Indra. He then requested Brahma that he may be inspired to do Tapa and succeed in it.

Brahma created a girl named ‘Varaangi’ and gave her to him as his bride. Then, both the husband and the wife, i.e. Vajraanga and Varaangi, began doing severe Tapa (penance). Brahma was pleased and blessed Vajraanga that demonic tendencies would not emerge in his heart.

After successfully completing his Tapa, Vajraanga returned home but did not find his wife Varaangi there. When he went out to search for her, he saw her crying in the forest. On enquiry she told him that Indra had not only tormented her and made her miserable but had even compelled her to leave home. She wished to have retribution, and therefore asked her husband (Vajraanga) to provide her with a son who would punish Indra and avenge her insult at his hands.

Vajraanga did Tapa once again, and Brahma blessed him with a son as desired. This son was “Taarak” as he liberated his mother from her torments by severely punishing Indra: he captured Indra and put him in shackles. [A similar narration of doing Tapa and receiving a son as a boon is narrated in ‘Matsya Puran’, Chapter 147, verse no. 17.]

Varaangi had borne the child in her womb for a thousand years before he was born. Taarak, her son, was a brave and invincible warrior. To avenge his mother’s insult at the hands of Indra (king of gods), he went to Mt. Paariyaatra and did so severe Tapa that the gods and the rest of the world began to get scorched by the heat generated by it. [Refer: (i) ‘Matsya Puran’, Chapter 148, and (ii) Kalidas’ ‘Kumar Sambhav’, Sarga 1, verse no. 56.]

According to ‘Matsya Puran’, Chapter 148, verse no. 18 onwards, Taarak prayed to Brahma as follows—‘Oh Lord! You live in the heart of all living beings, and as such nothing is hidden from you. Everyone wants to treat others the way the latter treat him. The gods have an eternal jealousy with us (the Asurs, the non-gods, the sons of Diti) and do not want us to live peacefully and prosper. I want to liberate the demon race. Hence, please grant me the boon that no warrior can kill me with any weapon. This is all I want.’

According to ‘Padma Puran’, Taarak asked Brahma for the grant of a boon that he is not killed by any living being.

In both the cases Brahma told him that this is impossible because all those who are born must die, without exception. So it is better if he re-phrases his request and specifies the person or entity from which he seeks immunity. Taarak then asked that he may not die at the hands of anyone except an infant of seven days of age or younger—in the hope that it would be impossible for such a small child, who is not even eight days old, to kill him, thereby making him invincible and immune to be killed by anyone who is old enough to confront him.

After the granting of the desired boon, both Brahma and Taarak went back to their respective homes. When the news spread that Taarak has successfully acquired a unique boon which would make him virtually immune from defeat and death, all the known famous demons of the time, viz. Mahish, Kaalnemi, Jambha, Grasan, Shumbha etc., came and joined forces with him, vowing their allegiance to him and declaring him as their chief. [Refer: ‘Matsya Puran’, Chapter 148, and Chapter 154, verse nos. 20-26, 47-49.]

Thus emboldened, Tarkaasur unleashed mayhem and terror in the heaven: rampaging and plundering, imprisoning the gods and terrorizing them. The entire composite army of the gods failed to dent his strength and stop his seeking revenge from the gods. The gods approached their patriarch Brahma to help them. Brahma told them about the boon he had to grant Taarak, and advised them that since only a child below the age of seven days could kill the demon, they should make an effort in this direction and see how Shiva can be motivated to marry and beget a son. Brahma then told them (the gods) about Parvati’s Tapa with the intention of marrying Shiva, and that he has already granted her wish alongside Lord Ram requesting Shiva to forgive her for her past sins in her previous life as Sati (when she had defied Shiva and had assumed the form of Lord Ram’s wife Sita in order to test the integrity of Lord Ram) and marry her.

Meanwhile, Shiva is submerged in doing meditation, so the gods must try to devise a method whereby Shiva would marry Parvati. Their son would then kill Tarkaasur. [Refer—(i) ‘Matsya Puran’, Chapters 146 and 154; and (ii) Kalidas’ ‘Kumar Sambhav’, Canto 2, verse nos. 57, 59, 61.]

In Goswami Tulsidas’ epic story of Lord Ram by the name of ‘Ram Charit Manas’, this entire episode of Tarkaasur is narrated in Baal Kand, (i) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 89; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 103.

The Tapa done by Parvati and the reason for it is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 75.

The sin of Parvati in her previous life as Sati is also narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 65.

<sup>2</sup>“The three worlds”—The three worlds are the three divisions of creation consisting of the heaven, the earth and the nether world.

Each world has its patron gods and presiding deities. When the demons conquered any part of the world, the gods and the deities were to the first to be chased away or imprisoned by them so that they could rule over the inhabitants of that world ruthlessly and cruelly in the manner that suited them. Later on in the narration of Ram Charit Manas we learn that when the demon Ravana successfully did Tapa and succeeded in getting boons from Brahma, the creator, he had also went on the rampage, pillaging, killing and causing general mayhem so much so that the gods and all the living beings on earth were tormented beyond measure. The Gods and the Mother Earth had then prayed to Lord Vishnu to help them and salvage the creation from complete annihilation. It was then that the Lord promised them that he would come down to earth as Lord Ram to eliminate this scourge of the demons.

Similarly, in the case of Tarkaasur, the son of Lord Shiva was destined to eliminate him, but Shiva lived alone after the death of Sati. Hence, it became imperative that Shiva marries once again and begets a son (Kartikeya) who would then kill Tarkaasur.]

This fellow Tarkaasur was imperishable and immortal because he could not be conquered by anyone, including 'Death'. The gods tried hard to defeat him but were frustrated even after waging countless wars with him. (7)

At last, they went to the creator 'Biranchi' ("Brahma") and pleaded with him to help them. 'Vidhi' (the creator Brahma) saw that all the gods were extremely distressed. (8)

Vidhi (the creator) explained to all the gods how their misery could come to an end. He advised them—"The death of the demon (Tarkaasur) would be possible only when a son is born out of the sperms of Lord Sambhu (Shiva). Only such a son would have the ability to win this demon in the battle-field. (Doha no. 82)

Although this is an extremely piquant situation that seems to baffle me (because on the one hand Parvati has successfully done Tapa to marry Shiva, and on the other hand Shiva has renounced everything and sat down to do meditation and has lost awareness of his surroundings because he has entered in the transcendental state of Samadhi), still I will tell you a way out it. Listen to my words. (4)

Send ‘Kaam-deo’ (cupid) to Shiva so that he creates distraction in the mind and heart (“Mana”) of the latter by his cunning manoeuvring and machinations. (5)

When he (Kaamdeo) succeeds in distracting Lord Shiva from his Samadhi (deep meditation) and wakes up the Lord, then I will go and bow my head before him and insist that he marry. (6)

This is the only way I can think of by which the good of the gods can be achieved. [There is no other way out.]’

All the assembled gods endorsed this advice unanimously, saying that it was excellent. (7)

To implement Brahma’s advice, the gods prayed to “Jhakha-ketu<sup>1</sup>” (Kaamdeo) who revealed himself holding a very sharp and formidable (“Visham”) arrow in his hand<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>“Jhakha-ketu”—The word “Jhakha” means a fish, and “ketu” means a flag. So, the flag of Kaamdeo has the sign of a fish on it.

<sup>2</sup>Kamdeo is said to hold a symbolic arrow consisting of five types of flowers. The ‘flower’ is however misleading as it implies that this god, who is the patron god of passion, yearning, lust, emotions and love, uses quiet, polite and subtle methods to conquer his enemies by secretly hitting them hard at their heart and forcing them to be subdued with his quality of generating passion, yearning, lust and desire for sensual gratification.

His arrow is not like the conventional arrow used in a battle-field that produces a bleeding wound. He uses ‘flowers’ symbolic of softness and pleasing demeanours that have a malafide intention to trap the victim in a snare, forcing the trapped creature to obey what Kaamdeo orders. A creature ensnared by Kaamdeo would not listen to the advice of his or her intellect and wisdom, but would be driven by emotions and sentiments having their seat in the heart that has already been conquered by Kaamdeo and injected with the poison of passion, lust, yearning, love and a desire for sensual gratification.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 84 which clearly states that Kaamdeo holds a bow and arrows made of flowers. .

Kamdeo is so powerful and clever in his tactics that he has succeeded to distract even Lord Shiva who is a renowned god of ascetics and one who has exemplary self-control over his sense organs. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 87.

It is another matter that Lord Shiva became so angry at Kaamdeo’s temerity, impertinence and irreverence that the Lord opened his ‘third eye’ of wisdom located on his forehead to burn Kamdeo to ashes (refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87). But inspite of this, the fact cannot be denied that Kaamdeo did succeed in waking Shiva from his transcendental state of Samadhi and mellowed enough to accept the proposal to marry Parvati (refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 88—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 89).]

suranha kahī nija bipati saba suni mana kīnha bicāra.

sambhu birōdha na kusala mōhi bihasi kahē'u asa māra. 83.

The gods told Kamdeo about their entire problem<sup>1</sup>. He thought over the matter in his Mana (mind and heart) and came to the conclusion that by opposing Lord Shiva, no good would come to him (and he will have to suffer its consequences).

Therefore, “Maar<sup>2</sup>” (the one who hurts or kills; Kamdeo) smiled wryly and said to the gods, ‘By opposing Lord Shiva I cannot expect any sort of welfare. --- (Doha no. 83)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods explained how the demon Tarkaasur was tormenting the entire heaven and that he can be killed only by the son of Shiva. But Shiva was submerged in deep meditation. It was necessary to distract him and ignite a desire to marry inside his heart so that he could be married to Parvati, who has already done successful Tapa to get him as he husband. The son produced as the result of this union would kill the demon and free the gods from his constant terror.

Kamdeo was in a dilemma. If he refused it would mean betraying his brother gods who might declare him an outcaste and force him out of the kingdom of heaven. If that happens, he would lose protection of the combined might of the gods and would become an easy target for the demons who are sure to capture and kill him.

On the other hand, it is sure that if he disturbs the meditation of Lord Shiva he cannot escape the Lord’s wrath.

He found himself in a logjam. He thought over the matter and decided that he is held in a piquant situation and forced to choose between the ocean and the deep sea. This being the case and death being a certainty, it is far better to die serving the cause of the brother-gods and while having a divine view of Lord Shiva from close quarters (known as having “Darshan”) and dying at the hands of the Lord than being tortured and killed by a demon (Tarkaasur) and having the ignominy of betraying his brother gods and not being selfless in his service to creation.

Therefore, Kamdeo “smiled wryly” as he knew he was trapped and there was no way out for him.

<sup>2</sup>He is addressed with the word “Maar”, meaning to kill or hurt or harm, because his deeds would harm Lord Shiva by robbing the Lord of the perpetual peace and bliss that he was getting while involved in Samadhi (deep meditation).

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 84 herein below where Kamdeo has been addressed as “Maar”. Surely, the word fits in properly here because Kamdeo is on a mission to ‘kill the state of eternal peace in which Shiva was submerged while meditating’. It also means that Kamdeo was on a mission to wage war on Lord Shiva, and in a war it is ‘either kill or get killed’. In fact, both happened in this case: Kamdeo successfully eliminated (“killed”) Shiva’s peace of mind on the one hand, and got himself eliminated (“killed”) in the process on the other hand.]

Indeed, if a man leaves his body (dies) to serve others, he is always praised by saintly people<sup>4</sup>.’ (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What was the work that was to be done? It is outlined in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 83.

<sup>2</sup>Kamdeo was apprehensive of death by playing dirty tricks with Shiva as is clearly written in line no. 2 of Doha no. 83, and in verse no. 4 herein below. And what was the apprehension? It was certain that disturbing Shiva would invite his wrath, and there were fair chances that this would mean death. This is exactly what had happened—extremely exasperated by Kamdeo’s insistent impertinence and causing nuisance for him, Shiva had opened his ‘third eye’ that spewed fire and burnt Kamdeo to death. This is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87.

<sup>3</sup>The word “Sruti” means ‘that which is heard’ as opposed to that which is read. The ancient texts of the Vedas were first revealed to the meditating seers and sages while their minds were submerged in deep meditation and contemplation upon the Absolute Truth of creation. Meditation helped them concentrate the various faculties of their bodies so as to synchronise the vibrations caused by the flow of consciousness inside their own bodies with the cosmic vibrations created in the ether by the supreme Consciousness. The net effect was that they could virtually hear the Consciousness ‘speak’ to them in a voice and tone that only they could understand and decipher. It is much like the case of a radio receiver: only when the receiver is tuned to the broadcasting station’s frequency do we hear the radio ‘speak’ to us. And then when we have heard the radio ‘say’ something, we immediately become aware of this bit of information that others aren’t even aware of.

What the first sage or seer heard, he transmitted it to his followers or disciples, and they in turn passed it down the line to others just like when we hear some news for the first time on the radio we tell others about it, and soon the news spreads.

In ancient times there was no method to keep a written record of what was heard by the first sage or seer. The method of transmission was oral, from generation to generation, from the ‘guru’ (the teacher) to the disciple (the student).

Such body of knowledge is called the ‘Veda’. The Veda encapsulates all the knowledge that the creator deemed fit to pass down to the inhabitants of his creation so that they can know what to and what not to do. Thus, the Vedas are the primary and the most ancient body of knowledge on which the rest of the codes and laws governing the conduct of the society were built.

Now, since the method of transmission of knowledge that was ‘first heard’ (Sruti) was oral (instead of being written), the teacher had to rely on his memory and the power of recollection. Therefore, the knowledge that was transmitted from the ‘hearer’ to the ‘listener’ was known as “Smriti”—simply because it was based on memory and recollection.

<sup>4</sup>A similar idea of altruism (i.e. selfless concern for the welfare of others) is expressed in Ram Charit Manas at two other places, viz. (i) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 31; and (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 14 that precedes Doha no. 121.]

अस कहि चलेउ सबहि सिरु नाई । सुमन धनुष कर सहित सहाई ॥ ३ ॥
चलत मार अस हृदयँ बिचारा । सिव बिरोध ध्रुव मरनु हमारा ॥ ४ ॥

asa kahi calē'u sabahi siru nā'ī. sumana dhanuṣa kara sahita sahā'ī. 3.
calata māra asa hr̥dayam̃ bicārā. siva birōdha dhruva maranu hamārā. 4.

Saying this (i.e. assuring the gods that inspite of the dangers involved in the mission and its incredulity, he will still go ahead as it involves larger good of the community of gods who were all his brethren), Kamdeo bowed before all of them to take his leave, and departed from there on his mission. For help, he took along his bow and arrows made of flowers<sup>1</sup>. (3)

When “Maar” (Kamdeo)<sup>2</sup> was on his way to accomplish his mission, he thought to himself—‘By opposing Lord Shiva it is certain that I will die.’ (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 83 and its accompanying note no. 2 where this concept of Kamdeo holding a bow and arrows made of flowers has been explained.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 83 where Kamdeo is referred to as ‘Maar’. The implication of this word, which literally means to kill or one who kills, is explained as a note appended to this Doha.

A similar situation has arisen in Aranya Kand when Marich was forced by the demon king Ravana to come along with him and disguise himself as a golden deer so that Sita, the wife of Lord Ram, could be kidnapped. Marich had decided that now his death was near, but it is good to die while serving his Lord (Ravana) on the one hand, and seeing Lord Ram at close quarters as the Lord pursues him from behind. ‘Serving his lord’ may have a different meaning here—it may not mean ‘serving Ravana’ but ‘serving Lord Ram’, because the mission of the Lord was to eliminate Ravana whose cruelty was unbearable for the world, and this would be possible only when a war is waged where Ravana is killed. For this war to be waged, it was necessary that a reason is created, and Sita’s abduction by Ravana was to be that ‘reason’. So in effect, Marich was serving Lord Ram and helping the Lord in his divine mission. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 25—to Doha no. 26.]

तब आपन प्रभाउ बिस्तारा । निज बस कीन्ह सकल संसारा ॥ ५ ॥

taba āpana prabhā'u bistārā. nija basa kīnha sakala sansārā. 5.

Then, to successfully accomplish his mission, Kamdeo expanded his influence in world so much so that he brought the entire world under his magical spell. (5)

[Note—The way Kamdeo spread his tentacles in the world and sucked even the wise and the dispassionate in the whirlpool of passions and lust have been graphically described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 85.

Hitherto the influence of passion, lust and desire to enjoy the world and its material sense objects was limited to worldly men and women who had no interest in spiritual matters or worried for the welfare of their souls. Ascetics, hermits and other holy men were exempt from such temptations. But the mischief of Kamdeo entangled them all in its knotty web of delusions leading to passions, lust, yearnings and other forms of worldly attachments.

This answers a very important but rarely asked question: why did Shiva burn Kamdeo to death (as narrated in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 87)? On the face of it, the apparent and obvious answer is: because Kamdeo disturbed Shiva in his meditation (refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 87).

But when we delve deeper into this episode we deduce that Shiva was angry because Kamdeo was forcing creatures of the whole world to relinquish the path of Dharma (righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, nobility and modesty) and move towards the path of gross indulgences and a life of immoderation. The whole edifice of Dharma was crumbling under the evil eye of Kamdeo. Even those who were respected by the society and regarded as holy men became pervert and morally corrupt. The grand virtue of ‘Vivek’ (meaning wisdom, and the ability to determine what is righteous and noble and what is not) took the greatest beating; it vanished from society when passions, lust, desires and indulgences became dominant features. The same people who had hitherto paid respect to such virtues as dispassion and detachment not began to loathe them and became excessively indulgent and promiscuous. The degeneration and degradation of society reached its pinnacle when Kamdeo took hold of the people’s Mana (mind and heart). Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 85.

Being the senior-most God and the most enlightened one, this outrageous development was unacceptable to Shiva. Had Kamdeo limited his mischief to Shiva alone and would not have encircled the rest of the world in its lusty tentacles, Shiva would not have become so angry with him so as to completely eliminate him. Shiva had other ways of punishing Kamdeo if his nuisance was limited to the Lord, but Shiva thought that if he spares Kamdeo then the whole world would lose the strength of its moral fibre and fall apart in tatters.

Even the holy men and those who were called ascetics and hermits fell in the trap laid by Kamdeo. Since Lord Shiva is their patron deity, he decided to end this scourge inflicting the society by eliminating the root of the evil—which was Kamdeo. So the Lord burnt Kamdeo to death.

The statement that “Kamdeo extended or spread his influence over the whole world” implies that he was preparing a background to launch his final attack on Shiva. Shiva is the ‘Lord of the world’, which means that Shiva is like a ‘king-emperor’ in the context of the mortal world, and like a ‘king-emperor’ he is also responsible for the conduct of his subjects, the creatures of the world. To bring a king-emperor down and defeat him, a clever enemy first corrupts the subjects of his kingdom and brings them under his influence so that when he launches his attack on the sovereign there would be no support from his own subjects, which would demoralise the king-emperor and bring about his downfall. A lord who cannot exert control over his subjects and in whose realm anarchy prevails has no moral right to rule. Such a lord is isolated and easy to defeat.

This was in essence the plan of Kamdeo—he would first corrupt the world and bring it under his own influence by showing the world the pleasures that are synonymous with Kamdeo, and then telling them to abandon the path shown by Shiva which robs them of all these worldly pleasures. This would ensure that when he launches his attack on Shiva, the latter would find no support even from his own devotees and followers. Thus isolated, it would be easy to trap Shiva and enforce passion and desire on him so that he may agree to enjoy the life of worldly indulgences like the rest of the world over which he rules.

Kamdeo thought that when Shiva realises that the whole world has started following the path shown by the former, it would be prudent on the latter's part to adapt to the changed scenario and toe the line of Kamdeo out of apprehension of mass revolt by the subjects of the world over which Shiva rules if both of them, Shiva and Kamdeo, confront each other.]

कोपेउ जबहिं बारिचरकेतू । छन महुं मिटे सकल श्रुति सेतू ॥ ६ ॥

kōpē'u jabahim bāricarakētū. chana mahum' miṭē sakala śruti sētū. 6.

As soon as Kamdeo, whose flag bears the emblem of a fish, unleashed his angry outburst upon the world, all the bridges established by the Vedas (that took a creature across the whirlpool of worldly delusions and entanglements, and helped in maintaining self-restraint) were swept away in an instant. (6)

[Note—The “bridge” is a metaphor for all the laws and codes of conduct established by the scriptures that help to regulate the society and maintain the path of Dharma. They are called a ‘bridge’ because by following the path of self-restraint and detachment from worldly indulgences as shown by the Vedas it becomes easy for the creature to cross over this world of miseries and a constant cycle of birth and death to find eternal freedom and peace much like a man easily crossing a turbulent river with the help of a bridge. Just like an enemy first destroys the bridge, Kamdeo's first move was to sweep away the laws as envisioned by the Vedas for regulation of society and helping its members to lead a life of morality and nobility. This means, the people no longer followed the path of Dharma as pronounced by the Vedas, and instead they became fallen and sinful, and there was widespread moral anarchy, chaos and spiritual degradation.]

[What did this mean? Here is the answer in the following verses:--]

The grand virtues of 'Brahmacharya' (continance; self-restraint over one's natural instincts), 'Vrat' (steadfastness in following a righteous path and observing religious vows), different types of 'Sanjam' (observing self-restraint of all kinds in every matter of life), 'Dhiraj' (patience, courage, resilience, fortitude), 'Dharma' (righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, noble way of life), 'Gyan and Vigyan' (knowledge, wisdom and enlightenment, especially in spiritual matters), (7)--

---'Sadaachar' (righteous behaviour; morality; modesty), 'Japa' (repetition of the holy name of the Lord God as a means of doing meditation and focusing the mind on holiness and divinity), 'Yoga' (meditation), 'Vairagya' (renunciation, detachment and dispassion from all things pertaining to the gross material world of sense objects), 'Vivek' (wisdom and discrimination between the right and the wrong)—all these virtues fled en-masse in terror (when Kamdeo attacked the moral fibre of the world, shredding it into pieces). The grand virtue of 'Vivek' ran away with all its associates; all the renowned warriors of this virtue could not stand their ground in the battle field (when Kamdeo attacked them) and turned their back to run away. (Chanda line no. 1)

All of them went away and hid themselves in the caves of mountains symbolised by sacred books<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

There was a huge tumult in the world. All the righteous people (who relied on Vivek in their daily lives) were dismayed and distressed, wondering who would now give them protection and who would now show them the way (once Vivek was eclipsed under the dark shadow of Kamdeo). (Chanda line no. 3)

They wondered—'Lord of Rati (i.e. Kamdeo who is the husband of Rati) has already conquered all the creatures that have a single head. Who is that abnormal creature or a super-human person with two heads for whom Kamdeo carries a bow and arrows so that he can use this weapon to defeat him?'<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse has two meanings: One is a literal meaning, and the other is the allegorical meaning. Now let us examine them.

The literal meaning is this: Unable to cope with the ferocity of attack by the army of Kamdeo, the virtue of 'Vivek' (in a personified form) thought it prudent to escape from being annihilated completely by withdrawing itself and confining its principles to the pages of good books so that when evil times ended and good times came again, these principles could be resurrected and made to live again. The generation that survived the onslaught of evil and sins perpetuated by Kamdeo, would be able to revive the ancient principles of 'Vivek' (wisdom) and once again lead a life in accordance with the path shown by the sacred books. The virtue of 'Vivek', i.e. the fundamental principles that help the world to decide what is good for it and what is not, would once again be available to the world if it reads the sacred or good books when the bad times are over.

It is just like the case of a wise king who does not show false daredevilry in the battle-field and gets killed, but rather shows prudence by escaping from there and hiding in a cave along with his close associates to wait for an opportune time to come out alive to reclaim his kingdom when the time is right and the enemy is gone.

The allegorical meaning is that all the virtues associated with the term 'Vivek' (wisdom; the principles upon which one relies to discriminate between the right and the wrong) vanished from the world when it was overcome by Kamdeo. In other words, when one is overcome with passions, lust, yearnings and desires to gratify the sense organs of the body and its natural urges to enjoy the material world and its comforts and pleasures, one's wisdom fails him. Under the onslaught of the negative virtues symbolised by Kaamdeo, a person becomes blind and loses the foresight to see what is good for his well-being and what is harmful for him. All his good virtues go for a big toss.

The "associates of Vivek" mean the different aspects and components of the virtue of wisdom that together help a person to decide what is righteous and what is not when he is given a choice between two situations or things or deeds. When Kamdeo became dominant, this ability vanished.

Let us examine this phenomenon from the metaphysical perspective of the Upanishads. The body of a living being consists of three basic components: viz. the gross body, the subtle body and the causal body. The 'gross body' consists of the external organs of perception (ears, nose, eyes, tongue, skin) and action (hands, legs, mouth, genital and excretory). The gross organs are under the control and command of the subtle body consisting of the Mana—i.e. the heart and the mind. Kamdeo (which term refers to the emotions of passion, lust, love, desires and yearnings, and sentiments attached to them) has his seat in the heart, while the mind is the seat of wisdom (Vivek) and intelligence (Buddhi). As long as the mind remains in charge, everything runs fine. When, on the other hand, the emotions symbolising Kamdeo take over and force the mind (wisdom and intellect) to retreat, the things take a bad turn for the creature and his well-being. A creature under the influence of Kamdeo is tempted towards the comfort and pleasure of the sense organs and their respective objects in the material world, desiring self gratification and indulgences with no holds.

A life without the active control of wisdom and intellect becomes animal-like and degenerated. Kamdeo forces the creature to barter his long term spiritual welfare for short term sensual pleasures and comforts that come from the world and its sense objects.

Another interesting point to note is that the principles that governed Vivek are said to have hidden themselves in "pages of sacred or good books". This means that at the point of time when Kamdeo unleashed his reign of moral terror and turpitude, the codes of conduct for the society and principles of Dharma had already been ‘codified in writing, in the form of books’. This is why these principles and glorious traditions survived without distortion—because they had been written. Had they been still in the oral tradition of remaining as “Srutis”, we would have perhaps lost knowledge of all the good virtues that the scriptures originally contained; they would have been lost for good.

<sup>2</sup>All ordinary living beings have one head. Since the whole world had begun to toe the line of Kamdeo by becoming passionate, lustful, immodest and indulgent, those who were elderly in the society and still managed to retain their sense of thought and wisdom began to ponder as to why Kamdeo was still so angry, and why was he carrying a raised bow with a mounted arrow when he has already conquered the entire world? It meant that some formidable enemy of Kamdeo was still to be conquered by him. The “two heads” is simply a metaphoric way of saying that the still-unconquered enemy of Kamdeo is certainly not an ordinary member of the world; he must be an ‘extra-ordinary person like someone having two heads’.

Subtly this points fingers to Lord Shiva because till this point of time, Kaamdeo has not conquered Shiva, and sure enough Lord Shiva is definitely super-human and extra-ordinary even amongst the pantheon of gods. ]

दो०. जे सजीव जग अचर चर नारि पुरुष अस नाम ।

jē saajāva jaga acara cara nāri puruṣa asa nāma.

All the inhabitants of this living world—where they could move or could not move (such as the animals and the plants respectively), and who could be categorised as the ones who were ‘males’ and ones who were ‘females’—all of them came under the grip of Kamdeo. As a result, they abandoned self-restraint and propriety, became immodest and indulgent in sensual pleasures and comforts. (Doha no. 84)

[Note—Kamdeo, in Indian literary tradition, refers to a personification of such negative traits in a person’s character as being passionate, lustful, lascivious and promiscuous. The whole living world, whether it is the plant kingdom or the animal kingdom, is divided into two primary segments—the male and the female. In the scheme of things devised by the Creator, a union between the male and the female helps to keep the wheel of creation rolling forward without intervention of the Creator every now and then. This device freed the Creator from unnecessarily worrying about creating newer members to fill the gap in the world when its older members died. The Creator, in other words, made this gigantic machine of creation ‘self sustaining’.

In order to give effect to his grand plan to perpetuate his creation, the Creator created “Kamdeo”, i.e. a mutual attraction between the male and the female, which resulted in their union or conjunction, which in turn helped in procreation.

In order to keep things under control and maintain the ecological balance of Mother Nature, this Kamdeo was also subject to certain rules and laws as applied to other gods created by the supreme Creator. Till this point everything ran in an orderly fashion in accordance to the laws established by the creator Brahma to regulate and govern life in this world.

But the situation drastically changed when the same creator Brahma and all other gods needed the help of Kamdeo to enforce marriage upon Shiva who was steadfast in his vows of remaining a reclusive hermit submerged in meditation instead of marrying and raising a family. As we have read, this need arose due to the ascendance of the demon Tarkaasur who was making life hell for the gods (refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precedes Doha no. 82).

Special occasions require special actions and provisions of law. So, the gods and the creator Brahma were forced to give extra special powers and authority to Kaamdeo so that this difficult task—of making Shiva marry and produce an off spring who would kill the demon Tarkaasur—could be successfully accomplished.

If an unscrupulous and pervert man gets special powers, they go to his head, and he becomes tyrannical. This has happened with the demons (Tarkaasur and Ravana), and this happened with Kamdeo. And what was the result? It led to their ultimate downfall and elimination. The demons had all died, and so did Kamdeo (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87).]

nadīm̐ umagi ambudhi kahūṁ dhāīṁ. saṅgama karahim̐ talāva talāīṁ. 2.

[The following verses describe the situation that prevailed in this world when Kamdeo, the god who personifies lust, passion, desires and yearning for sensual gratification, spread his tentacles to embrace every form of life. Not only the members of the animal kingdom who are less likely to hide their innate desire for sensual gratification and longing for sex, but even the plants and other entities such as the rivers and lakes that usually do not show any visual signs of such desires too began to exhibit these traits in an immoral manner.]

Everyone (the animate creatures as well as the inanimate constituents of the world) were overcome with lust and passions. All desired sensual gratification and yearned for sexual pleasures. For instance, the branches of trees (considered to be a male gender) bowed to reach and touch the creepers (considered to be a female gender) as soon as they sighted the latter<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Rivers (considered to be a female gender) could not contain their passion, and therefore heaved in spate as they rushed towards the ocean (considered to be a male gender).

Even the lakes and ponds<sup>2</sup> broke all rules of Nature and overran their banks to meet each other to unite. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Usually the creeper moves up the trunk of a tree and wraps itself around the branches. But under the influence of Kamdeo, the branches lost their patience, and instead of waiting for the creepers to come up and wrap themselves around these branches, the latter bent down as soon as they saw the creepers so that they can touch them and caress them even while the creepers were still on the trunk of the tree.

<sup>2</sup>The lakes are larger water bodies as compared to the ponds. But both are of the same gender as primarily both exhibit the same basic characteristic feature of being static water bodies as compared to the river and the ocean which are flowing water bodies. Therefore, the lake and the pond are metaphors for the transgender or transsexual component of the world. Even these components of creation could not exercise restraint, and broke all norms of Nature to engage in union and embrace. This is indicated by the statement that the lakes and ponds broke the barrier of their banks and united.]

jaham̐ asi dasā jaranha kai baranī. kō kahi saka'i sacētana karanī. 3.
pasu pacchī nabha jala thalacārī. bha'ē kāmabasa samaya bisārī. 4.

When this was the lustful condition of the inanimate component of this world, who can say (i.e. who can describe in words) what could have been the condition of the animate component (consisting of the living beings)? [That is, when even the inanimate things such as the plants and trees, the rivers and the oceans, as well as the ponds and the lakes had shown such tendency towards lust and sensuousness, one can well imagine how promiscuous and lascivious the animate creatures would have been when Kamdeo had unleashed his rein of passion and lust and desire for sensual gratification in this world.] (3)

Every form of living being, whether they be animals or birds—those who lived and moved in the sky (such as the birds and insects), those who lived and moved on the earth (animals of all species) or in the water (aquatic animals and birds)—all of them were overcome with lustfulness and sensuousness, all became victims of passion and lust, all the time yearning for sensual pleasures irrespective of the time and the place. (4)

[Note—All living beings were so overwhelmed with a desire for sensual gratification and sexual pleasures that they lost all sense of propriety and morality, not bothering about whether or not it was the proper time to indulge in sexual activity, or if the place was suitable for such activities. Lust and passion had blinded everyone, both the animate as well as the inanimate components of this world.

It will be interesting to note that the sort of lustfulness and sensuousness that has been depicted here is also found later on in Ram Charit Manas when we read about the evil characters of Kaliyug in Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 99, and once again in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 100.]

मदन अंध व्याकुल सब लोका । निसि दिनु नहिं अवलोकहिं कोका ॥ ५ ॥ madana andha byākula saba lōkā. nisi dinu nahim̐ avalōkahim̐ kōkā. 5.

Blinded under the influence of Madan (Kamdeo), all the parts (components; segments; aspects; divisions; societies and races; all the living beings of every denomination as would be elaborated herein below) of the world had become restless and agitated due to the onslaught of desires, passions and lust.

Even the bird (“Kokaa”) paid no heed to the time of the day or night in its desire to unite with each other<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “bird” cited here is the male bird known as “Chakva” and its female counterpart known as “Chakvi”. They are the ruddy geese. The male and the female birds usually unite only during the day time, and they separate from each other as soon as night falls, though there is no physical barrier to separate them during the night. This is the law of Nature. But at the point of time when Kamdeo spread his vicious tentacles, even these bird-couples overran the laws of Nature and sought each other even during the night-time.

Another significant point is the use of the word “Koka”—which also means the womb, referring to the female genital organ as a whole. The science of sexual intercourse and child-bearing comes under the purview of the term “Koka”. This science is called the “Koka-Shastra”, the intricate knowledge pertaining to sexual intercourse and pregnancy. Hence, the word “Kokaa” itself is self-explanatory in the context of the subject matter being discussed here—i.e. sexual arousal that stokes passion and lust.

In short, these birds not only wanted to be together merely in physical terms but indulged in sexual intercourse and other types of sexual behaviour for most of the time while they were together, and in their lust they did not bother whether it was day or night.]

The gods, the demons, the ordinary human beings, the Kinnars (dancers of the heaven), the serpents (representing the reptiles), the evil spirits, the ghosts, the phantoms, the ogres and the vampires (6)---

---I (Yagyawalkya<sup>1</sup>) will refrain from narrating their condition because they are eternal slaves of passion and lust (and therefore they had a field day during the reign of Kaamdeo). (7)

What can I say about these above-mentioned creatures (who are naturally sensuous and prone to be passionate and lustful) when even the ‘Siddhas’ (mystics), the ‘Viraktas’ (those who had renounced the world and had taken the vow of leading a dispassionate life like that of a hermit or a monk), the ‘Maha-Munis’ (great and acclaimed hermits and sages) as well as the 'Jogis' (ascetics; renunciates) had given up their vows of self-restraint and dispassion, and had instead felt sad and miserable at being separated from partners<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 75.

<sup>2</sup>The mystics, the sages, the hermits, the mendicants, the monks, the ascetics and other such highly respected members of the society who had taken the vow of self-restraint, who were supposed to have voluntarily renounced the physical charms and temptations of the material world and had willingly overcome the desire for gratification of the sense organs, who had been held in high esteem by the world for their virtuous way of life and exemplary lifestyles—they too fell victim of lust and passion. If this was the condition of such exalted and respected people as listed in verse no. 8, one can imagine the state of moral degradation, social degeneration and mental turpitude that prevailed amongst those who were inherently passionate and lustful like the entities listed in verse no. 6 herein above.]

When even Yogis (ascetics) and Tapas (those who were practicing austerities and penance) had become a victim of Kaam (lust, passion and desire for sensual gratification) and were virtually possessed by these negative traits, what can be said of those who were naturally low-minded and inherently lustful and wicked. [When those who were highly self-restrained and observed continence in their lives had fallen victims of lust and passions, it is natural that those who were already lustful and passionate would slide further down and fall head on in the chasm of lasciviousness and promiscuity.] (Chanda line no. 1)

Those who had been as highly wise and enlightened as to have seen the supreme Brahm (the all-pervading Lord of creation and the cosmic Consciousness) in every creature and aspect of this world had now begun to see the world as being full of females<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

Women perceived the whole world as being full of men, and men saw the world as being full of women<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 3)

The magic played by Kamdeo lasted in the entire length and breath of the universe (world; creation) for a time period of approximately “two Dandas”<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1, and Chanda line no. 1 that precede Doha no. 99; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1 and 10 that precede Doha no. 100; and the general description of the era of Kaliyug as described from Doha no. 97—to Doha no. 102 Ka.

<sup>2</sup>The implied meaning is this: women and men had become so blind in their drive for seeking sensual pleasures, had become so extremely sensuousness, lustful and passionate that they did not distinguish between a legitimate relationship and illegitimate liaison. Sexual perversion and promiscuity ruled the land, and the people failed to distinguish between a mother and a father, a brother and a sister, a wife and a casual friend. No morality existed, and one felt free to have a sexual relationship with anyone with whom he or she took fancy.

<sup>3</sup>1 “Danda” = 1 hour. Hence, 2 Dandas = 2 hours. It ought to be noted here that these “2 Dandas” are only symbolic representation of time, with ‘1 Danda’ standing for ‘1 day’. Therefore, 2 Dandas refer to approximately 2 days.

In Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 86 herein below, it is said that the time during which this miracle happened was “two Gharis”. Now, 1 Ghari is technically equivalent to 24 minutes, but when used in poetry it can stand for a period of time that can be measured in minutes and has a component of 24 attached to it. Hence, 1 Ghari can mean a period of time that is equivalent to 24 hours (instead of 24 minutes), or ‘1 day’. Hence, “2 Gharis” would be roughly “2 days”.

It is said that the influence of Kamdeo extended throughout the whole universe or the entire creation. This means it was not limited to the earth, but extended to the heaven and the nether worlds also. Measurement of time on earth is different than in heaven. For instance, 1 day in the life of Brahma the creator who lives in heaven is equivalent to 1 Kalpa. In human years, 1 Kalpa is equivalent to 4.32 billion (4.32 x 109) years.

Thus, the main idea behind the time period mentioned in these verses is that the bad effect of Kamdeo’s intervention lasted for quite some time, but it was only a short duration when measuring it against the scale of creation which runs into millions and trillions of years. It may also mean that the promiscuity and lasciviousness propagated by Kamdeo was limited to one generation of creatures represented by a period of one day (i.e. one lifetime). That ended soon because Lord Shiva would burn Kamdeo to death, thus bringing the curtain down on the drama that Kamdeo had stage-managed to camouflage his attack on Shiva.]

No one was able to exercise self-restraint and practice vigilance upon one's sense organs because Kamdeo had usurped (or stolen) their power of wisdom and discrimination. [Under the onslaught of passion and lust unleashed by Kamdeo, all the creatures of the world forgot to exercise caution in their actions and deeds, throwing all prudence and propriety to the wind as they indulged in sexual perversion, lustfulness and promiscuity.]

Verily, only those who enshrined Lord Ram in their hearts, and upon whom the brave Lord of the Raghus ("Raghubir") was benevolent, were able to successfully tide over these bad times and emerged unscathed and unharmed. [To wit, only those people who had thoroughly cleansed their inner-self and had enshrined Lord Ram, the Supreme Being, in their hearts were able to stand against the moral storm created by Kamdeo. Such people successfully maintained their inner calm and got protection from Lord Ram who ensures that his devotee is not offended by Kamdeo, nor affected by any other worldly taints. Rest of the people fell in the vicious trap laid by Kamdeo.] (Sortha no. 85)

[Note—Refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 126 that asserts the same idea that when Lord Ram is a protector of someone, no power in this creation can harm even a single hair of such a person.

Refer also to "Geetawali", Ayodhya Kand, line no. 11 of verse no. 49.]

चौ०. उभय घरी अस कौतुक भयऊ । जौ लगि कामु संभु पहिं गयऊ ॥ १ ॥

caupāī.

ubhaya gharī asa kautuka bhaya'ū. jau lagi kāmu sambhu pahim gaya'ū. 1.

*This wonderful miracle (of the entire world becoming lustful and promiscuous without any sort of reservation) lasted for roughly two Gharis<sup>1</sup>, the time it took Kaamdeo to reach Shambhu (Lord Shiva).

[*This verse can be interpreted as follows also: The wonder that struck the world under the influence of Kamdeo lasted for two Gharis while he (Kaamdeo) prepared his strategy for approaching Lord Shambhu to achieve his objective of disturbing the latter's meditation.] (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Technically, the word "Ghari" means an hour, and hence "two Gharis" mean 'two hours'. But it is a metaphoric way of saying that the wild influence of Kamdeo lasted for a length of time that is equivalent to two hours on earth in a relative way. That is, it could mean two days, or a period of time that was equivalent to two hours when measured according to the scale used in the heaven—which may mean a long time on earth. For clarification, please see a note appended to Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 85.

*Kamdeo had to plan his attack on Lord Shiva properly so that he succeeds in disturbing the Lord's meditation so that he wakes up. Then the gods would go and request him to marry. Kamdeo could not afford to fail in this venture, because no one else would be able to inject in the heart of Lord Shiva a desire to marry other than Kamdeo. As has been explained earlier, Kamdeo had to prepare a background that would be conducive to his campaign just like a clever strategist prepares a comprehensive plan to succeed. The time that elapsed between Kamdeo taking his leave from the gods and going on his mission, and his actually reaching Lord Shiva was approximately two Gharis as cited here. This was the time when lasciviousness and promiscuity spread like a moral contagious disease throughout the length and breadth of the world.]

सिवहि बिलोकि ससंकेउ मारू । भयउ जथाथिति सबु संसारू ॥ २ ॥
 भए तुरत सब जीव सुखारे । जिमि मद उतरि गएँ मतवारे ॥ ३ ॥

sivahi bilōki sasankē'u mārū. bhaya'u jathāthiti sabu sansārū. 2.
 bha'ē turata saba jīva sukhārē. jimi mada utari ga'ēm̐ matavārē. 3.

As soon as Kamdeo saw Lord Shiva, he was so scared that all his enthusiasm vanished, his zeal ebbed, and he felt crestfallen and limp (like a deflated balloon or a flaccid and shrunken flower)<sup>1</sup>. And as soon as this happened, the world regained its earlier composure and stability of the mind and heart<sup>2</sup>. (2)

As soon as stability returned and the restlessness caused by the fire of lust and passion that was aroused by Kamdeo doused itself, all the Jivas (living beings) became calm and happy just like a drunken person who feels relieved when his intoxicated feeling subsides and his severe hangover ends<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kamdeo had a premonition of death when the gods had asked him to go and disturb Lord Shiva's meditation—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 84.

Remember: It is very dangerous to disturb an ascetic's meditation, and it a sure way of inviting his wrath. When Kamdeo saw Lord Shiva sitting in deep meditation, a chill ran down his spine, and he was sure that he is playing with fire. Just as fire is unforgiving, Shiva's wrath would certainly be ruinous for Kamdeo. The Lord's formidable personality and his awe-inspiring posture adopted during meditation were chilling like ice.

<sup>2</sup>The negative quality of lust, passion, lasciviousness, promiscuity and sexual perversion makes a man weak in his heart, anxious in his mind, and wobbly in his knees. He loses his strength that comes with morality and good character, and instead of being bold, straightforward and outgoing he becomes sly, deceitful, surreptitious and scheming, suspicious of all around him and losing faith in his own self as well as others. It is just like a thief who wishes to hide his real intentions when interacting with the world, and is always suspicious of everyone around him. Surely, one cannot expect to have mental peace and calmness of the heart in this condition. Immoral conduct keeps pricking at the sub-conscious mind of all the creatures, robbing them of their happiness and peace. They are filled with unending anxiety and restlessness.

So, as soon as Kamdeo, who is the patron god ruling over these negative trait of lust and passion and their attendant problems which make a creature overactive and fidgety, felt terrified on seeing Lord Shiva's majestic form while the Lord was submerged in deep meditation, the dare-devilry in his heart subsided and he felt flaccid and limp like a shrunken flower or a deflated balloon. This effect cascaded down to all the creatures, affecting their behaviour: all their enthusiasm and zeal towards sexual inclinations immediately ebbed and abated like a river whose source of water has suddenly gone dry, or a balloon from which the air suddenly escapes.

<sup>3</sup>If a man, who has not drunk wine in his life, is made to gulp down a glass of the intoxicating liquid, he feels very uneasy till the time the drink remains inside his system. As soon as the after-effects of wine ends, or if the drunken man is able to vomit the alcohol out and take some rest to recover himself, he feels light, fresh and rejuvenated. He vows never to fall in the trap again, or ever try to taste an unknown liquid out of fear.

The same thing happened here. As soon as Kamdeo felt scared, the negative traits he represented, such as passion and lust, suddenly became limp and lustre-less throughout the world. All the creatures who were intoxicated with this 'drug' suddenly found its effect neutralised. Their zeal and dare-devilry towards sexual behaviour and sensuousness caused by the arousing effects of Kamdeo suddenly subsided. This brought peace and calm to their restless mind and heart. Then the creatures realised that they had been virtually taken for a ride by Kamdeo, and they thanked Lord Shiva for restoring their peace and happiness once again.]

phirata lāja kachu kari nahīṁ jāī. maranu ṭhāni mana racēsī upāī. 5.

When Madan (Kamdeo) saw Rudra (the angry form of Shiva)<sup>1</sup>, he was terrified. He realised that the Lord God (i.e. Lord Shiva) was too formidable and majestic to be overcome (conquered and swayed from his posture of meditation). (4)

Kamdeo was in a quandary, uncertain of what to do: To return empty-handed (i.e. to fail in his mission of disturbing Shiva's meditation) was a shameful act, and it was a virtually impossible task to wake Shiva from his meditative trance (without inviting the Lord's wrath).

Deciding that death was now a foregone conclusion (because returning without accomplishing the assigned task was humiliating, and it was not possible to disturb Shiva without inviting his anger), Kamdeo contemplated in his Mana (mind and heart) and decided upon a course of action. (5)

[Note—1The use of the word "Rudra" here is significant. Lord Shiva has many names, and "Rudra" is one of them. "Rudra" is a synonym for anger and wrathfulness. So here it means Kamdeo was terrified to his bare bone because he was facing a formidable Lord who was a personified form of anger. To make matters worse for Kamdeo, going back without waking Lord Shiva was a humiliating option as the gods would laugh at his failure. Disturbing Shiva was like playing with fire of anger, and it was sure to invite the Lord's wrath with a vengeance.]

[Lord Shiva was meditating in the serene and barren part of the snow-covered mountains where there was complete silence and no form of disturbance. Now we shall read that Kamdeo converted that area into a vibrant and lush-green forest having flowering trees bearing colourful and scented flowers, complete with chirping birds and humming insects, a fragrant breeze blowing softly, and gurgling brooks singing their own melody. He did this in order to create disturbance to Shiva, but failed in his endeavour.]

Kaamdeo immediately created the pleasant spring season which is regarded as the king of seasons. Rows of young trees that were laden with fragrant flowers of varying colours and shapes sprouted everywhere<sup>1</sup>. (6)

There were lush-green forests and gardens, water-filled ponds and lakes everywhere, in every direction so much so that all the parts and divisions of the world became exceptionally charming and enthralling for the senses. (7)

The Nature appeared to be overflowing with the emotions of love and passion. It looks so delightful and tempting that it aroused passion and longing even in the heart of dead souls (i.e. lifeless entities). (8)

[Note—Being a poet, Tulsidas was an expert describer of the beauty of Nature. His expertise comes to the fore when we read Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17 where he describes the tempting beauty of the mountain where Lord Ram had stayed for four months in Kishkindha in his wait for the rainy season to end so that efforts can be launched to search for Sita, his wife who was abducted by the demon king Ravana.

Another sterling example is Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 39—to Doha no. 40 where he describes the tempting beauty of lake Pampaa where Lord Ram stayed for a while after meeting the old woman devotee called Sabari.

*Even those who were lifeless and gross by nature (i.e. the inanimate entities of creation) were aroused by passion. The stunning beauty and temptation of the surroundings were so immense that they cannot be narrated in words.

[*This verse can also be read as follows: The forest and its surroundings were so beautiful and charming that it tempted the mind and heart of all those residing there so much so that even the lifeless entities were aroused and showed signs of passionate life.] (Chanda line no. 1)

The breeze that blew was cool, fragrant and soft<sup>1</sup>. It stoked the fire of passion and lust like a true companion of Kamdeo. No matter how hard Kamdeo and his army of followers<sup>1</sup> tried to disturb Shiva's meditative trance with all the nasty tricks they were aware of, they failed miserably in their nefarious designs.

This utter defeat infuriated the god of passion who lives in a subtle manner in the hearts of all living beings<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 86)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kaamdeo's followers are the tempting features of Nature listed in the above verses—viz. fragrant and colourful flowers, breeze that is cool, sweet-scented and soft, lush-green gardens and forests laden with trees bearing flowers and succulent fruits, dancing and singing birds, insects and damsels, water bodies that lure a person with their cool and crystal clear nectar-like water, and so on and so forth.

These verses tell us how difficult it is to be able to remain dispassionate and detached when one is surrounded by a world of immense physical charm. These countless charms of the world are like the symbolic army of Kamdeo.

These verses also tell us that when an ascetic is submerged in meditation he is unconcerned about his surroundings, and the bliss and peace that he gets when he reaches higher stages of transcendental existence during meditation are more robust and sustainable as compared to the pleasures and comforts obtained from the objects of this material world. Therefore, an ascetic is unmoved by the temptations of the world just like Lord Shiva remaining steadfast in his meditation in spite of all the tricks that Kamdeo played to disturb him.

<sup>2</sup>This is a very important point: It tells us that Kamdeo resides in our own selves, inside our own hearts, and not somewhere in the imaginary heaven or outside world. It is a warning to all of us to be wary of negative traits as lust and passions that may lead to ruin and rob a person's peace and calm if the person falls in their trap and fails to exercise self-restraint. Kamdeo is an integral part of every living being's nature just like the virtues of wisdom and the ability to discriminate between the good and the bad is. So long as Kamdeo is kept under check he will not attack a person and leave him in peace. But should one become careless, Kamdeo will attack with viciousness. He is like a resident enemy who hits from within.]

Madan (Kamdeo) saw a thick green branch of a mango tree<sup>1</sup>. He climbed it angrily<sup>2</sup> (because he was determined to wreak vengeance upon Lord Shiva for spurning all his efforts to be lured and fall in his trap, and remaining steady in his meditation). (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kamdeo had climbed the branch of a mango tree for three reasons: One was that he wished to hide himself and shoot his arrow at Lord Shiva from a secure place where the chances of his getting located or traced were remote. So he hid himself behind thick foliage of the mango tree. The other reason is that Kamdeo wanted a vantage point from where he could properly see and aim at Shiva who was meditating quietly at some place. And the third reason is that the mango fruit is very sweet and succulent, and it is a metaphor that fits in well with the enticing lure of passion and lust which Kamdeo stood for in a symbolic way.

<sup>2</sup>Kamdeo was angry because this was the first time that he faced the humiliating prospect of failure. The gods had assigned him the task of waking up Lord Shiva from his meditative trance, and inspite of all his best of efforts Kamdeo had failed to move Shiva. Kamdeo had prided himself as being invincible when it came to luring a creature into the honey-trap of passions and lust as is proved by the fact that even the wisest of sages and hermits had fallen victims to his schemes as is clearly narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line no. 1 that precede Doha no. 85.

Now, he would have to face scorn and ridicule at the hands of his peers if he went back and told the gods that he accepts defeat. The gentleman who has defeated him for the first time in his life was Shiva, and it was too much for Kamdeo to bear this failure. This filled him with enmity for Shiva.

From a broader perspective the message in this verse is clear that passions and lust are so great an evil thing that if their intentions are not met they turn hostile towards the person harbouring them, making him or her frustrated and agitated to such an extent that all sense of propriety and wisdom abandon him or her, and this leads to the ruin of the person as was the case with Kamdeo who lost control over himself and was ultimately punished by Lord Shiva who killed him by burning him to death.]

Kamdeo mounted his arrow on the bow made of flowers<sup>1</sup>, and angrily looking towards Shiva he pulled the string back to his ears<sup>2</sup>. (2)

Then he shot his formidable sharp arrow which went and slammed at the heart of Lord Shiva. Being thus hit, Lord Shiva woke up from his meditative trance. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 83 and its accompanying note.

<sup>2</sup>During the epic war at Lanka between Lord Ram and the demon king Ravana, when Lord Ram had become very angry he too had shot fierce arrows at Ravana by pulling the string of his bow right back to his ears to give stronger thrust to the arrow so that it moved ahead with great speed and struck at the object with intense force—refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Doha no. 91.

And to be angry at one's enemy and adversary is a common feature in any war-like situation. Even Lord Ram had lost his patience with Ravana during the heat of battle and had become very angry and wrathful—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 91.]

भयउ ईस मन छोभु बिसेषी । नयन उघारि सकल दिसि देखी ॥ ४ ॥

bhaya'u īsa mana chōbhū bisēṣī. nayana ughāri sakala disi dēkhī. 4.

Lord Shiva's heart was filled with extreme annoyance at being so rudely disturbed from his meditation. Angrily he opened his eyes and looked in all the direction to locate the person who had dared to interfere with his meditation and agitate his eternally calm and peaceful mind. (4)

सौरभ पल्लव मधनु बिलोका । भयउ कोपु कंपेउ त्रैलोका ॥ ५ ॥

तब सिवँ तीसर नयन उघारा । चितवत कामु भयउ जरि छारा ॥ ६ ॥

saurabha pallava madanu bilōkā. bhaya'u kōpu kampē'u trailōkā. 5.

taba sivaṁ tīsara nayana ughārā. citavata kāmu bhaya'u jari chārā. 6.

When he (Shiva) saw Kaamdeo hiding behind the leaves of the mango tree, the Lord flew into a ferocious rage<sup>1</sup> so much so that the entire world consisting of three divisions (viz. the earth, the heaven and the nether world) trembled with fear. (5)

Then Shiva wrathfully opened his legendary 'third eye'<sup>2</sup> (located in his forehead) and sternly looked towards Kamdeo. This third eye spewed a tongue of fire which immediately reduced Kamdeo to ashes. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva is an ascetic, and an ascetic has the unique character of being as calm, cool and tranquil as the surface of a placid lake. But at the same time, an ascetic should not be taken for granted and played fools with, because his nature is like the fire element which may remain dormant and is always beneficial for the living world, but it erupts in a fierce rage if stoked and prodded to rise up, unleashing its anger by reducing everything to ashes.

In spite of this observation, Shiva is renowned to be calm and peaceful Lord, the very embodiment of the virtues of mercy and compassion. Then why did he become furious at Kamdeo? Shiva was repaying Kamdeo with the same currency the latter had used to trap the former; Shiva was paying Kamdeo with the same coin which the latter had used against the Lord. Shiva was merely reciprocating Kaamdeo's attitude or behaviour towards him.

And what was this attitude or behaviour? It was 'anger'. Kaamdeo was 'angry' at Shiva at the time of shooting his arrow at the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 87. So Shiva also hit back with 'anger'. Kamdeo had used the best weapon he had in his arsenal—the arrow. Therefore, Shiva too used the best weapon he had in his possession—and it was the fire spewing from his third eye. It is another matter that in such a duel it is the warrior with the stronger weapon who wins: hence, Shiva won the battle of wits with Kamdeo!

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva's two conventional eyes represent the Sun and the Moon, while the 'third eye' represents the fire element that burns all forms of corruptions and perversions prevalent in this world and purifies it from its impurities. That is why it is called the 'eye of wisdom'—the eye that helps a creature to eliminate all forms of delusions and its attendant moral corruption and evil tendencies so that his mind and heart becomes holy and pure.

The possession of the third eye has entitled Lord Shiva to be called 'Trinetrum', the Lord with three eyes.]

हाहाकार भयउ जग भारी । डरपे सुर भए असुर सुखारी ॥ ७ ॥
समुझि कामसुखु सोचहिं भोगी । भए अकंटक साधक जोगी ॥ ८ ॥

hāhākāra bhaya'u jaga bhārī. ḍarapē sura bha'ē asura sukhārī. 7.
samujhi kāmasukhu sōcahiṁ bhōgī. bha'ē akaṇṭaka sādhaḥa jōgī. 8.

As soon as Kamdeo was reduced to ashes, a wail of lamentation resounded through the world which instilled fear in the heart of gods (i.e. they were alarmed) while the demons felt happy and gratified<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The thought of having to lose the pleasure derived from sensual gratification and sexual fulfilment made those who were passionate and lustful by their nature sad, whereas spiritual aspirants and ascetics for whom such temptations were causing a lot of misery and headache were relieved because this tormenting thorn was removed from their way<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why were the gods alarmed and scared, while the demons felt happy? Here's the answer: The gods had sent Kaamdeo to wake Shiva up from his meditation so that the latter could be married and produce a son who would kill the demon Tarkasur (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 83). But unfortunately Shiva has burnt Kaamdeo who was the patron deity of love and passion. This being the case, it became very difficult to make Shiva fall in love with Parvati and be passionate enough to produce a son from her.

Another reason for the gods feeling afraid is that they apprehended that when Shiva comes to realise, sooner or later, that it was at the behest of the gods that Kaamdeo had disturbed him, he would surely punish the entire pantheon of gods as he had once done earlier when he (Shiva) had sent his disciple Virbhadrā to punish the gods because they had tacitly supported Dakṣa Prajapati by participating in the fire sacrifice organised by him though Dakṣa had insulted Shiva. Virbhadrā had beaten the gods mercilessly without exception, and had chased them away (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 65). So now, the gods feared that the same fate awaits them once again when Shiva comes to know the facts.

The reason for the demons feeling glad is now they were sure that Shiva would not fall in the honey-trap of marriage and loving a woman, and without these preconditions being fulfilled there was no chance of him ever producing a son who would kill them (the demons) as prophesied by Brahma (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 82).

<sup>2</sup>The innate desires for physical comfort and pleasure, for self gratification and seeking happiness from the gross sense objects of this material world that are present in every human being are very strong and too difficult to resist and overcome.

Ascetics and hermits are supposed to lead an austere life marked by renunciation, detachment and dispassion; they are supposed to exercise exemplary self-control over all their instincts and impulses. Kamdeo constantly plays spoil-sport with them. Since Kamdeo resides in the heart of all living beings, he keeps nudging at the ascetics and hermits, instigating these ascetics and hermits to waver from their vows of austerity and penance, and instead swerve towards the basic pleasures and comforts that are sought after by their sense organs. Once Kamdeo, their greatest hidden enemy, was destroyed, the ascetics, hermits and other spiritual aspirants felt that the greatest ‘thorn’ or hurdle was removed from their path.

On the other hand, those creatures who were not spiritually inclined but preferred to wallow in the slushy world of lust and passion felt miserably because their protector and patron Kamdeo was no more. Who will now support them; how will they now enjoy sensuous pleasures of the world once their hearts had become bereft of passions and lust and their driving force, the god of love and passion known as Kamdeo? This worried such creatures a lot.]

 prabhu āsutōṣa kṛpāla siva abalā nirakhi bōlē sahī. 4.

[The first line of this Chanda picks up the thread from the last line no. 8 of the previous set of Chaupais by citing the ascetics who felt glad that Kamdeo had been destroyed by their patron deity, Lord Shiva, because the former had been constantly disturbing them during their meditation sessions.]

The ascetics (“Yogis”) felt that a great thorn had been removed from their way. When Rati<sup>1</sup>, the consort of Kamdeo, heard or learnt of the ill fate of her husband (that he had died when Shiva burnt him to ashes)<sup>2</sup>, she fainted. (Chanda line no. 1)

Wailing loudly and lamenting in various ways, she approached Lord Shiva. (Chanda line no. 2)

She joined her hands in prayerful supplication and most humbly stood before the Lord (in a silent gesture asking the Lord to show mercy, compassion, kindness and grace upon her as well as her husband). (Chanda line no. 3)

The merciful and gracious Lord Ashutosh Shiva (i.e. Lord Shiva who is easy to please and eternally contented)<sup>3</sup> observed the lady standing before him helplessly and in abject despair. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Rati is said to be a daughter of Daksha Prajapati because she was born from the sweat of his body. She was believed to be the most beautiful damsel in creation. She aroused passion and lust even in the hearts of gods, and hence she got the name “Rati” which means sensual arousal.

<sup>2</sup>It is said here that Rati ‘heard or learnt of the ill fate of Kamdeo’. This means she was not present at the site where her husband, Kamdeo, was causing nuisance to Shiva. The question is: how did Rati come to know that her husband has died? The first sign is given in Chanda line no. 1 itself—she learnt of it when she saw or heard that the ascetics had become happy because a thorn from their way was removed. These ascetics must have applauded Lord Shiva for having killed Kamdeo so that the latter would no more disturb them.

Then there was another reason also: as soon as Kaamdeo was reduced to ashes, there was uproar in the world—especially amongst the gods: refer—Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 87 herein above. Rati lived in the heaven, and surely this news could not have remained hidden from her.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Shiva is an ascetic par excellence. He is a patron deity of ascetics. Therefore he possesses all the eclectic virtues that an ascetic is supposed to possess, and being eternally contented and easy to be pleased are some of Shiva’s wonderful qualities. Though he had burnt Kamdeo for the mischief the latter committed, Shiva harboured no personal enmity with him—as a true hermit and ascetic who harbours no personal ill-will against anyone in this world. Kamdeo had invited trouble himself, and Shiva immediately regained his composure after punishing him.

The gracious, kind, merciful and compassionate nature of the Lord is evident from the very fact that Rati had no fear while approaching him directly immediately after the Lord had burnt her husband to death in a fit of anger. Rati was not terrified that the same fate would await her if she dared to come close to Shiva in the immediate aftermath of his angrily burning her husband to death—because she was aware of Shiva’s merciful and compassionate nature. She knew full well that his anger vanished as quickly as it came. She also was certain that the Lord would not punish her for the misdemeanours of her husband, and on the contrary he would surely bless her if she gathered courage to go and plead with him.

Rati was not to be let down in her confidence as she is fully rewarded for her humility and courage. It so transpired that Shiva blessed her that she would be reunited with her dear husband during the incarnation of Lord Vishnu as Lord Krishna—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow Doha no. 87 herein below.

Another significant point to note here is that Rati has not uttered a word, but has simply bowed before the Lord and stood silently in prayerful submission. Shiva learnt what was in her heart even without her saying anything. In the context of recent developments, Shiva needed no words to understand why Rati had come. Another important message here is that one need not express his wishes to the Lord God in explicit terms because the Lord knows every thought and every emotion that arises in the mind and heart of all the creatures.

In other words, ‘silence is the best form of prayer one can say to the Lord God’.]

Lord Shiva told her—‘Rati, from now onwards your husband shall live without a physical body. He will be known as “Ananga”—one without any physical organs. He will dominate all the creatures in this subtle form (without a physical body)<sup>1</sup>.

Now listen to the way you will meet and be united with him once again. (Doha no. 87)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>That is why, Kamdeo is said to reside in the heart of all living beings in an invisible form by way of the emotions of love, passion and desire for gratification. In this form, Kamdeo became all-pervading and omnipresent throughout the length and breadth of creation.

The way Rati would meet her husband once again is narrated in detail in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 10, Canto 55. A brief outline is summarised in the following verse nos. 1-2 herein below.]

kṛṣṇa tanaya hō'ihī pati tōrā. bacanu an'yathā hō'i na mōrā. 2.

Lord Shiva told Rati—‘When the Lord (Vishnu) will manifest himself as Lord Krishna in the clan (family) of Yadus (of Vrindavan) for the purpose of removing (eliminating) the burden of the earth (just like the case of Lord Ram’s incarnation in the race of king Raghu of Ayodhya) (1)---

---Your husband would be born as Krishna’s son (named “Pradumna”). [In other words, Krishna’s son would be your husband.]<sup>1</sup>

My words don’t go in vain<sup>2</sup>. [Therefore, please have patience and wait till that time, and be assured that you will be reunited with your husband Kamdeo at that time.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The story of Pradumna and his marriage with Rati is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat Maha-Puran, Skandha 10, Uttaraardha, Canto 55. This story in brief is this:

Krishna’s son named ‘Pradumna’ was stolen by the demon named ‘Shambraasur’ from his parent’s home while still he was an infant of 10 days. Shambraasur threw the infant in the ocean to kill him. Luckily, one huge fish gulped him down. This fish was caught by fishermen who were surprised at its huge size. So they decided to gift it to their king Shambraasur to please him. When his cook cut the abdomen of this fish in order to cook it, he saw the child cocooned inside it. He gave the child to the head of the royal kitchen, a lady named ‘Mayawati’. This lady was actually Rati who was waiting to be reunited with her husband Kamdeo.

At that moment, the celestial sage Narad arrived and informed her about this child being Kamdeo. Mayawati took proper care of Pradumna till he grew up. She enlightened him about everything—his past life and who she was. She taught him the secret way of killing Shambraasur by using Maya (delusions and deceit).

After freeing themselves from the clutches of this demon, both Mayawati and Pradumna went to Rukmani, the consort of Lord Krishna and narrated the entire episode to her. Pradumna's parents, Lord Krishna and Rukmani, were very happy on seeing their son once again. In due course of time, Pradumna was married to Mayawati who had saved his life.

<sup>2</sup>When Manu and Satrupa had done Tapa to have the rare privilege of seeing Lord Vishnu as their son, the Lord had revealed himself before them and had assured them that he will become their son as desired by them. The Lord had told them that there is no doubt that this will happen as he is true to his words just like Shiva telling Rati that what he has told her would really come true. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 152.]

Now, let me narrate the story after this episode. (3)

The gods heard all the news. [In fact, they were anxiously waiting for the news of Shiva waking up from his meditative trance.] All of them, including Brahma the creator, went to Vaikuntha (which is the abode of Lord Vishnu). (40)

Then, all of them, including Brahma and Vishnu, went to the place where Lord Shiva, who is an ocean of mercy, compassion and kindness, was present. (5)

The Lord who is like an ocean of mercy, compassion, grace and kindness, and whose standard (flag) has the emblem of a Bull, asked the gods—‘Say, why have you all immortal beings (a reference to the assembled gods) come here?’ (7)

Vidhi (the creator Brahma) spoke on the behalf of all the gods<sup>1</sup>, ‘Oh Lord, you are all-knowing and well aware of the inner thoughts of everyone because you reside in the inner-self of all (i.e. you are “Antar-yaami”; one who lives in the inner-self of all living beings). So, though you know what is in our heart, I shall still pray to you to express our ‘Bhakti’ (devotion and respect) for you. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Brahma was the senior-most amongst the gods. He was old and wise. So the gods had made him their spokesman.

Vishnu did not say anything. Why? It is because Vishnu, in his manifested form of Lord Ram, had already requested Shiva to marry Parvati who had done severe Tapa to be accepted by the Shiva as his consort—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 76 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8. So, Lord Vishnu preferred to be discreet and kept quiet. When the gods’ spokesman Brahma was pleading their case with Shiva, it was civil to let him present the case of the gods without unnecessary interference.

Another reason why Brahma chose to act as the spokesman for the gods is given in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 83. It is said here that Brahma assured the gods that once Kamdeo successfully wakes Shiva from his meditation, he will go and pray to Shiva to get married.]

[To wit, the gods want to enjoy the spectacle of seeing you married. They want to witness this auspicious and happy occasion and participate in your marriage ceremony.] (Doha no. 88)

Oh Lord who has trounced the pride of Madan (Kamdeo)<sup>1</sup>! Please let our eyes feast on the wonderful spectacle of your marriage. Please do whatever is appropriate so that we can have the privilege of seeing the ceremony of your marriage till our eyes feel contented (and we can fully enjoy the spectacle by witnessing the ceremony ourselves). (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva had vanquished Kamdeo's pride of being able to detract everyone in this creation without exception from their vow of self-restraint over their natural instincts of passion and lust. Kamdeo had failed to arouse lust and passion in Shiva as he had successfully done with even the sages, seers, hermits and ascetics on the one hand, and gods etc. on the other hand. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 85.

No one had dared to confront Kamdeo, and all became an easy victim of his nefarious design, except Shiva. Shiva had burnt Kamdeo because the latter was breaking all barriers and had become reckless and uncontrolled. If Kamdeo was not punished, the moral fabric of the entire creation would lie in tatters. The moral decline had already started, and the downward slide was rapid. But it was still not too late and a break had to be applied. Though the current generation had become depraved and pervert, but the future generations could be saved. Lord Shiva thought that it was his moral obligation to eliminate Kamdeo whose behaviour was no different from the demons. The system established by the scriptures for the regulation of the society and proper conduct of its members had crumbled under the onslaught of Kamdeo just like it was under the rule of the demons. This will be clear when we compare the events that unfolded in the world under the influence of Kamdeo as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 84 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4, with the developments under the rule of the demons led by their king Ravana as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 183—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 184.

In this context, it will be interesting to read note no. 1 appended to Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 87 herein above.]

Oh Lord who is like an ocean of mercy and kindness! You had done a very good thing by blessing Rati (that she would be reunited with her husband once again) after having burnt Kaamdeo<sup>1</sup>. (2)

Oh Lord, it is natural habit for you to first punish the guilty and the culprit, and then show mercy and compassion upon him<sup>2</sup>. [We, the gods, honestly appreciate this virtue in you; it shows that you are worthy to be honoured by the title of a 'Maha-Deva', the 'Great God' of creation. You are like an Emperor, punishing the guilty but harbouring no personal enmity or ill-will against anyone whatsoever. It also shows your inherent nature of being eternally forgiving and merciful.] (3)

<sup>2</sup>It shows that you have followed the established doctrine of judicious governance, administration and polity that the guilty should first be punished and then mercy and compassion should be shown towards him. You are a senior God, the ‘Maha-Dev’, and therefore you are like an Emperor of the entire world. Hence it was necessary for you to punish Kamdeo because he had exceeded our brief to him—which was merely to ensure that you woke up from your meditation so that we can arrange for your marriage. And oh Lord, we did not wish to play fools with you by disturbing you in your meditation, but were forced to do so because a demon named Tarkasur has wreaked havoc on the world and it is so destined that he can only be killed by your son. How was this to be realised if you didn’t marry and remained all the time immersed in meditation and contemplation? That’s why we had no option but to make you get married, and for this waking you up from your meditation was obligatory.

But in any case, we hadn’t asked Kamdeo to insult you by becoming angry at you and shooting an arrow at you as if you were his enemy. If he had failed in his mission, he could have come back to us and told us that it was not possible for him to wake you up. Then we, the gods, would have devised some other means. Instead of adopting a straightforward approach, Kamdeo felt that his pride and ego were hurt, and he trespassed all laws and regulations by shooting an arrow angrily at a meditating ascetic. This is surely not acceptable and needed to be punished.

Not limiting himself to playing mischief with you and becoming angry at you, which in itself was a despicable deed, this fellow Kamdeo had violated all norms of proper behaviour by unnecessarily disturbing the entire world by becoming angry at even the innocent creatures of the world (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 84), and had pushed the whole world on the brink of moral degradation by unleashing lust, passions, lasciviousness and promiscuity in every entity of this creation, whether it was a mortal living being or an inanimate thing on earth, or the immortal gods in heaven (refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 85). It was absolutely necessary to punish him for otherwise the edifice of Dharma (proper and ethical behaviour) that I, the creator Brahma, had so assiduously established, would have crumbled and fallen apart.

Therefore, you have done nothing wrong by burning Kamdeo. It is to your immense credit and a measure of your compassionate and merciful nature that in spite of showing anger at Kamdeo, you had immediately calmed down and blessed his wife Rati that her husband would be restored to her in his next life as the son of Lord Krishna (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 88). This is really wonderful and highly laudable.]

<sup>2</sup>Brahma had earlier advised the gods that when Kaamdeo is successful in waking Shiva up from his Samadhi (meditative trance), he (Brahma) would accompany the other gods to request Shiva to marry Parvati and beget a son who would kill the demon Tarkasur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 83.]

Hearing the words (request) of Bidhi (Brahma, the god who determines the destiny of all living beings in this creation) and recalling the words of the Lord (i.e. of Lord Ram who had also asked Shiva to marry Parvati<sup>1</sup>), Shiva agreed and said—‘Alright, so be it. It shall happen as you wish (or say).’ (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 77.]

Cheer rang out in the rank and file of the gods. Excited and exhilarated, they sounded their kettle-drums enthusiastically, showering flowers and applauding in a loud chorus—‘Hail the Lord of the gods. Glory be to you!’ (6)

Realising that it was the proper time, the seven celestial sages known as the Saptarishis came there. Bidhi (Brahma) immediately sent them to the home of Giri, the father of Parvati (to convey the good news and ask him to prepare for the marriage of Shiva with Parvati). (7)

The Saptarishis first went to the place where Bhavaani (Parvati) was (instead of going to her father's place as asked by Brahma)<sup>1</sup>. When they reached there, they spoke to her sweetly but with cunning in their words<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be noted here that Parvati was living at her parent's home at the time Sapta-rishis met her for the second time to test her faith and devotion for Lord Shiva as will be narrated in the verses that follow below. She was brought home by her father after he was instructed to do so by the same Sapta-rishis when they had tested her at the end of her successful Tapa—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 82.

The question is: why did the Sapta-rishis not go straight to Giri, Parvati's father, as asked by Brahma, but instead went to Parvati? Well, they wished to be absolutely certain about Parvati's devotion, faith and steadfastness in her vows of marrying Shiva. Perhaps it is also possible that Shiva had quietly, by a wink of his eyes, hinted to them to go and test Parvati's loyalty once again, to be doubly sure and counter-check the facts.

This being so, the next question is: why would Shiva still wish to test her integrity though this testing had already been done before—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 77—to Doha no. 81. The answer is this—Shiva had had a bitter experience of Parvati when she was his consort in her previous life as Sati. Though her physical body had changed, but the essential element, the Atma or the soul, of Parvati was the same as that of Sati. So, Shiva was very sceptical of her.

Another reason is that at the time of disowning Sati, he had taken a vow that he will have nothing to do with her any longer in this life—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand (i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 56; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1, 4 that precede Doha no. 57; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 58.

That is why when Lord Ram requested Shiva to marry Parvati, the latter had first expressed his strong reservations against it but had accepted the orders of the Lord because it would be improper to disobey one's revered deity, in Shiva's case Lord Ram (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 77).

So Shiva wanted to be doubly sure if Parvati had amended her nature and ways, and if she would not give him more trouble once again after marriage. If even a minute fault could be found with her, Shiva would get an excuse to avoid marrying her; he would have told both Lord Ram and Brahma that it is not possible to follow their requests because of the faults discovered in Parvati's character or nature.

<sup>2</sup>The Sapta-rishis had done the same thing on the earlier occasion also when they had gone to test Parvati—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 78—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 80. Especial attention should be given to Doha no. 78 that says that when Parvati had tried to stop them from disturbing her, they had smiled cunningly and gone ahead with their testing.]

The Sapta-rishis told Parvati—‘You did not listen to our advice the last time we came to you. You insisted that you will follow the advice given by Narad<sup>1</sup>.

Now your vow (of marrying Shiva) has become false and unrealisable because Mahesh (Shiva) has burnt Kamdeo, the god of love<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 89)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 81.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 87. What the sages meant is that Shiva has burnt whatever vestiges of love and passion that had remained in his heart by symbolically burning the patron god of such emotions, i.e. the god named Kaamdeo. Shiva has now become a stern ascetic, and therefore how can Parvati expect to marry him now?

Parvati immediately recognised the Sapta-rishis. She recalled how they had tried to derail her determination to marry Shiva on the earlier occasion. Therefore as soon as she saw them she was on her guard, guessing that these fellows will surely create more mischief for her once again. In fact, the Sapta-rishis should have thought of it, and should have not gone to test her in their original form as ‘Satpa-rishis’, but rather should have disguised themselves as some other group sages or saints to throw Parvati off her guard so that the reality emerged.]

मासपारायण, तीसरा विश्राम

(māsapārāyaṇa, tīsarā viśrāma)

[The third pause in the 30-day recitation of Ram Charit Manas.]

चौ०. सुनि बोलीं मुसुकाइ भवानी । उचित कहेहु मुनिबर बिग्यानी ॥ १ ॥

तुम्हरेँ जान कामु अब जारा । अब लगि संभु रहे सबिकारा ॥ २ ॥ tumharēm jāna kāmū aba jārā. aba lagi sambhu rahē sabikārā. 2.

hamarēm jāna sadā siva jōgī. aja anavadya akāma abhōgī. 3.

Hearing the words of the Sapta-rishis, Bhavaani (Parvati) smiled and replied to them—‘Oh learned sages, whatever you have said is correct according to your wisdom. [But my respected sages, your judgement is erroneous. I will tell you why you are wrong.] (1)

You believe that Lord Shiva has burnt Kaam (representing emotions of love, passion and desire) only now<sup>1</sup>, but till this day he had harboured some kind of emotional, moral or spiritual faults or shortcomings that are universally associated with Kamdeo.

[This is what ‘you’ think. You believe that till now Shiva had been a victim of such negative traits as passion, lust and love—traits that are synonymous with Kamdeo. That is why you have given this event of Lord Shiva burning Kamdeo so great an importance that you have come running to me in order to convey some great news as if I was under the delusion that Shiva had Kaam in his psyche till now. You think that you are doing me a great favour by telling me that all my efforts to be a companion of Lord Shiva were based on a wrong premise that Shiva had ‘Kaam’ in his mind and heart till now, and that I was longing to marry him because I believed that he would satisfy my desire for sensual fulfilment. But my dear sages, I was not under any sort of delusion when I decided to do Tapa for Shiva.] (2)

But as far as I am concerned, I am fully aware that Shiva is eternally an exemplarily renunciate ascetic, totally detached from all the grossness associated with this world. I know that Shiva is eternal in the sense that he does not take a birth like other creatures including me. I know he is irreproachable<sup>2</sup>: he has no Kaam (desires, lust, passion) in him; he is not interested in enjoying the pleasures of the sense organs or the sense objects of the world. (3)

<sup>2</sup>This observation that Shiva is beyond reproach and is free from any taints is significant in the context of what the sages have said and intended to mean. They have said that Shiva has burnt Kamdeo (refer: Doha no. 89)—that means he has a lot of anger inside him and is short-tempered. Would he also not show this anger towards Parvati for all the misdeeds she had committed in her previous life as Sati, or for daring to propose marriage to him especially when he has already declared his intention to discard her for life (refer: Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 57) and she was fully aware of this determination of Shiva (refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 58)?

By burning Kamdeo, Shiva gave a clear hint that he abhors love and passion. So would he not pour his wrath on Parvati if she dares to show that she loves him and wishes to marry him? Would Shiva not sternly punish Parvati for her stubborn attitude like he has done with Kamdeo by burning him when the latter had obstinately acted in a manner that disturbed the Lord’s meditation?

So, Parvati addresses this issue by saying that Shiva is irreproachable; that he cannot be accused of harbouring any kind of fault—whether it be lust and passion, or anger and being short-tempered. It was Kamdeo’s own fault that Shiva punished him. After all, being the Lord God of creation, is it not one of the responsibilities of Shiva to protect the norms of Dharma in this world? Kamdeo had spread nuisance in this world; the world had lost all sense of propriety and ethical behaviour under his influence (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 84—to Doha no. 85). So, should Shiva not punish the perpetrator of this mischief? So what wrong did Shiva do by punishing Kamdeo by burning him to death? After all, the good and well-being of the world at large was a greater priority for Shiva than overlooking the misdemeanours of one single individual who was wreaking havoc by sparing his life.

As far as ‘lust and passion’ are concerned, everyone knows that Shiva remains deeply submerged in meditation and its accompanying Samadhi (a trance-like state of transcendental existence when the practitioner is totally oblivious of the surrounding world)—a state of existence that necessitates complete self-restraint of all the sense organs. This precludes indulgences in lust and passion.

And as for ‘anger’ etc., Parvati knew that Shiva was calm and patient as one can ever be. Shiva had not shown any visible sign of anger towards Sati even though she had done grave wrong to him—by disobeying him and showing lack of faith in his advice. This will be amply evident when we read the sequence of events as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 50—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 52; and (ii) from Doha no. 55—to Doha no. 62.

In fact, Shiva was concerned that Parvati was suffering due to separation from him and that she had done severe Tapa (penance) to atone for her past sins so that she can be reunited with her beloved Lord once again (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 76).]

jauṁ mairṁ siva sēyē asa jānī. prīti samēta karma mana bānī. 4.
tau hamāra pana sunahu munīsā. karihahim satya kṛpānidhi īsā. 5.

If I have served Lord Shiva with full knowledge of these facts, if I have served Lord Shiva with affection and devotion using all my faculties such as my deeds, heart and mind, as well as words<sup>1</sup> (4)---

---Then listen sages, Isha (Lord God; Shiva), who is an ocean of mercy and compassion, will surely make my vows fruitful and oblige me<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sati had expressed this same confidence when she had prayed to Lord Ram while asking the latter to relieve her of the agony of separation from Shiva: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 59 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8.

Even Shiva had acknowledged Sati’s love and devotion for himself: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 56.

<sup>2</sup>Parvati’s devotion for Shiva was unquestioned because even at the time of her death in her previous life as Sati, she had asked Lord God to be able to serve Lord Shiva in her next life: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 65.]

ga'ēm̐ samīpa sō avasi nasā'ī. asi manmatha mahēsa kī nā'ī. 8.

Now let me (Parvati) come to your statement that 'Har (Shiva) has burnt Kamdeo to death' (refer: Doha no. 89). This shows that you are very ignorant of facts. [You look as if you are a group of seven wise sages, but in fact it appears to me that you are foolish beyond imagination. Your statement that Shiva burnt Kamdeo is a proof of this. Do you realise why I am saying this? Well, listen to me—] (6)

Revered sages, it is a fact of Nature that snow never goes near 'fire'. [Don't you know why? Well, I will tell you—] (7)

It is certain that if snow goes near fire then it is definitely going to be annihilated. [The heat of the fire would surely melt snow even if the former does not wish to do so, or the latter had involuntarily come near the fire. It is the inherent character of fire that it does not allow snow to survive in its vicinity.]

The same principle applies to Mahesh (Shiva) and Manmath (Kamdeo)<sup>2</sup>. [That is, just like snow cannot survive in the presence of fire, the negative trait of passion and lust cannot exist within the jurisdiction of Shiva. Therefore, what is surprising in Shiva burning Kamdeo? You can't play fools with fire; it is surely going to scorch you. I had thought that seven were elderly wise sages, but your intellect seems inadequate.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 92 where Laxman tells Nishad, the chief of the boatmen community, that "no one is responsible for one's sorrows or happiness except one's own self and the deeds one does in his life".

In the present context this means (i) Parvati had to suffer so much due to her own misdeeds in her previous life as Sati; and similarly (ii) Kamdeo had to suffer death due to his own misdeeds.

<sup>2</sup>The word "Manmath" means 'one that churns the mind and heart'. It is a metaphor for Kamdeo because the emotional traits he represents, i.e. passion, lust and desire for sensual gratification, are so strong that a person's mind and heart are churned vigorously if Kamdeo manages to get its hold on them. A person under the spell of Kamdeo would be restless, anxious and agitated like a leaf that is tossed around in a gust of wind or swirls vigorously in a whirlpool in water.]

The sages felt exhilarated in their hearts when they heard the words of such confidence, faith and devotion from Bhavaani (Parvati). Then they reverentially bowed their heads to her and went to Himaachal (the king of mountains, Parvati's father) to meet him (and advice him of the latest developments with a request to start preparations for the divine marriage)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 90)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar narrative is given when the sages had met and tested Parvati for the first time at the end of her Tapa—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 81 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.]

चौ०. सबु प्रसंगु गिरिपतिहि सुनावा । मदन दहन सुनि अति दुखु पावा ॥ १ ॥
बहुरि कहेउ रति कर बरदाना । सुनि हिमवंत बहुत सुखु माना ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sabu prasaṅgu giripatihi sunāvā. madana dahana suni ati dukhu pāvā. 1.
bahuri kahē'u rati kara baradānā. suni himavanta bahuta sukhu mānā. 2.

The Sapta-rishis then went to the king of mountains, Giripati, and narrated all the events to him. He was very sad when he heard about the burning of Kaamdeo<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Soon after this narration, the sages told him about the boon that was granted by Shiva to Rati, the wife of Kaamdeo. When Himwant, the king of the snow-covered mountains, heard of this, he felt very glad<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parvati's father was sad when he heard that Shiva had burnt Kamdeo because it indicated three possible things—one: that Shiva was given to becoming angry quickly, two: that he had vented his ire on Kamdeo to signal that he is no longer interested in love and establishing any kind of affectionate relationships, and three: he had killed Kamdeo because the latter was trying to persuade Shiva to abandon his lonely life as an ascetic who is constantly doing mediation and instead marry Parvati and start a homely life.

These reasons, or any other reason that implied that Shiva is not interested in marrying and establishing any family relationships based on affection and love, and that he is of a quick temper, naturally worried Parvati's father because it will directly affect his daughter's future. No father would want his daughter to be married to someone who is so angry and unforgiving by nature, and who has no desire to welcome emotions of love and affection, one who is not passionate about his relationships and responsibilities.

<sup>2</sup>But as soon as he heard that Shiva had blessed Rati immediately after having burnt her husband Kamdeo, that she will be reunited with him, he felt reassured, because this meant that Shiva's anger was superficial and transient, that he was very merciful, compassionate and considerate by his nature inspite of showing apparent anger, and that he did not despise a union between a faithful and loving wife and her husband. Therefore, if his daughter Parvati has true love for Shiva then she can expect consideration and compassionate treatment from him though he is an ascetic who has renounced all family ties.]

patrī saptariṣinha sō<sup>1</sup>i dīnhī. gahi pada binaya himācala kīnhī. 5.

Himwaan thought over the matter and glorified Lord Shiva's virtues in his heart. After that, he respectfully summoned the sages<sup>1</sup> (who had been residing in his realm to consult them and seek their blessings so that the marriage process could be taken forward). (3)

The king consulted them and got an auspicious day, asterism and time fixed for the marriage ceremony in accordance with the procedure and principles fixed by the Vedas (primary scriptures) for this purpose<sup>2</sup>. (4)

Then Himaachal got this written in the form of a formal proposal-letter known as a "Patri" that made this announcement, and handed it over to the Sapta-rishis after paying his due respects to them by claspings their feet as a token gesture to express his gratitude towards them<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was an established custom that all elders and wise people living in a king's kingdom were called by him on special occasions. This was done to discuss the situation with them and seek their overall guidance and blessings. The seven celestial sages known as the Sapta-rishis were already present, and so the king summoned other sages who had been living in the mountains to pursue their spiritual objectives in life. There were a lot many sages, saints, seers and hermits living in the peaceful environs of the mountains where Parvati's father ruled—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 65. All of them were invited.

<sup>2</sup>We find a parallel to this sequence of events when Sita was married to Lord Ram. Sita's father, king Janak, too had sent a "Patri" to king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram, inviting the latter to attend the marriage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 287; Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 290; and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 295.

<sup>3</sup>King Himwaan was highly grateful towards the Sapta-rishis because they had been instrumental in removing any iota of doubt relating to mutual trust and faith between his daughter Parvati and her future husband Shiva. They had put themselves at grave risk by teasing Parvati in spite of knowing that she is destined to be a divine and powerful consort of Lord Shiva, the mighty Lord God who controls death. What if she decided to take revenge upon them after she marries Lord Shiva and acquires her powerful position as a great goddess in the hierarchy of heaven?

Also, what would have happened if they had tweaked the result of their tests and given a wrong impression about Parvati to Shiva, or about Shiva to Himwaan? Therefore, Parvati's father wished to thank the Sapta-rishis for their courage and their effort to bring about a union between Parvati and Lord Shiva (who is the 3rd God of the Trinity and responsible for conclusion of creation), thereby entitling his daughter to acquire the exalted position of a great goddess that would be equivalent to the position occupied by Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and the divine consort of Lord Vishnu (the sustainer of creation), and Brahmaani, the consort of Brahma (the creator of creation).]

The Sapta-rishis went away and gave the 'Patri' to Bidhi (Brahma, the creator, who was waiting for it along with other gods who had assembled near Shiva). When he read it, there was so much delight in his heart that it failed to contain his exhilaration. [Brahma was very happy and delighted to learn that Parvati's family has accepted the proposal, and there is no last minute hitch to the marriage.] (6)

He read aloud the auspicious time and date as contained in the 'Patri' so that everyone can hear it. Sages and gods who were present on the occasion were exhilarated when they heard it<sup>1</sup>. (7)

As soon as this auspicious news was announced, there was celebration all around: flowers rained down from the sky and musical instruments began playing in the heaven. Pitchers and jars that are exhibited on such auspicious occasion were put up everywhere<sup>2</sup>, in all the ten directions<sup>3</sup> of the compass. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar scene is observed in Ayodhya when the "Patri" containing the news of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita arrived. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 287; Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 290; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 291; Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 295; and from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 296—to Doha no. 297.

All the gods began decorating their different types of vehicles<sup>1</sup> in many ways in preparation to accompany the marriage procession.

Meanwhile, auspicious omens began to happen, and celestial damsels known as the ‘Apsaras’ sang and danced in merry abandon<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 91)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The different gods had different types of personal means of transport. Some of them are the following—Vishnu (the sustainer) has Garud (the celestial heron), Brahma (the creator) has Hansa (a swan-shaped airplane), Indra (the king of gods) has Erawaat (the elephant), Yam (the god of death and hell) has a male buffalo, Kuber (the treasurer of gods) has the Pushpak (a self-driven air-plane), Varun (the Water-God) has Magar (alligator), Agni (the Fire-God) has a he-goat, Pawan (the Wind-God) has a deer, Ishaan (one of Shiva’s various forms) has Brishava (the bull), and Nairitta has phantom.

When Lord Ram was married to Sita at Janakpur, all the gods had decorated their mounts and joined the marriage procession as it headed towards the venue of the marriage ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precedes Doha no. 314.

<sup>2</sup>A similar situation is narrated while describing the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita. When the marriage party was ready for departure from Ayodhya, the auspicious omens which revealed themselves are narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 303 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8, and Chaupai line no. 3 that follows this Doha.]

The attendants of Lord Shiva began grooming and adorning their Lord (to prepare him as a groom). [Shiva had never bothered about his appearances. He was an excellent ascetic, and like all ascetics he was never concerned about his external features, whether he looked attractive and charming to others or not. But this was a different situation. Now he was to be married, and a groom is not expected to look like a hermit or an ascetic. Therefore, the close attendants of the Lord began adorning him so that he looks attractive in his role as a groom.]

They cleaned and tied his thick lock of usually unkempt hairs into a decent-looking plait that was turned around in a spiral to form a wonderful crown that adorned the Lord’s head. Then they decked it up with a crest of serpents. (1)

The ear-rings and bracelets that he (Shiva) wore also consisted of serpents. His body was smeared with ash<sup>1</sup> (from the fire sacrifice), and skin of a lion was used as his wrap-around garment. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva's natural complexion is blue like that of Lord Vishnu. But when ash was smeared on his body, he looked fair-complexioned.]

His head looked beautiful with a crescent moon on his forehead, and river Ganges swirling in the matted hairs adorning the crown of his head. He sported three eyes (two conventional eyes and one in the center of his forehead). A huge serpent dangled across his chest to represent the sacred thread worn by other gods. (3)

His neck was darkened by the poison he had swallowed (at the time of the churning of the ocean by the gods and demons), and he wore a garland of human skulls around his neck.

Though Shiva was attired in an inauspicious manner and looked very ghastly, he nevertheless was a merciful Lord who was an abode of all virtues associated with auspiciousness and compassion<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva wore human skulls as a garland; he wore a serpent like a sacred thread; he kept poison in his throat; he looked very odd with three eyes. In brief, Shiva's external appearance was very unconventional and fearful. No holy person, let alone a 'god', would like to sport this ghastly appearance. But this was very misleading; it was perhaps a guise adopted by Shiva so that the world leaves him alone, thinking that he is a mad god or a patron deity of phantoms and ghosts, so that he can concentrate upon his meditation and contemplation.

But the fact is that Shiva is not what he appears to be, but is true to his name—because the word "Shiva" means one who is truthful, immaculate, pure and holy. Shiva is a 'merciful' god, and therefore he does not enjoy killing humans as indicated by his wearing a garland of skulls. On the contrary it means that he wishes to remind himself constantly that this world is going to perish one day, and the beautiful physical body of which the humans are so proud of is actually nothing but a cover for bones and skulls. Shiva has witnessed death and grief at close quarters because he is the god responsible for concluding this creation, the god who observes death and its accompanying pain and horrors from up close.

The garland of skulls around his neck constantly reminds him of the mortal nature of this physical world and the futility of pursuing its material pleasures and comforts—because death is certain to come one day. This realisation helps Shiva to remain detached from the world and overcome all temptations for gratification of the senses.]

dēkhi sivahi suratriya musukāhīṁ. bara lāyaka dūlahini jaga nāhīṁ. 6.

He (Shiva) held a trident and a tabor (drum shaped like an hour-glass) in his hands.

Thus attired, he rode a bull and moved ahead to go the bride's place even as various musical instruments were being played. (5)

Seeing the most unconventional form of Shiva donned in the attire of a groom, the consorts of different gods could not restrain themselves from smiling. They said amongst themselves in jest—‘There is not a single bride fit for such a groom in this world!’ (6)

बिष्णु बिरंछि आदि सुरब्राता । चढ़ि चढ़ि बाहन चले बराता ॥ ७ ॥

Lord Vishnu, Biranchi (i.e. Brahma) and a host of other gods rode their respective vehicles and proceeded to join the marriage procession. (7)

The society of gods that constituted the marriage party looked exceptionally marvellous in every possible way, but this marriage procession did not match the type of groom for whom it was meant<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>All the gods had magnificent forms, looked divine, and were well decorated. Their vehicles and attendants were also wonderful to behold. But the main hero of this gathering, the ‘groom’, i.e. Lord Shiva, was at odds with this grand setup.

We shall soon read about the attendants and followers of Shiva who were accompanying him as his close friends and confidantes: they were fear-inspiring ghosts, phantoms, ogres and spirits of all denominations and descriptions (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sortha/Doha no. 93 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4). This group was obviously at odds with the group that consisted of gods and their attendants who were all divine-looking and charming in their appearance.]

Lord Vishnu then summoned all the different guardians of the world (i.e. the different gods) and advised them with a smile—‘Look, every one of you should march separately with your own retinue (group of companions).’ (Doha no. 92)

[Note—Till this point no attendant of Shiva has joined the marriage procession. All of them longed to do so; all of them wished to join in the celebration of the marriage of their Lord, Shiva. But they were hesitant to do so; they were feeling shy and reluctant to step forward because of the presence of a large number of magnificent looking gods and their divine attendants.

Vishnu realised this. After all, this was Shiva’s marriage procession, and not of any one of other gods. So therefore, the marriage procession should represent the groom, i.e. Lord Shiva, and this would be possible only when Shiva’s close attendants took the lead and joined the celebrations. The marriage party as of now looked like it was the procession of gods, with none of Shiva’s attendants in sight.

Vishnu is a wise and intelligent god. So he devised a method to help Shiva’s attendants join the procession. It would be possible only when he directs all the gods to move in separate groups, surrounded by their companions. For instance, the Water-God would move ahead with his companions, such as all the aquatic creatures. Shiva will find himself alone, and so he will be constrained to call his own attendants to mill around and form a distinct group around him.

When the rest of the gods would have moved away from Shiva to form their own groups, sufficient space would be created around Shiva so that his personal group of attendants can join him.]

चौ०. बर अनुहारि बरात न भाई । हँसी करैहु पर पुर जाई ॥ १ ॥

बिष्णु बचन सुनि सुर मुसुकाने । निज निज सेन सहित बिलगाने ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bara anuhāri barāta na bhāī. haṁsī karaiḥahu para pura jāī. 1.

biṣṇu bacana suni sura musukānē. nija nija sēna sahita bilagānē. 2.

Lord Vishnu told the gods—‘Oh brothers! The marriage procession does not match the groom; it does not seem to be worthy of the groom<sup>1</sup>. Do you all want to make yourselves a butt of ridicule, become laughing stocks, and invite jeers and cat-calls in someone else’s city<sup>2</sup>?’ (1)

The Gods smiled<sup>3</sup> at the words of Vishnu (because they understood what he meant). So they collected their own armies (companions, friends and attendants) and formed independent groups as they moved ahead in the marriage procession. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods looked splendid in their best of attire and surrounded by heavenly paraphernalia. But a groom is the focal point of a ‘marriage procession’, and not the guests. In the present case, the groom was Shiva, and he was dressed in the most unconventional form, almost like a hermit (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 92 herein above). So it was obvious that the marriage procession did not match the groom; it was exactly the opposite of what it ought to ideally be. Had it been a marriage procession of some god it would have been a perfect party, but in the present situation it was at odds with the groom.

When the bride's people would see such a procession, it is natural that they would laugh and jeer at it. And when this happens, Vishnu feared that these gods would immediately take offence because he knew about their nature of being very proud and egoist. There were chances that some amongst these gods would lose his cool and begin a ruckus in the bride's place. This scenario would obviously most unsavoury, especially when it is the occasion of the marriage of one of their senior members, Lord Shiva.

There were also grave chances that Shiva himself would lose his cool and curse the gods for creating a situation that puts him in a precarious and hilarious position because it was on their behest that he had agreed to marry Parvati in the first place after being highly reluctant to do so initially.

<sup>2</sup>The gods live in the heaven, while Parvati's father is the king of mountains on earth. Lord Shiva has two abodes—one is in the heaven like all other gods, and the other is on earth, on Mt. Kailash. He was doing meditation in the vicinity of Kailash. The marriage party of the bridegroom goes from the city of his residence to the city where the bride lives. This is what Vishnu meant—the gods had assembled from the heaven, 'their city or place of residence', and they were going to the bride's place on earth, in the realm of the lofty snow-covered mountains of the mighty Himalayan range, i.e. 'someone else's city'.

The family of the bride, i.e. Parvati, and all the residents of that place were well aware that the groom, i.e. Shiva, is an ascetic, and that his attendants consist of ghosts and phantoms. Shiva is sure to call his faithful followers, the ghosts and the phantoms, to accompany him as his companions, friends and attendants. Obviously, the gods mingling with Shiva's followers would be such a horrifying sight. The residents of Parvati's place will laugh at the gods.

So it's better that they segregate themselves from Shiva's followers and move in independent groups.

<sup>3</sup>We shall read below that even Shiva has 'smiled' at Vishnu's words. No one took offence of his words which were spoken in a light-hearted manner without any prejudice and intent to offend anyone.]

मनहीं मन महेसु मुसुकाहीं । हरि के बिग्य बचन नहिं जाहीं ॥ ३ ॥

अति प्रिय बचन सुनत प्रिय केरे । भृंगिहि प्रेरि सकल गन टेरे ॥ ४ ॥ manahīm mana mahēsu musukāhīm. hari kē bingya bacana nahīm jāhīm. 3.

ati priya bacana sunata priya kērē. bhṛṅgihi prēri sakala gana ṭērē. 4.

Lord Mahesh (Shiva) smiled subtly in his Mana (mind and heart; without any outwardly expression to indicate how he felt at Vishnu's comments). He thought to himself that Hari (Vishnu) does not desist from his innate habit of cracking jokes and being humorous.<sup>1</sup>

[Instead of taking Vishnu's word in the wrong light as being taunting, Shiva liked them and felt that his friend Vishnu is cracking a joke on the occasion of his marriage as friends often do. Shiva and Vishnu are of the same stature, and people of the same standing in society do not insult each other in public as a matter of principle.

So, Shiva understood that the words of Vishnu are to be taken in the correct spirit and no wrong intention is to be construed in them.] (3)

Hearing these affectionate words from his dearest Lord<sup>2</sup> (Vishnu), Shiva summoned Bhringi (his constant companion and mount called Nandi or the Bull)<sup>3</sup> and asked him to call all his (Shiva's) attendants. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We draw an interesting conclusion if we examine the sequence of events here. Shiva's attendants, the ghosts and phantoms, were feeling shy to join the marriage procession of their Lord, Shiva, because of the huge gathering of gods in their splendid attires and paraphernalia. Shiva too did not wish to make his friends, the gods, feel ill-at-ease and odd by having to walk alongside such horrifying creatures, so Shiva kept quiet. Vishnu was watching everything closely. Since he was confident that Shiva will not take him wrong in any way, he decided to take the initiative and asked the other gods to move away and make space for Shiva's attendants.

Shiva realised what Vishnu meant, and that is why the former did not take umbrage at the latter's comments about the marriage party not being worthy of the groom and therefore the gods should move away.

Shiva was rather thankful to Vishnu that he enabled him to call his attendants without causing any discomfiture to other members of the marriage party, the gods. That is why Shiva 'smiled' thanfully at Vishnu's words, and immediately asked his mount, the Nandi or Bhringi, to call other followers to join the procession.

Shiva understood what Vishnu meant. He understood that Vishnu is hinting at his (Shiva's) followers who were ghosts and phantoms. But he did not feel offended at Vishnu's implied remarks—because though these words seemed to be taunting on their face value and would have angered any other god in Shiva's place, but they did not affect Shiva because they were a statement of facts, and were correct. It goes to the credit of Lord Shiva that he does not take offence when the truth is spoken, and he is unaffected by any comments made for him by anyone. This is the true way an ascetic and hermit should act in this world—he is expected to be above all emotions; he is expected to have full control over his sentiments; he is expected to be calm and poised in the face of the gravest provocation; he is expected to be unmindful of what the world says of him, good or bad, for the simple reason that he is detached from and dispassionate towards everything related to the gross world. 'Marriage' and 'phantoms as followers' as well as the physical description of Shiva with serpents wrapped around his body, garland of skulls dangling from his neck, ash smeared on the body etc., pertain to Shiva's that form which relates to the physical world of birth and death. They do not describe Shiva's eternal, invisible, all-pervading and cosmic form as the 'Great Lord of Gods', the 'Maha-Deva'.

<sup>2</sup>The fact is, both Vishnu and Shiva are the same Supreme Being's two manifested forms with which the latter carries out two functions in creation—that of sustenance as Vishnu, and of conclusion as Shiva. Primarily therefore, Shiva and Vishnu are the same Supreme Being known as "Brahm". Hence, it does not matter what Vishnu says about Shiva, and vice versa.

Remember: Shiva is an ardent devotee of Lord Ram, and it is well known that Lord Ram is none but Lord Vishnu in his manifested form as a human. Shiva has Lord Ram firmly enthroned in the sanctum of his heart as his revered deity and Lord. He constantly repeats this holy name of Lord Ram and uses it not only to do meditation himself (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 60) but also as a means of providing liberation and deliverance to a dying man by uttering this holy name in the latter's ears (refer: Baal Kand—Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 19; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51).

The fact is that the divine story of Lord Ram's activities on earth were first conceptualised in the heart of Lord Shiva before they came to be known to the world as the epic known as "Ramayan" (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35).

In a similar vein, Lord Ram—who was a visible form Lord Vishnu who is primarily invisible—had explicitly said that no one is as dear to him as Lord Shiva (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, 2nd half of Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 2). The Lord has gone further to clearly assert that if one wishes to attain him then he must first worship Lord Shiva, thereby unequivocally establishing the mutual respect Ram and Shiva have for each other (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3)

The idea is that one should not think that Vishnu had insulted Shiva in anyway whatsoever. That is why Shiva smiled and accepted Vishnu's advice as is evident here—Shiva has immediately called his Bull and asked him to summon all the attendants so that they can accompany him in the marriage procession. If the gods will move with their own armies of followers and attendants, why should the main hero, the 'groom', be left behind from following suit?

<sup>3</sup>Shiva's Bull is his nearest and constant companion. He is also known by the name of "Brhingi"—refer: Amarkosha, 1/1/43.

Nandi is also Shiva's mount, guard and gate-keeper—refer: Kalidas' "Kumar Sambhava", 3/41.

So, when the need arose to call others, Shiva asked Nandi, or "Bhringi", to call out aloud and summon all the other attendants who were eagerly awaiting orders from their Lord to join his marriage procession.]

Hearing the command of Lord Shiva, their Master and Lord, all his attendants came there and bowed their heads in respect at the holy feet of the Lord (Shiva). (5)

They had varying kinds of vehicles, and were in different forms and attires. Even Lord Shiva could not resist at smiling at his own entourage! (6)

*<sup>1</sup>Some of them had no mouths, while others had countless mouths.
Some of them had no legs or hands, while others had numerous limbs. (7)

Some had many eyes, while other had no eyes at all.
Some were well-fed and muscular, while others were emaciated and skinny.
(8)

[Note—*Remember: It is an army of Lord Shiva who is the Lord responsible for bringing to an end the life cycle of a creature who was created by Brahma (the creator), and was sustained by Vishnu (the sustainer) till the time the creature lived in this world.

The wise Supreme Being had to maintain some sort of ecological balance in his creation—so he devised a method to ensure this. He decided that all who were born would die one day. Otherwise, the earth will be overflowing with living beings and there would be neither space left for the new generation nor would the earth be able to sustain the increasing population which would be crowding its surface. Eventually, when the surface of the earth would be full and no space left on it, its inhabitants would be tumbling over to fill the space of the sky. If there was no such thing as ‘death’ then millions of years from the beginning of creation a time will come when the entire universe would be chock-a-block with creatures who would be baying for each other’s blood and grabbing each other’s throats to find place to make a foothold and stand!

Therefore, Shiva, the ‘god of death’, is a necessity of creation. Being the patron deity of death, Shiva is ‘surrounded by death’ at all times of his existence. Phantoms and ghosts represent this aspect of creation—death and the period of time when the dead creature lives as a ‘spirit’ till the opportunity comes to take a new birth once again. This is an endless cycle constituting of birth and death.

Hence, Shiva’s companions have been depicted in the scriptures as consisting of symbols of death—viz. spirits, ghosts and phantoms.

Similarly, some simply rolled along like an amoeba because they had no limbs, while others were like octopuses with many tentacles representing as many limbs.

This basic idea applies to all the oddities in the attendants of Lord Shiva.]

The ornaments they wore were fearsome, and they held skulls in their hands. Their bodies were smeared with fresh blood. (Chanda line no. 2)

Their faces were like that of donkeys, dogs, pigs and jackals. In fact, they were so many variations in their forms and attire that it is not possible for one to count or enumerate them. (Chanda line no. 3)

There were rows after rows of hobgoblins, spirits, ghosts and ascetics<sup>1</sup> which no one can describe. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The spirits, hobgoblins, phantoms and ghosts represented Shiva's association with 'death' as explained in a note appended to Chaupai line nos. 7-8 herein above.

The 'ascetics' who accompanied Lord Shiva represented the community of sages, ascetics and hermits for whom Lord is the patron deity.]

Taken all in all, this sight was most ridiculous and absurd to behold<sup>1</sup>. (Sortha no. 93)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why was the 'sight so ridiculous to behold'? Well, it was a 'marriage party', and not a 'funeral procession'! It's so ridiculous, absurd and incredulous that ghosts and phantoms would accompany a bridegroom and his party of marriage guests. The groom is not going to attend someone's funeral but to the venue of his own marriage, and ghosts and phantoms have their place in a cremation ground or a graveyard, but definitely not at a marriage venue!]

[Sage Yagyawalkya observes—] The marriage procession finally took a shape that matched the groom<sup>1</sup>.

As the party moved ahead (towards the bride's place), there was a lot of fun and gaiety on the way<sup>2</sup>. (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse answers the objection raised by Lord Vishnu that the marriage party was not in concordance with the personality of the groom, in this case Lord Shiva, the Great God, and the Lord of all the Gods—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 92 along with Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.

<sup>2</sup>A parallel can be drawn with the events associated with Lord Ram's marriage. When his marriage procession headed by his father was on its way from Ayodhya, the capital city of Lord Ram, to Janakpur, the city of his bride Sita, similar gaiety and merry-making are observed—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 302 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.]

Though it is not described elaborately here, it is certain that Himaachal would have got a similar pavilion constructed for the marriage ceremony of his daughter Parvati with Lord Shiva.

All the mountains and hills that were in existence anywhere in this world, whether they were small or huge but were nonetheless beyond description or counting (3)---

---All the different forests, oceans, rivers and ponds—Himgiri (or “Himaachal”, the king of snow-covered mountains) sent invitations to all of them to come and attend the marriage ceremony of his daughter. (4)

[Note—‘Himaachal’, the personified form of the mighty Himalayan mountain range, was the emperor amongst all the primary inhabitants of earth since the time the latter came into existence. Other primary inhabitants of earth were the countless mountains, hills, forests, rivers, lakes and ponds that covered the surface of the earth before other living beings began to make it their home.

The world is divided into two major categories—viz. the inanimate world and the animate world. The mountains, forests and rivers constitute the first category. However, for the purpose of our narration, these entities have been personified into virtual living entities.

Since “Himaachal” represented the mighty Himalayan mountain range which is the greatest mountain on earth, ‘he’ (personified Himalayas in the form of ‘Himaachal’) was like an emperor in the society of mountains and hills, and their cousins represented by the countless forests, rivers and ponds all of which were part of earth ever since its origin. So when his daughter was to be married he naturally invited all the members of his society consisting of other mountains, hills, rivers and ponds to participate in the ceremony.

Therefore, all these aspects of Nature and primary inhabitants of Mother Earth took the form of attractive males and females to join in the celebration marking the union of Lord Shiva with Parvati as narrated in verse no. 5 herein below. Refer also to “Parvati Mangal”, verse nos. 84—85.]

[Note—This scene is reminiscent of the one which was witnessed at the time of Lord Ram’s marriage. At that time, the gods and goddesses had assumed human forms and joined the celebrations.

The citizens of the city, all the ladies and the gents, had excellent personalities and were so ingenious that they captivated the mind and heart of wise sages<sup>4</sup>. [The sages were attracted by their good manners and behaviour. The citizens were well- cultured and educated; they led an exemplarily honourable life in a manner advised by the scriptures.] (Chanda line no. 4)

How can one describe the grandeur, the majesty, the charm and the splendour of the city where the Mother of the World (i.e. Parvati, the cosmic Mother) has chosen to reveal herself (literally, has "taken birth" as the daughter of Himwaan named Parvati).

All the Riddhis and Siddhis (prosperities, successes and well-beings) as well as all sorts of wealth, happiness and joy overflowed in that city with renewed vigour and colour with the dawn of ever new day.<sup>1</sup>

[That is, each day appeared to be better than its previous one. Happiness, joy, prosperity and wealth increased day-by-day in the city of Himwaan. There is no surprise in it—because the Goddess of the World, the Mother of the World, who controls all such virtues that grant happiness, joy, well-being, prosperity and successes in all spheres of life, had herself decided to come and take up a residence at that place.]<sup>2</sup> (Doha no. 94)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram's marriage procession arrived at Janakpur, Sita had summoned all the Siddhis and Riddhis and had ordered them to serve the marriage party. Her orders were carried out immediately and the marriage party was hosted to the grandness that put to shame even the comfort and pleasure of heaven—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 306 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Doha no. 289 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that describe the city of Janakpur, the capital city of Janak, the father of Sita, and (ii) Baal Kand, Doha no. 297 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 that asserts that it is not possible to describe the beauty and grandeur of Ayodhya where the supreme Lord of creation has himself revealed in a human form as Lord Ram.

The idea of happiness and cheer spreading everywhere, in all the directions, and increasing day-by-day in the context of the birth of Lord Ram at Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 195 along with Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede it and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it.

In Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 26, and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 29 it is stated that the beauty and grandeur of Ayodhya was so great that it defied description even by experts.

The central idea in these narrations is that not only skilled humans like bards, poets and sages who were experts in narrating events as they happened, but even super-humans such as gods and celestial bards such as Narad were not able to describe the magical effect of the supreme Lord's sport in this world.

Firstly, there are not enough words that can truly describe the grandeur of the Lord's creation, and secondly, even if there were sufficient words to do so, those who think themselves to be experts in this job fail miserably in this endeavour because the greatness, the grandness and the magnificence of the Lord's creation is so huge and un-imaginable that their mind and its faculty simply cannot grasp it let, alone describe it.]

When the news arrived that the marriage procession (of Lord Shiva) has arrived, there was a cheerful commotion in the city as it erupted in spontaneous joy that added to its charms<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The reception party assigned the task of welcoming the guests adorned itself in all its finery and assembled all the paraphernalia needed to usher-in the honourable guests with all the grandeur and majesty suitable for the occasion<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 302 and Doha no. 304 that describe the cheerful commotion at the time of the departure of the marriage part of Lord Ram from Ayodhya and its arrival at Janakpur respectively.

The “commotion and tumult” can be due to a pleasant news as in the present case, or it can be due to some mischief created by a powerful force as was the case when Kaamdeo created a huge tumult in the world as specifically mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 84. The reason for this tumult has been described in the verses that precede and follow this Chanda.

Another reason for a huge commotion in a city is when dark clouds of war hover over the horizon and a powerful army is poised for attack. This will be evident upon reading Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-10 and Chanda line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 35 that describe the assembly of the huge army of monkeys and bears that Lord Ram gathered together to launch an assault on Lanka, and when the Lord’s army actually attacked Lanka as described in Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 40.

We also read that when Lord Ram sent Angad as his emissary to Ravana in a last-minute attempt to avoid the war, there was a huge tumult in Lanka as soon as Angad arrived there—refer: Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 18.

Yet another reason when there is a tumult and commotion in any city is when some bad news breaks—as was the case in Ayodhya when the citizens learnt that their beloved prince, Lord Ram, was being sent to forest exile due to some whim of his step-mother Kaikeyi. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 49.

When the members of the reception team saw that section of the marriage party which consisted of the gods and their accompanying retinue, all of them felt delighted in their hearts. When they saw Lord Hari (Vishnu), their joy increased manifold and they felt very happy<sup>1</sup>. (3)

But their enthusiasm ebbed and was replaced by horror when they saw Lord Shiva and his companions<sup>2</sup>. Virtually all of them<sup>3</sup> were so scared and terrified that they fled from there along with their vehicles. [That is, the majority of the members of the reception party sent by king Himwaan to receive the incoming guests were horrified at the sight of ghosts and phantoms who accompanied Lord Shiva as part of the marriage procession that they mounted their vehicles and fled from the site.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Vishnu or Hari was the most charming in the entire procession. The stunning beauty and fabulous charm of the Lord has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 148 when the Lord had revealed himself before Manu and Satrupa to bless them upon successful completion of their Tapa (penance and austerity) that they did with the wish to see the Lord.

Again, we read about the Lord heavenly charm when his physical form as Lord Ram is described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 219 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8; (ii) Doha no. 233 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; and (iii) Doha no. 327 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-10, and Chanda line nos. 1-4.

<sup>3</sup>But, not all fled; only the weak-hearted ran away. This will be clear in the next verse which says that some of the courageous and wise had patience, and they stayed put there. Those who ran away were generally the youngsters who had accompanied the elders to enjoy the novel spectacle of receiving a marriage party and its accompanying gaiety and merriment.]

Those who were wise and sensible (a reference to the elderly members of the reception party) maintained their cool and showed patience. But children and youngsters (who had no knowledge of the reality of the situation) fled for their lives in terror<sup>1</sup>. (5)

When they ran to their homes, their parents were aghast when they observed their condition, and enquired from them the reason for their fear and terrified appearances. The children trembled in fear as they answered their parents as follows—(6)

‘What can we say; there is nothing worthy of narrating (about the marriage party). The sight we saw is incredulous: is it an army of Yam (the god of hell and death) or a marriage procession? [With ghosts and phantoms dancing merrily, it looks as an army of the god of death has come to invade our city. It is not believable that a marriage party can consist of ghosts and phantoms and be such absurdly horrifying!] (7)

Listen—the bridegroom is sitting on a bull and is covered with snakes, skulls and ash<sup>2</sup>! [What kind of a groom is he? It's a nightmarish scene.]<sup>3</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Those who were elderly and wise knew all about Parvati's Tapa and the reason for which she did it—i.e. that she wanted to marry Shiva. These elderly people knew who Lord Shiva was and about his companions. They were well aware that these ghosts and phantoms don't mean any harm, and that their master, Lord Shiva, is the most compassionate and kind Lord in creation. How can he ever cause harm to the city as well as its inhabitants when he has come to marry its princess, Parvati, the daughter of king Himwaan? Refer: Doha no. 95 herein below which precisely addresses this point, along with the note that accompanies it.

But the 'children'—a metaphor used to include all those who were ignorant of the reality like young and inexperienced children—became horrified at the sight of Lord Shiva's companions. They did not know the significance of Parvati's Tapa, and who Lord Shiva actually was whom she wanted to marry.

<sup>3</sup>It is a scene straight out of a comedy. Where has anyone seen a groom as described in these lines, and furthermore where has anyone seen a marriage party of ghosts and phantoms?]

[The terrified children reported to their parents—] 'The groom has his body smeared in ash, and he wears serpents and skulls by way of ornaments. Except these coverings, he is otherwise naked, sports a thick lock of knotted hairs on his head, and generally looks very fearful<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 1)

He is accompanied by horrifying ghosts, phantoms, ogres and female spirits who have strange faces and mouths, and who move out only during the night ("Rajnichar")<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

Anyone who survives even after seeing this sort of a marriage procession is very lucky and fortunate (because the sight of ghosts, phantoms, ogres and spirits is so horrifying that it is sufficient to make an ordinary person faint out of fear and die due to shock that accompanies it). (Chanda line no. 3)

---Only such a person who survive this shock and awe would be able to see (witness) the marriage (of Shiva with Parvati) (because the rest would be already dead by the time the ceremony actually starts)<sup>3</sup>.

Children said such kinds of things in each household of the city (when they rushed-in terrified to report to their parents about what they had seen on the outskirts of the city where the marriage procession of Lord Shiva had arrived). (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 and 4 that precede Doha no. 92.

<sup>2</sup>The entities mentioned here are called “Rajnichar” because they move out and wander in the world only during the dark hours of the night. The word “Rajnichar” has two parts—viz. “Rajni” = night, “Char” = to move about.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 93.

<sup>3</sup>In other words, only those persons who do not die out of shock when they see such a wild-looking groom and his horrifying companions in the marriage party would be able to actually witness the marriage ceremony, because the rest of the people would die out of shock at this sight.]

When the parents realised that the children meant the marriage procession of Lord Shiva, they smiled and reassured their wards in a variety of ways that they have nothing to fear about, and so they must cheer up. (Doha no. 95)

[Note—We have read in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 95 herein above that while the children had run away in terror at the sight of Lord Shiva's marriage procession, those who were wise and knowledgeable, i.e. the elderly citizens, maintained their calm and poise. The reason is obvious—the children did not know anything about the groom, i.e. Lord Shiva, and being ignorant of the Lord's cosmic form as the Lord who is one of the mighty Trinity Gods who is responsible for conclusion of creation, the children became terror-stricken just because they saw the ghosts, phantoms, ogres and spirits. The ignorant children did not know that these entities simply represented the third element of creation, i.e. ‘death’, over which Lord Shiva presides. They did not know that contrary to this visually horrifying spectacle, the Lord himself is quite the opposite of it as he is an embodiment of the grandest virtues of benediction, benevolence, mercy, compassion, kind and grace.

But the elders in the society were aware of these facts. So the parents remained calm and smiled at the ignorance of the children as well as the way their wards trembled in fear just like parents would react when they see their children getting unnecessarily scared at the sight of the most harmful of things such as a rope or a hopping balloon thinking them to be snakes or hobgoblins respectively.]

The receiving party welcomed the marriage procession (on the outskirts of the city) and escorted it to the city where the members of the marriage party were given beautiful lodging places that were comfortable and pleasant<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4, 6 that precede Doha no. 306, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha where it is narrated how the marriage party of Lord Ram was welcomed by the advance reception party that was sent to welcome it, and then brought inside the city of Janakpur and lodged at pleasant places especially earmarked for them that had all the things of comfort one could expect.

Refer also to Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 99 herein below that says that after the feast organised to welcome the marriage party was over, all its members went back to their respective lodges.

This means that each important member of the marriage party was provided an independent residential unit where he and his companions stayed. There were countless gods, some senior and other juniors, and they were all given appropriate lodges. Lord Shiva was given a wonderful place to stay that must have been different from those of others for two reasons—one reason is obvious, and it is that he was the 'bridegroom', and the second reason is that he was a senior god being the third god of the Trinity who is responsible for the conclusion of creation, and occupies an honourable place in the hierarchy of the heaven just like Lord Vishnu who is the sustainer of creation and is the second god of the Trinity, and Lord Brahma who is the creator and is the first god of the Trinity.]

mainām' subha āratī samvārī. saṅga sumāṅgala gāvahim nārī. 2.

Maina, the mother of Parvati, arranged auspicious items needed to perform an "Aarti"<sup>1</sup> of the groom, and was accompanied by honourable women who sang auspicious, melodious songs befitting the occasion<sup>2</sup>. (2)

She had arranged the items of the Aarti on a golden plate which looked beautiful as she held it in her well adorned hands<sup>3</sup>. Then she proceeded to welcome the bridegroom and wave lighted lamps before him in an auspicious gesture that is traditionally employed to welcome and show great respect to honourable guests<sup>4</sup>. [And in this particular case, it's not only a gesture to welcome and show honour to the bridegroom but also marks the beginning of the marriage celebrations.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “Aarti” is a formal gesture wherein lighted earthen lamps filled with oil are waved before an honourable guest as a sign of welcome and respect. The plate in which these earthen lamps are arranged also contains other items that are regarded as auspicious, such as rice grains, turmeric, blades of ‘Durba grass’, which is a special class of grass that is dark in shade, and other such items.

In the present case however, this Aarti marks the beginning of the marriage ceremony with the formal welcoming of the bridegroom.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 346 that describes the same scene when Sita's mother had arranged the Aarti to welcome the bridegroom, Lord Ram.

<sup>3</sup>Maina's hands were adorned with bangles and garlands etc. Her palms were coloured with “Mehandi”, or a paste made from leaves of the myrtle plant.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 346 where we read about Sita's mother going to welcome her Lord Ram, the bridegroom, with Aarti arranged on a golden plate which was full of other items needed for such auspicious occasions.]

bhāgi bhavana paiṭhīm ati trāsā. ga'ē mahēsu jahām janavāsā. 5.

[A repeat of the events that occurred on the outskirts of the city, where the children were so terrified when they saw Lord Shiva for the first time that they ran away from there in fear, is witnessed once again here when Maina and her companions saw Lord Shiva, also known as “Rudra”, for the first time.]

When they (Maina and her companions) saw the strange form of Rudra<sup>1</sup> (another name of Lord Shiva) and his accoutrements (snakes wrapped around his near naked body, skulls worn as a garland, ash smeared on the entire body, huge lock of matted hairs on the head etc.), the women were overcome with great fear in their hearts<sup>2</sup>. (4)

They were so terrorised at this scary sight that they ran away in fear to their respective homes (like the children had done earlier)<sup>3</sup>.

Meanwhile, Lord Mahesh (Shiva) went away to his own place of residence where the marriage party was lodged<sup>4</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Rudra is that form of Shiva that concludes this creation. The word “Rudra” itself means ‘anger’. It implies that when this creation becomes highly sinful and pervert, when moral turpitude and degeneration is at its zenith, Lord Rudra who represents that aspect of the Supreme Being which is responsible for maintaining discipline in this creation, becomes angry. He then decides to severely punish the offenders by unleashing death and destruction, but at the same time ensuring that the noble and the wise creatures of this creation do not suffer for no fault of theirs. However, since “Rudra” represents the angry form of the Supreme Being that unleashes death and destruction on the wayward world, he is iconographically depicted to be accompanied by elements that represent ugly faces of this creation and its result in the form of death and destruction—viz. the ghosts, the phantoms and the spirits.

The use of the word “Rudra” here is significant—because it indicates clearly that the groom is none else but the almighty ‘Third God of the Trinity’.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 16 where it is said that it is a nature of women to be easily frightened.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 95 that describe how the children were so scared when they saw Shiva and his fearful companions that they ran away from the site out of fear.

<sup>4</sup>When we closely read the sequence of events it will be clear that Maina and her companions had went out to welcome Lord Shiva at the time the marriage party had entered the city and was heading to the place where they were to be lodged. Since Shiva was the bridegroom, he occupied a pride-of-place in the long procession and could be easily located.

Another thing to note is that Shiva remained unaffected by such a reception on two occasions—once on the outskirts of the city when the children raised a hue and cry and ran away screaming, and now once again inside the city when the terrified women did not even perform the Aarti, which is customary and essential, but ran away from the place. Imagine how bad one would feel if he is shown such a reception by the host? Not doing the Aarti and running away is an insult of the guest.

But Lord Shiva is so forgiving and compassionate that he did not mind anything. He is so detached from the world and so unconcerned with its formalities that nothing mattered to him as long as he fulfils the desire of his devotee who in this case was Parvati who had done Tapa to access the Lord has her companion for life. Being a true ascetic, worldly expression of honour and respect was meaningless for Shiva.]

Maina was especially very sad in her heart and full of remorse. She called her daughter (Parvati) [6] and made her sit on her lap with great affection<sup>1</sup>. Her dark eyes were full of tears (of regret, remorse, pain and sorrowfulness at the fate of her daughter, and the uncertainty that now bares its tongue)<sup>2</sup>.

Maina spoke to her daughter in an affectionate tone that was tinged with sadness and remorse—‘It’s such an irony that the creator who has bestowed upon you such grace and beauty is the same one who has made the groom so fearful and ugly.

[What an irony it is really. Couldn’t the creator, who is supposed to be wise and who is supposed to be the one who decides the fate of every single creature of his creation, select a suitable groom for you when such a choice is in his discretionary powers? Couldn’t he see that there is no match between you and the groom? What grave error of judgement has he made?]<sup>3</sup> [7-8] (6-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The mother felt very sorry and pitiful concerning her daughter’s fate. Though she loved Parvati very much and was concerned for her welfare as is evident from reading Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 71, but her love for her daughter had now overwhelmed her and aggravated her emotional condition because she had never expected that her beloved daughter is to be married to such a groom as Shiva appeared to be in physical terms.

Earlier when her husband had tried to assuage her feelings and get over her fears and apprehensions by convincing her that the best line of action for Parvati would be to do Tapa to be able to marry Shiva as prophesised by sage Narad (refer: Doha no. 71 along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede it, and Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that follow it), she had thought that her fears were groundless as the father of Parvati too loved his daughter as much as she does, and therefore he cannot think ill of her.

But now when Maina saw her future son-in-law, she was horrified. Love and affection for her daughter heaved inside her sad heart as she became remorseful and regretted her decision to allow Parvati to do Tapa to have Shiva as her husband. She regretted that had she been aware of the type of groom Parvati is fated to have, she would have not allowed her to do Tapa under any circumstance. This will be clear below when we read Doha no. 96 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4, as well as Chaupai line nos. 1-4.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 256 which describe a similar situation when Sita’s mother was very sad that after no one had been successful in lifting the bow upon which the marriage of her daughter hinged, the delicate prince of Ayodhya, i.e. Lord Ram, has now been asked to accomplish this almost impossible task. Now what would happen if he too fails?

<sup>3</sup>There are other instances in Ram Charit Manas where the creator is accused of acting irrationally and unwisely. The wonderful fruit that is supposed to adorn the tree of gods is forced to appear, against its will, on the acacia tree<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

I will jump off this mountain, or burn myself, or fall into an ocean with you (i.e. commit suicide with you)--- (Chanda line no. 3)

---But I will not allow this marriage to happen as long as I am alive, irrespective of whatever bad name it gives to the family.<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here, Parvati's beauty is compared to the wonderful 'fruit', and her marriage to a handsome groom is compared to the association of this fruit with the evergreen 'tree of gods'. Instead of this, the foolish creator had chosen to marry Parvati with the odd-looking Shiva which is likened to forcing the wonderful fruit to appear on the acacia tree much against its wishes and contrary to natural justice. But what can one do if the creator goes off his mind and creates nuisance because he is so powerful, and he lords over the fate of all in this creation, with no one to challenge his authority?

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 252 where Sita's father king Janak has also expressed similar distress when none of the invited kings and princes could lift and break the bow to qualify to marry Sita. At that time he has declared that inspite of the ignominy attached to his daughter remaining unmarried, he will not break his vows.]

All the women-folk became restless when they observed that the wife of the king of the mountains (i.e. Maina) had become exceedingly sad and remorseful.

Maina was lamenting and wailing in a woeful manner when her love for her daughter heaved in her heart, forcing her to be overwhelmed with emotions of regret, remorse and sorrow (at the misfortune that has befallen her beloved daughter who stared at the prospect of having a bleak future if she was forced to marry a groom who was not suitable for her)<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 96)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Even Sita's mother lamented woefully, felt very distressed and sad when no one could break the bow to qualify to marry her daughter—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 255.]

[Maina, the mother of Parvati, continued to lament—] ‘What offence did I do to Narad that he sought vengeance upon me by throwing a spanner in the happiness of my home and ruining it<sup>1</sup>--- [1] --- by giving such an advice to my daughter Uma that she would do severe Tapa (penance) to secure a crazy husband for herself<sup>2</sup>? [2] (1-2)

[Why has Narad created this mischief? What wrong did I do to him that he became so angry with me that he decided to punish me by undermining the peace and happiness of my family by brain-washing my innocent daughter to undergo severe hardships associated with doing Tapa just to request for a absurd boon that would make it possible for her to marry the craziest of husbands one can ever imagine in this world? Narad behaved as if he is our well-wisher and a saintly person, but I could not imagine that he had some ulterior motives in his heart. I could not imagine that my beloved daughter's groom would be so odd and repugnant that one would even tremble by simply looking at him.]

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 74 that describe the sort of Tapa Parvati did; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 75 where Brahma, the creator, has acknowledged the severity of Parvati's Tapa, saying that no one had ever done such a severe Tapa in the past; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 78 where the Sapta-rishis too have acknowledged this fact that Parvati had done a very severe Tapa.

Even the Sapta-rishis had accused Narad of ruining the life of Parvati by giving her a wrong and misleading advice—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha no. 80.

Though Narad has been accused by Maina here and by the Sapta-rishis earlier of misleading Parvati to do Tapa for having Shiva, who looked most crazy and unconventional from his external appearances, as her husband, but when we examine the story closely we come to the conclusion that the great celestial sage Narad had no intentions whatsoever of harming the interests of Parvati or her family at all. It was her father Himwaan who had asked Narad to prophesise about her future as the great sage was a “Trikaalagya”, i.e. one who could see the events that occur in a creature’s life, in the present, in the past as well as the future.

Now, since it was written in Parvati’s destiny that she would be married to someone who matched the crazy appearance of Lord Shiva, what would one expect Narad to say—tell lies to please Parvati’s parents that everything was rosy and honey in her life, or tell them the truth? Well, being a sage, it was not expected that Narad would tell the parents of Parvati any sort of lie, and therefore he divulged the truth. Then, Parvati’s anxious father had himself asked Narad to advice some way out. The sage had clearly told him that though it is not possible to change one’s destiny that has been already decided by the Creator, but efforts can be made to select the best possible choice from the available options. In the present set of circumstances, the best line of action for Parvati was to marry Lord Shiva because the Lord is all-powerful and almighty, and therefore his majestic presence by the side of Parvati would neutralise all the negative effects that her bad stars portend for her future. So what wrong was he doing? All these events are narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 65—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 71.

*A girl of a marriageable age and her parents try their best to get a good groom for her. After all, the girl has to spend the rest of her life with the chosen man. If the girl is pretty like Parvati was, it is natural to expect that her future husband would be smart and handsome, and not as odd as Lord Shiva is. This was the precise point that the Spata-rishis had raised when they tried to prevail upon Parvati to abandon the idea of having Shiva as her husband because he would not fit to be by her side, and instead opt for Lord Vishnu who is fabulous to behold and is praised even by the Vedas and other Holy Scriptures. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 80.]

साचेहुँ उह के मोह न माया । उदासीन धनु धामु न जाया ॥ ३ ॥

पर घर घालक लाज न भीरा । बाँझ कि जान प्रसव कै पीरा ॥ ४ ॥

sācēhum’ unha kēm mōha na māyā. udāsīna dhanu dhāmu na jāyā. 3.
para ghara ghālaka lāja na bhīrā. bām̐ha ki jāna prasava kai pīrā. 4.

Indeed it is true that he (Shiva, the groom) has no worldly attachments and attractions of any kind (because neither does he long for respect and expect honour, nor does he show-off his powers and majesty by external pomp and pageantry like the other gods were doing)<sup>1</sup>. He is dispassionate and detached so much so that he has no (yearning for) wealth, a home, or an off-spring. (3)

[Now, turning her ire on Narad, Maina pours scorn at him—] Really, he (Narad) has no shame or any fear worth the name in ruining the home of others<sup>2</sup>. Say, what does a barren woman know about the pain of childbirth?<sup>3</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Shiva's external appearances and demeanours clearly showed that the Lord had no attractions for worldly things and materials of comfort and glamour. He appeared to be an incarnate ascetic who is not at all concerned about what to wear and how the world treats him. Shiva showed his true nature and life-style by coming to the bride's place dressed in his usual attire, and surrounded by his usual companions. There was no trace of pretension or glamour with Shiva. This in itself is a wonderful character and shows honesty and trustworthiness.

When Maina went to perform Shiva's "Aarti", her companions ran away in terror at the Lord's sight—because he was half-naked, had ash and serpents all over his body, wore a garland around his neck. Obviously, no one would expect a 'bridegroom' to be dressed like this. Even Maina did not perform the Aarti to welcome Lord Shiva. Let alone the Lord being her daughter's future husband, not doing Aarti is an insult to a guest; it is highly uncivil and in-courteous not to do Aarti of a guest. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 96.

The remarkable thing to note here is that Lord Shiva did not mind and take offence at this apparent rude reception that he received at Himwaan's place. Earlier also, when the marriage party had arrived on the outskirts of the city, the children had run away screaming when they saw Lord Shiva, an action that would normally be deemed as being highly rude and insulting for the guest and his companions. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 95.

But Shiva had not taken affront at all, and had remained calm and neutral. He had cheerfully entered the city and gone to the place assigned to lodge in before the marriage ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 5 that precede Doha no. 96.

All these events clearly hint that the great Lord Shiva had no concern for such worldly gestures and formalities. He was merely fulfilling the wish of his dearest of Lord, Sri Ram, who has asked him to marry Parvati, as well as to fulfil the wish of his devotee in the form of Parvati who had done severe Tapa to have him as her husband. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 77 where the conversation between Lord Ram and Shiva is narrated; and (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 76 that clearly say that Lord Shiva was anguished by the mental sufferings of his devotee, who in this case is quite obviously Parvati.

So we come to the incontrovertible conclusion that all the observations of Maina here are correct. Shiva is dispassionate and detached from the affairs of this mundane world so much that he was not at all affected and ruffled by such a rude reception; he is semi-naked and wears no ornaments to mean that he has no attraction for worldly wealth and a desire to show-off his majesty, and no amount of temptations would lure him to get distracted from his path of renunciation; he is accompanied by ghosts and phantoms implying he has no home but prefers a cremation ground instead; he has ash smeared over his body to clearly indicate that he is an ascetic, and so on and so forth.

<sup>2</sup>That is, Narad is not afraid of the sin he is committing by robbing the peace and happiness of others by giving them such advice as he has given my husband Himwaan, and my daughter Parvati due to which I have had to face such an unsavoury situation of having to have a wild person as my daughter's future husband, something I had never imagined would happen.

<sup>3</sup>The woman who gives birth to a child has to suffer immense pain at that moment which is beyond imagination of a woman who has never borne a child. This is a figure of speech to mean that since Narad is a wandering mendicant, he cannot understand the pain and agony a householder suffers from when the girl of the family is married to a crazy groom who is absolutely not suitable for her. This mental agony and emotional suffering is experienced by only those who have a family and have to face constant ridicule and scornful remarks from the world, from their kith and kin, if one of the members of the family gets an unsuitable spouse, and that too, willingly, and not out of ignorance. In this case, Parvati had done voluntary Tapa to get Shiva as her husband, and had the permission of her parents. The latter cannot feign ignorance or say that Parvati did not pay heed to their advice and blame her bad luck that she got a crazy husband. The world would ask them—"Then, why did you allow your daughter to do Tapa to get such a wild husband when you were aware of her fate? Couldn't you, as parents, find a better groom for her?" What answer will they give to the world?

Maina means that since Narad is a wandering mendicant who has no family or home, he does not understand the pain and suffering parents have to undergo if their child's future is jeopardised.]

When Bhavani (Parvati) saw the immense emotional turmoil through which her mother was passing, she spoke to her in pleasant, calm and reassuring voice. Her words were mature and laced with great wisdom. (5)

She said, 'Mother, realise that whatever the Creator has written in one's destiny cannot be changed by anyone; it is irrevocable<sup>1</sup>. (6)

If it is written in my fate that I will get a crazy groom, why should anyone blame others (in this case Narad)<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Is it possible for you to change what the Creator ("Bidhi" or "Vidhi") has written (in my destiny)<sup>3</sup>? [Since the answer is a definite "no", then—] Oh Mother, why do you unnecessary invite infamy and taint (to the name of our honourable family by throwing tantrums and creating an unsavoury scene when the eyes of the whole world is upon our family and when the marriage party and the groom have already arrived; do you think that it is possible and wise to call-off the marriage now at this late stage without inviting scorn and ridicule for the rest of my life?)' (8)

<sup>2</sup>Parvati had defended Narad even in the front of her detractors, the Sapta-rishis as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 80; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 81.

The sort of groom that Parvati was destined to have is described earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 67 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

<sup>3</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 282 where Kaushalya, the mother of Lord Ram, says that one has to either suffer from pain or enjoy things in one's life depending on one's own actions and deeds, and no one should be either blamed or credited for any of the eventualities.]
